"Imagine going only with your family for two weeks with a private guide. The kids will get bored," he says. "The advantage of being with group is that the kids meet new kids and make friends, and they can enjoy the trip. The same goes with the parents. Generally, they come from the same background and are professionals or businesspeople, and they find a commonality and make a lot of friends. The most important thing is that people interact with each other."

Traditions in flux: personalizing that very special day

By JEANNETTE FRIEDMAN
Special to The CJN

Tradition! It seems to be set in stone, particularly at Jewish weddings – except, of course, in this post-denominational age, when tradition is in flux.

Even 18-year-old brides don't want their mothers and mothers-in-law hijacking their weddings, and grooms have something to say as well. Couples want to romanticize that special day with their own personalities and expressions of love.

From commitment statements under the chupah to special party favours, decorations and books, couples are personalizing their wedding days by doing something special – from creating new fun family traditions or reciting commitment statements they wrote themselves.

The ketubah, though it may be beautifully hand-crafted—with a hearts-and-flowers theme, the Zodiac or the Twelve Tribes of Israel – is hardly a romantic document. It's a binding contract about what happens when there is a divorce or the husband dies! Where's the romance in that?

"Blasphemy!" you cry? Not.

There's always room for something new, as long as it doesn't abrogate Jewish law, says Rabbi Shmuel Goldin of Englewood, N.J., a nationally known modern Orthodox rabbi and author.

"Speaking to each other and making a verbal commitment under the chupah is not forbidden, as long as it happens at the 'correct' point in the ceremony," he says. "I'm not sure I would couch that as a 'vow,' but certainly a couple is permitted to express their mutual love and respect under the chupah."

He suggests that the couple speak before the breaking of the glass.

Reform, Reconstructionist and Renewal couples have been reciting poetry and expressing their "vows" since it became cool in the late 1960s and early '70s. Sometimes, each chooses a favourite reading, whether religious or secular, or, if they feel up to the challenge, they will compose their own thoughts and feelings, sometimes as a poem.

Others may choose a prayer. Still others may create a "duet" of sorts – a responsive reading, or something funny and poignant, describing a special moment that spoke to each of their hearts.

There are as many ways to express and personalize that loving commitment on your wedding day as there are brides and grooms. Some couples give out toys, while others give out jelly beans. Some get their friends to do outrageous "shtick" on the dance floor, with costumes, candles and glitter. Some order wedding cakes to resemble shtetls in eastern Europe or choose a theme they both love.

One couple, both Conservative Jews, unbeknownst to the other, prepared individually for their aufruf ceremony (it takes place in the synagogue on the Shabbat before the wedding). The groom had never read Hebrew or had an aliyah before, and his bride, who read the Torah portion, was amazed when her groom showed his deep commitment and love for her by sharing the bimah with her and reading the Haftorah.

At some Orthodox weddings, the couples prepare lists of people who need their prayers, and give each guest a specially imprinted edition of Psalms as a souvenir of their day.

Some couples create little booklets, often stapled in the centre and bound with a ribbon, to give to guests at the ceremony. The booklets may contain descriptions of who's who in the bridal party; letters from the bride to the groom and groom to bride; favourite prayers and poems; and songs and notes of good wishes from friends. Often they contain an explanation of the different parts of the ceremony. (This last one is important if some of the guests are not Jewish.)

These booklets can also tell the story of how the couple met, how he (or she) proposed, and how they intend to live happily ever after. Now that's personal!

Caterers offer original dishes

From tasty appetizers to sumptuous desserts, a party is not a party without the food. And in a city like Toronto, it's never hard to please your taste buds.

J. Catering

☐ Kosher
☑ Non-Kosher

At J. Catering, (647-292-3953; www.jcatering.ca), it's all about the customer. The owner, Josh Okarofsky, works with clients to create unique menus for each event.

"I pride myself on my ability to work with customers," Okarofsky said. "I really try to find out what it is they want and [build] a relationship [with them]. I have to gain their trust."

His company caters everything from bar/bat mitzvahs and cocktail parties to barbecues and corporate events. While the company is a one-man operation, Okarofsky has an extensive network of freelancers.

It's J. Catering's customer service that sets the company apart.

"I work with people to make memorable events and take away the stress. I have professional staff. I develop the menu, and I take care of details such as glassware, dishes, plates and floral arrangements," he said.

Okarofsky also offers original and delicious menus.

"I'm really passionate about food," he said. "I'm a food enthusiast aside from a chef."

According to Okarofsky, experience is essential when creating a new dish.

"You generally have to know what works together. Sometimes you have to take a chance and try something different," he said.

When cooking for children, Okarofsky says that simplicity is key.

"[Kids like] mini-hamburgers or grilled cheese. It [has to be] fun, comfortable and easy to eat," he said. "But some of the items you think of for kids appeal to adults. I can elevate a hamburger with caramelized onions and put a sophisticated touch to it."

In the end, Okarofsky's goal is simple.

"I really try to make great food," he said.

At The Secret Chefs, (416-277-2889), customers will find creative dishes and innovative menus. While the company is just three months old, the owner, Cory Marks, has worked in the food industry for 20 years.

The Secret Chefs

☐ Kosher
☑ Non-Kosher

After chef school, Marks started a catering company, but then moved on. Since then, he's worked at restaurants, hotels and, until recently, was a food and beverage manager at a golf course.

"I've worked in all aspects of the industry. I just decided that catering was something I loved. In catering, [I] have the opportunity to be creative, it's exciting," he said.

While The Secret Chefs hosts house parties and is planning to host weddings and bar and bat mitzvahs, Marks also offers personalized and catered meals for dinner any night of the week.

After 20 years in the business, Marks has learned the secret to success.

"You have to be organized and you have to be creative. Customers get bored. I'm constantly researching, travelling, seeing what's out there," he said.

Cory Marks of The Secret Chefs

The Secret Chefs has more than 100 menus for customers to choose from and Marks is always working on more. His menus span many cultures, including Jewish, Chinese, Japanese and Italian.

Marks is all about variety. At events, he likes to create different stations and tasting plates to offer clients a little bit of everything.

"We cater to customers' needs," he said. "It's not the same drab [food.]"

Marks creates most of his recipes at his house through trial and error. His signature dish is his lemon pepper halibut with "jump-fried" Israeli couscous and sautéed rapini.

Josh Okarofsky of J.Catering

"[It's about] making sure you listen to what [customers] want," he said.

Hair salons make you look great for the big day

By RITA POLIAKOV
CJN Intern

There's nothing better than getting pampered at a salon and spa before a big event. From smoothing down unruly curls to pumping up limp strands, the right salon will make bad hair days a thing of the past.

Salon Matte, located on Bathurst Street just north of Wilson Avenue, can make getting ready a breeze. The salon offers manicures, pedicures facials and waxing along with a wide range of hair services, including colour treatment, cuts, hair extensions and wig care.

The salon, owned by Matthew Odisho, opened in 2000 and has continued to flourish. It's still attracting new customers while retaining regulars.

"The amount of clients has increased. [We] just keep getting better and better," Odisho said.

The key to great hair and a constant stream of customers is consistency, he said. While hairstyles change, he works hard to ensure that the quality of his salon doesn't.

"You can't do a bad job one day and a good job the next," he said.

In order to keep the quality of each cut consistent, Odisho teaches all his employees his techniques.

The key to Odisho's hairstyles is simple.

"We try to make hair look as natural as possible while making it stylish," he said.

Beyond consistency, Odisho also emphasized the importance of knowing the market.

"We have the best products. We know which [products] are high quality," he said.

Salon Matte uses high-end products and brand names such as Kerastase Paris, a line of high-quality hair serums and shampoos.

Odisho's salon offers bridal packages and other specials, depending on the size of the party. To make an appointment, call 416-398-5228.

For more pampering and current styles, a harried guest could also turn to Hair After.

Located at 644 Finch Ave. E., Hair After is a full-service salon and spa that offers a wide range of hair and esthetic services, including manicures, pedicures, wig care and makeup.

"It's a one-stop-shop," said owner John Colombo. "We do everything under the roof."

Colombo's family has been cutting and styling hair for three generations and his son, Gionpaolo, also works with him to create new, cutting-edge styles.

"The salon was started in 1971," says Colombo. "We've had people who've been coming back to us for 35 years."

Colombo, who was born in Italy, has more than just experience and formal training under his belt. He's also won awards. Hair After is the winner of such national and international hairstyling competitions as the Combined Hairstyling World Championships and the Mirror Award. Colombo has also been a finalist in the North American Hair Awards and, along with his son, he continues to take part in international competitions.

Hair After offers a wide range of hair and esthetic services including wig care and makeup.

Salon Matte tries to make hair look as natural as possible.

Colombo credits his success to his consistent quality and his ability to create current styles year after year.

"Customers come back for the consistency. We're always on the edge," he said.

Colombo and his son keep their edge by attending national hair shows and constantly retraining staff.

"Education is key," Colombo said. "We train our staff on a weekly basis and have in-house teaching to keep us ahead."

The new style this year, according to Colombo, is "rockmantic," a mixture of elements from both the rock and romantic eras. The look can include bold, vibrant colours combined with soft, romantic hair styles, or vice versa.

Colombo's secret is the attention he gives to each customer.

"The key of any trend is suitability. It's very important. If someone has curly hair we can't do a straight style. Instead, we'll do lots of curls," he said.

Colombo is very precise when it comes to hair.

"I go by face shapes. We have drawings of face shapes [in the salon.] First we determine the face shape, and then we'll suit the hairstyle for the face."

Hair After offers full-service party and wedding packages that include hair and makeup, as well as other services such as acrylic or gel nails.

In the end, Colombo says it's all about the passion.

"We do it because we love hair," he said.

Charitable event planning requires hard work and attention

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to the CJN

The new social hall at Congregation Darchei Noam was all decked for a recent afternoon fundraiser organized by Kolel: The Adult Centre for Jewish Learning.

Bright pink floral centrepieces and tall wine glasses with gazpacho at every setting added to the elegance of the luncheon for 120 people.

It was no surprise that this event, which featured speeches and a discussion about the agenda for Jewish women in the 21st century, drew a predominantly female crowd.

The keynote speaker, American feminist, journalist and social activist Letty Cottin Pogrebin, founding editor of Ms. Magazine made an impassioned presentation. She was also joined on the dais by Sarah Fulford, the new editor of Toronto Life magazine, and Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, rabbinical director of Kolel and the event moderator.

The surprise presentation marking Rabbi Goldstein's 25th anniversary in the rabbinate went according to plan, says Esther Schlesinger, events manager for Kolel. "If an event goes off without a hitch, it means that I have done my job properly."

She says a lot of groundwork goes into planning a major fundraiser, from the selection of a theme and negotiating contracts with speakers, caterers and venue to the marketing and the logistics of the actual event.

Schlesinger gave a breakdown of all the underlying organizational work for this fundraiser, which was held in mid- May.

She says she, Rabbi Goldstein and Kolel program co-ordinator Tracy Starr began thinking about the event and speaker six months ago.

"We sat and brainstormed about what topics would be of interest to the Jewish community. They were looking for a speaker who was a Jewish feminist who hadn't been in Toronto for awhile."

Once they settled on Pogrebin, they began negotiating a contract with her agent . They also approached Fulford, a longtime Kolel student.

"We liked the juxtaposition of a younger editor. We could establish a date for the event once we had a commitment from Letty," Schlesinger said.

"We liked the idea of a luncheon. Our guests could come and enjoy a lecture in a beautiful setting."

She says when the date was set, she had to start negotiating with caterers and find a venue. "I had to have them send me menus that would best serve our needs. You deal with the things back and forth.

"You have to do a site visit, for venue consideration as you're negotiating the space."

She says all costs, including rental, have to be formalized once the menu is selected.

Schlesinger says she needed to recruit volunteers to mail invitations and act as assistants on the day of the event. "We needed help for registration, book signings and the raffle. We had six volunteers, along with two staff people."

She was in charge of publicity, which encompassed the production and distribution of flyers. She also had to find sponsors to offset the cost of the food and speakers.

She says the event was an opportunity to build ties with Kolel students and supporters, and to advise them of other events, such as an upcoming female cantorial concert on Nov. 19. "It's a way to create lasting relationships in the community."

She says a lot of administration work goes into organizing this kind of community event. "The budget had to be developed and reconciled. My background is in corporate event planning." But it can be done, Schlesinger says, noting the success of the annual volunteer-run Toronto Hadassah-WIZO Bazaar. "It's been a city-wide phenomenon for decades."

The bazaar has become an institution, as has another Hadassah fundraiser.

At Our Table, a private-home dinner party for women organized by the Toronto Hadassah-WIZO Tzedakah Chapter, marked its fifth anniversary this week. This year's goal was to raise $100,000, says event co-chair Robyn Greenspan. "We're so excited. In the five years that it has existed, a total contribution of more than $300,000 has gone to youth aliyah projects in Israel."

She and co-chair Jeannie Sklar both say the event has become a full-time job for the two of them, but they are quick to add that it's very much a labour of love.

"I do it as a way of giving back to the community," Greenspan says. "I do what I can to contribute. It's my pleasure and my responsibility."

Sklar says that making such a contribution to Israel is very gratifying. "The need in Israel is so great. It's extremely motivating and fulfilling to raise money for those need."

But she adds that there is also the gratification of seeing an idea that germinated from a discussion around a kitchen table grow to an event that has nearly tripled in scope.

Greenspan says that in the first year, there were 100 people and the dinner raised $30,000. This year, some 250 people were expected to gather at the home of Alexandra Azouri and the fundraising goal was $100,000.

She attributes the success of the event to their hardworking planning committee. "It's a team effort. Everyone in our [Hadassah] chapter does what they can, but we have key players. Their efforts and their contributions have been remarkable. "

Both women stress that everything at the event – from food and flowers to invitations and entertainment – is donated.

"It's 100 per cent donations. Everything you see," says Sklar. "Even our members bake. The only thing we pay for are the rentals and the serving staff."

The whole experience is so gratifying that it gives the two women the incentive to start working on the next event right away, Sklar says.

"We're so energized by all the support. It's such a feel good night."

Dorit Elbaz and Israeli television host Gila Yefet also talk about the personal gratification they get from their volunteerism.

A year ago the two Israeli women founded Mifgashim, or Gatherings, an organization that holds fundraisers to connect Israelis to Jewish non-profit social organizations.

"We wanted to hold events, but we didn't know which direction we were going in," Elbaz says. "The reason we started Mifgashim was to bridge the gap between the Israeli and [general] Jewish communities."

The women have teamed up with Benny Shofer, owner of the Hava Nagila night club in Thornhill (1118 Centre St.), to hold parties on behalf of different community organizations.

"It's all about people getting together. They're doing something for the community and having fun," Elbaz says.

Shofer takes care of the food and entertainment, Yefet says. "He has been so supportive and generous."

Their first event a year ago was in support of Israel Beats the Street, an organization that brings troubled Jewish teens to Israel. Last fall, they held an event on behalf a women's shelter run by Jewish Women International, and on June 5, their party at Hava Nagila will raise money and awareness for the One Family Fund, an organization that helps Israeli victims of terrorism.

Both Elbaz and Yefet have day jobs, and so they're up very late many nights planning these events. "It's such an enriching experience. Sometimes we're talking until 1 o'clock in the morning," Elbaz says.

"But there's so much passion when you do something you love and you believe in it. It's no longer work."

Notes for a bar/bat mitzvah guide

By TED ROBERTS
Special to The CJN

Bar/bat mitzvah audiences are no longer what they used to be. No more the simple Saturday morning minyan – a tight cluster of worshippers – who halfway through the service are thinking of the pickled herring and egg salad to follow.

Today, in many synagogues the ceremony has all the excitement of a college basketball game followed by a groaning banquet table.

It is an interfaith moment, so to speak: a wonderful opportunity to display our theological wares. Today, by the time the frenzied parents have satisfied their social obligations, they've included, beside relatives, co-workers, the child's friends, and mixed family members, some of whom typically worship on Sunday, not Saturday.

Given the condition of Judaism in 2007, a bar/bat mitzvah is an ecumenical stew. It's not only the non-Jews who wonder about the significance and meaning of the ceremony, but even some of our fellow Israelites stare with wonder and, sometimes, awe.

That's why a booklet of origins, explanations and exegesis is useful. Not only does it highlight the mechanics of the ceremony, but with a touch of subtlety, as well as modesty, it allows us to point out the contributions of Judaism to the overwhelming Christian culture in which we live: a contribution unknown to most of our fellow Jews as well as their non-Jewish friends.

From the world of entertainment to Nobel Prize winners for physics. From Hollywood to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, disproportionately you find Jews. It is one of history's puzzling enigmas – there are more Brazilians than Jews, but Brazilians rarely make the headlines. Though the bar/bat mitzvah booklet cannot explain this mystery, it can, via a description of the ceremony and history, educate and advertise the joys of Judaism, an opportunity we shouldn't miss. It helps to remind the world that for better or worse, politically correct or not, God has chosen us to carry the light out of Zion.

The booklet should go something like this:

Introduction

The ceremony that we will witness today marks the passage of a Jewish girl or boy from childhood into adulthood. From this day on, he/she is ethically, morally responsible for his/her behaviour, literally, a son or daughter of the commandments. Contrary to the common wisdom, our Bible is jammed with 603 commandments in addition to the familiar 10. The youth undertakes a heavy obligation: these commandments, dealing with every aspect of behaviour from the sexual to the supper table, make the point that Judaism is a creed of deeds. Deeds, more important than faith, more important even than prayer.

We realize that some of our friends, both Jewish and Christian, may never have attended a bar/bat mitzvah ceremony. Therefore, we offer this guide to the morning's activities. It's full of tradition and still the foundation of our Judeo-Christian culture.

Nothing the bar mitzvah student has accomplished so far has demanded so much hard work and dedication.

History

Nothing the bar/bat mitzvah student has accomplished so far in his/her 13 years of life has demanded the hard work and dedication this task has required – unless his/her name was Amadeus Wolfgang Mozart, who gave up soccer for symphonies at four years of age. It's stressful; it's heavy neural traffic for a child.

Stress is everywhere. Mama is worried, too, about:

- the child's performance;
- the caterer's performance; and
- whether Aunt Hannah will bring her six married daughters – with kids – who delight in pillaging a kiddush table.

Pop goes around muttering, "I'll bet even Elijah never had a bar mitzvah like this."

And he's right. There's no record whatsoever of Elijah's folks laying out appetizers and delicacies for a flock of friends and relatives. Nowhere in our entire Bible, nor in the rabbinic literature, is there a commandment to mortgage the family home for an evening of food and drink.

The service

The bar/bat mitzvah ceremony usually takes place within the setting of the normal Saturday morning Shabbat service, which consists of traditional prayers that go back centuries. The highlight of the Saturday ceremony – the highlight of every service at which the Torah, the Five Books of Moses, is read – is the removal of the sacred scroll from its draped alcove.

The Torah is carried by the rabbi or a congregation member around the aisles of the synagogue as the worshippers sing a joyful song of praise and thanksgiving. Congregants crowd around "The Law" to kiss it, to touch it with their prayer shawls or their prayer books. This exuberant procession is also a sign that the bar mitzvahee, who has thus far been in the wings, is ready for the spotlight.

After the appropriate blessings, the honoree will read directly from the Torah scroll. Not a simple task even to a student of Hebrew – because the ancient lettering has no vowels.

Besides the Torah chanting, the child – after a blessing – sings a passage from the Haftorah, the prophetic section of the Bible. The Haftarah is the home of Isaiah, Jeremiah, Micah, Amos and company, who spoke for justice and care for the downtrodden before it was politically popular. After all, it was an era where swords beat love at every encounter.

The bar/bat mitzvah child follows his/her Haftorah performance with yet another tuneful blessing. The challenge of the day, you see, is musical as well as scholarly.

Then finally, after deciphering and reciting passages from a 3,500-year-old language and delivering the equivalent of three arias from the opera Il Trovatore, you'd think our young student could take a bow. Not yet.

He/she must, finally, present an exegesis on the Torah and Haftorah he/she has just chanted.

When he/she completes this final task, there's no applause, but everybody grins and relaxes. Once the bar/bat mitzvah child finishes his/her speech, the normal services are resumed.

Our blessing

Luckily, we live in the free world. We don't have to whisper our Haftorah. We don't need a sentry by the synagogue door on the lookout for the mob and the hoodlums. The bar mitzvah boys who preceded this one in Hitler's Germany, Stalin's Russia and other dark times studied in stealth and recited their lessons in fear. But our honoree can shout to the heavens.

Our Passover Haggadah tells us: "Now we are slaves in Egypt, next year may we be free men." Well, today we are free – free to sing the Torah and Haftorah with passion, like David, the sweet singer of Israel. Dimly surrounding our honoree are the less fortunate children of other lands and other times. He/she sings for them, too.

Bar mitzvah trekking to Israel

By RENA GODFREY
Special to The CJN

It's always been my dream to have one of my children's bar or bat mitzvahs in Israel. After going through the whole prep and plan for my other two kids, I thought I'd spice it up a bit for my youngest, Sam, and throw Israel into the mix.

Since my previous simchahs were orchestrated without any major glitches, I figured I was now a pro and up for the challenge. Although planning our trek to Israel has had its moments, I can almost taste and smell the delicious experiences that await us.

Sam also dreamed of chanting his Torah portion in the spiritual city of Jerusalem. When we first announced more than a year ago that we would be having his bar mitzvah in Israel this July, the news elicited unexpected reactions.

I was so excited about our plan to have this momentous event in Jerusalem that I naively ignored the potential snags: cottage season, camp commitments, summer jobs, summer heat and, of course, the financial cost of such a venture.

Sam and his mother Rena Godfrey

After I got over the initial shock that not all of our family and friends were going to drop their long-awaited summer plans to join us, I calmed down. I became appreciative of those who would join us, and understanding of those who couldn't, and I began to focus on the task at hand.

I really didn't know what to expect, or what to do, but soon I realized that I needed to approach this planning process with patience, faith and a sense of humour. Number one on the "must do list," other than choosing a date, was finding a rabbi. After asking just about everyone I knew, who in turn asked everyone they knew, Rabbi Howard Markose's name kept coming up.

Rabbi Markose served as assistant rabbi at Adath Israel Congregation from 1984 to 1988 and rabbi of Shaar Shalom Congregation from 1988 to 1994, when he decided to make aliyah with his wife, Judy, and their three boys.

Having had the pleasure and privilege to meet Rabbi Markose in person last fall, I learned that not only does Rabbi Markose officiate at bar mitzvah services, he has been director of education for the Young Judaea Year Course for the past seven years, and on top of that, he is a super nice guy.

Employing a videographer to document your simchah, whether it be a wedding, a bar or bat mitzvah, or an anniversary is a priceless investment for the future.

"After people make momentous simchahs, everything is gone and having been so caught up in the moment they forget half the evening," says Lisa Feinstein of Lisa Productions (905-764-1033).

"Video lets you relive the entire simchah, and you can't put a price on that," says Abe Salzman of Video Affairs (905-889-0909). He describes his task at a simchah as capturing all the details and emotions within a special event in order to create a lasting memory for those involved.

Feinstein stresses that she avoids being intrusive when she's on a job.

Both Feinstein and Salzman say keeping lighting and other equipment at a simchah to a minimum is important. Feinstein mingles with guests, which she find helpful in mitigating her obtrusiveness.

Both Salzman and Feinstein have always been creative, a trait that manifests itself in their work. Technology has made available an enormous range of editing techniques, which contribute to the personalization of each video according to the vision of the client. Feinstein has had video editors working for her on a contract basis for more than 15 years.

Today's options for video enhancement are endless, ranging from minimal and cost-efficient editing to intense alterations. While the choice is always left to the client, Salzman says that trends have changed in the digital effects used in today's videography. "There are many different effects and styles. Effects should be used to enhance the video, not to show off the videographer's equipment. Therefore artistic, uncomplicated effects are used."

A videographer is generally booked one to two years ahead of time, as soon as a date for a function is determined. Feinstein meets with clients a week before the event to confirm all the details.

Salzman notes that certain clients may have additional requests, such as wishing to re-enact the history of an engaged couple, which means the videographer's work begins earlier.

Regardless, the videographer heeds the requirements of clients, in order to help them to create an eternal memory of their most joyous occasions.

Not only does this provide a documentation of the evening, but it also creates a visual image of the attendants at that age, a point that Feinstein, herself a mother of five, is sure to stress.

Two of her children, Matt and Kelsey, work with her. Both have been trained by her, and their presence is often requested by Feinstein's clients.

Salzman and Feinstein are both very experienced in their field, so much so that Salzman has had 42 of his clips aired on wedding television shows.

The two cite referrals as the most reliable source of information when selecting a videographer and emphasize the importance of ensuring that the family employs someone who is the proper fit for them.

Having worked as videographers for many years, Salzman and Feinstein have attended countless celebrations.

"Everyone is filled with such joy and happiness that it's always a pleasure to be at a simchah. Every single family and simchah is so special," says Feinstein.

Age brings greater meaning to bar and bat mitzvahs

By ANNE PHYLLIS PINZOW
Special to The CJN

Deborah Finger was beaming yet nervous as she read from the Torah, as if it was only possible that she, among the millions who preceded her through the centuries in this ritual, would flub the pronunciations, the trope or, God forbid, both.

Sitting in the congregation, mouthing the words of Finger's portion along with her, was her daughter, as well as her eight grandchildren. The four who had already gone through this rite of passage also mouthed the words.

"They all looked like gasping fish," she laughed in the retelling later as she sat among her family and friends, feeling a mixture of modesty and pride. "It's too much fuss."

She always was one for doing things simply, a leftover from growing up in New York during the Depression era when girls were not called to the bimah at all.

Finger, who has since passed away, was a member of a small co-ed group of congregants of Nanuet Hebrew Center in New York who made the commitment to study together once a week for two years to prepare for their b'nai mitzvah.

Leo Karpfen 83, and Donna Smith, 46, in the minyan room of the Nanuet Hebrew Center

A picture of Deborah Finger taken before her death, in the year of her bat mitzvah

Though some adhere to a tradition to wait until 13 years past 70, Deborah had been joined in her class by several younger women.

Lisa Green, 38, studied for a year with the group and then studied privately for a year. When she was eight, Lisa lost her mother. The death threw confusion into her family, and she left her Jewish studies.

At age 12, Green asked to go through the ritual, but was told she was too far behind and would have to study for four years – something she was not willing to do.

As a married adult, Green found herself reaching out more as she struggled with her inability to conceive children. Then, at a Rosh Hashanah service, reading the story of Sarah, she made the connection.

"Infertility has been around since that time and there was somebody else who shared my problem," she said.

Later, when she adopted her daughter, Green named her in honour of another woman who went to synagogue to pray for a child: Hannah, who became the mother of Samuel.

Soon after, she started what became, in effect, two sets of classes. She enjoyed those she took at the synagogue, but what became especially joyous was learning from her newly adopted daughter, who came home every week from preschool with another Jewish lesson.

"It's like a spiritual rebirth," she said, adding that she has reached a new level of comfort reconnecting and participating in the synagogue community.

The day of the b'nai mitzvah, Green said that for the first time in her life, she felt that not only was she the centre of attention, but she had the wholehearted support of so many people wanting her to do well.

"Everyone should get that at least once in their life," she said.

Another bar mitzvah boy, 83-year-old Leo Karpfen, didn't need the classes. He had gone through the ritual when he was 13 in Cluj, Romania. Leo and his father went to shul every day just before dawn and this day, Leo said, was no more remarkable than any other morning at synagogue, except that it was his birthday.

"Mine was on a Thursday. I was called up to the Torah, and given an aliyah," Leo said. "After services, my father gave everyone drinks and rolls, and that was it."

Karpfen said he wanted to have the second bar mitzvah for three things he was grateful for: "One, I survived the war without any physical damage at all. [As a child, he spent some time in a concentration camp until it was liberated. He immigrated to the United States in 1948.] The second is I have a nice family – a son, a daughter, two grandchildren – who are also reading the Torah. The third one is that I'm 83 and I'm in fairly good physical health," he said.

"That was my main purpose and I'm very happy that my whole family went along with it."

Two more things made the milestone special for Karpfen: he got to share it with another congregant, Nathan Shlanger, and there was a baby naming on the same day.

"There was the youngest congregant and the oldest one," Karpfen said. "It was unbelievable, really joyful. The temple was full, awards they gave me. One thing I asked them: please do not give me a kiddush cup."

What Karpfen did want was the rabbi's blessing, which he received.

"I felt exhilarated, and I still feel it," Karpfen said.

Rabbi Paul Kurland of Nanuet Hebrew Center on Long Island said it's a misconception that a ceremony is needed to for someone to become bar or bat mitzvah. Any girl who reaches the age of 12 or boy who reaches the age of 13 is that and remains a bat or bar mitzvah for the rest of their lives.

PARTY PLANNER

The commitments made when signing a traditional ketubah

By MICHELLE ALPERIN
Special to The CJN

For many brides and grooms, the ketubah signing that precedes the veiled walk down the aisle has a bit of mystery about it. They may not be sure exactly what the ancient Aramaic text says, but the signing ceremony sets just the right air of solemnity as a prelude to the veiled walk down the aisle.

Some couples who do read the text carefully encounter a document that seems at least mildly chauvinist, with the husband taking an active role and the wife only consenting to become his wife. Although some couples decide to write their own egalitarian ketubah and forgo the traditional document, many decide to also have a standard ketubah.

Donna Frieze, a convert to Judaism, had an additional kosher ketubah to ensure the legality of her marriage. "Later in life," she said, "we don't know if we or our children would want to go to Israel and if there would be any question about our marriage."

Despite concerns by feminists with the male-oriented language of the ketubah, the document originally developed as an insurance policy to protect the bride if the marriage ends – either through divorce or death of the husband.

The most fundamental role of the ketubah, said Rabbi Yosef Blau, spiritual adviser at Yeshiva University, is to elucidate the responsibilities and obligations a husband accepts in a marriage.

According to Maurice Lamm's The Jewish Way in Love and Marriage, the ketubah specifies that the husband is setting aside 200 silver zuzim, called a mohar, that will be paid to the bride in the event of his death or a divorce.

The husband also agrees in the ketubah to support his wife with food, clothing and "other necessary benefits," which the Talmud defines as satisfactory conjugal relations.

Rabbi Jill Jacobs, a Conservative rabbi who was ordained in 2003, maintained that a ketubah can express greater mutuality and still be in consonance with Jewish law. Using as a basis for her ketubah a document created by Rabbi Gordon Tucker and posted, with commentary, at www.ritualwell.org, Rabbi Jacobs and her husband, Guy Austrian, expressed mutual responsibility for each other in their ketubah: "The groom and bride also agreed of their own free will to work for one another, to honour, support, and nurture one another, to live together as a family, and to create their home in love, companionship, peace and friendship as befits the sons and daughters of Israel."

The traditional ketubah also lists two additional transfers of property. One is the bride's dowry, or nedunya, of silver, gold, valuables, clothing, and household furnishings, which the groom accepts in the sum of 100 zuzim. The second is an additional 100 zuzim, called tosefet ketubah, which the groom provides as a wedding gift to the bride. In the Sephardi world, the tosefet ketubah is often a negotiated sum that is specified in the currency of the land.

The groom must secure these monetary obligations with a lien on his property: "I take upon myself and my heirs after me," reads the ketubah, "the surety of this ketubah, of the dowry, and of the additional sum, so that all this shall be paid from the best part of my property, real and personal, that I now possess or may hereafter acquire."

In the notes to Rabbi Tucker's ketubah, which Rabbi Jacobs described as "the bare minimum of what you need halachically," he claims that the only obligatory elements of the ketubah are the mohar and the lien it engenders. Concerning these monetary payments, added Rabbi Jacobs, "they are part of a ketubah, but it is not necessary to specify how much."

Rabbi Tucker included language to allude to both the mohar and the lien on property: "The groom and the bride also accepted full legal responsibility for the obligations specified here, as well as for the various property entering the marriage from their respective homes and families, and agreed that the obligations of this ketubah may be satisfied even from movable property."

The standard ketubah, despite its formulaic nature, is required for every Orthodox marriage. Because the standard ketubah does not require a husband to grant his wife a religious divorce, a get, Blau supported the idea of a bride and groom signing, in addition to the ketubah, a separate prenuptial agreement – also to protect the bride in case of a divorce.

Although the Orthodox community is committed to the existing ketubah document, whose language come from the Mishnah, Blau said he has no problem with a bride and a groom making additional agreements and commitments, as long as they do not controvert Jewish law.

When Rabbi Jacobs and her husband got married, they did not want to have two ketubot, but rather one ketubah that satisfied both Jewish law and their own values. "We wanted something that to our standards was halakhically acceptable," she explained, but also egalitarian.

Using Rabbi Tucker's ketubah and adding to it three additional paragraphs of a more personal nature enabled Rabbi Jacobs and her husband to have a single ketubah, something that is often not true for couples Rabbi Jacobs has married. If they have written their own ketubah, but not in a way that satisfies Jewish law, she requires them to have an additional kosher ketubah – even if it is a computer printout that will go in a safe deposit box after the ceremony.

Photographers capture your special moment forever

By SHLOMIT KRIGER

Elliot Sylman of Sylman Photography takes both traditiional and fun photos.

While time seems to whiz by as you enjoy connecting with loved ones and ensure everything goes as planned at your simchah, photographers can help you capture each special moment forever.

Some of Toronto's finest event photography services include Sylman Photography, run by Elliot Sylman, and Platinum Studios Photography, owned by Alex Himell. Both companies have covered events such as weddings and bar and bat mitzvahs.

A lot has changed over the years in the way that photographers work.

"Everything has changed from traditional photography," said Sylman (905-889-0760; esylman@rogers.com; www.sylmanphoto.com). "Albums are now much more customized, and you can alter layouts in them.

"There is much more creativity involved, or there can be if the client chooses."

Sylman said he tries to get people to look as natural as possible and takes both traditional and fun photos, including a lot of candid shots. He has various packages that clients can choose from.

"I try to find what people want and make a package that work for them," he added.

He does not use a lot of props and aims for mainly complimentary lighting.

Sylman's fascination with photography began in his early high school years, and he took his passion to the professional level about 22 years ago. He started out in commercial photography and then began taking more and more pictures of people.

"I like having an interaction with people," said Sylman.

For the past seven years, he has also been working on a personal project that he said he truly loves and allows him to give back to his heritage. He has been photographing Holocaust survivors.

"I'm trying to get a real photo of the survivors," he said. "I try to get people's feelings in my photos, which is why I like candid shots."

Sylman, whose father was a Holocaust survivor, plans on including those photographs in a book, as well as in a gallery show. Any proceeds made from those will be donated to an organization dedicated to Holocaust education.

Himell (905-709-7754 or 416-823-1204; www.platinum-studios.com) fuses his photos with a touch of "casual elegance."

"My style is young and fresh, yet also timeless," he said. "We do a lot of fun stuff, which is great for clients' albums, but we also do some traditional photos."

When preparing for a photo shoot, Himell said he tries to come up with offbeat concepts that would work for clients who want something different.

"I like to create our own individual statements," he added.

Himell sometimes uses props such as vehicles or umbrellas, and he uses multiple lights to make a room look its best when photographing people.

Alex Himell of Platinum Studios Photography likes offbeat concepts.

With an interest in visual arts for many years, Himell earned a bachelor's degree in applied arts and photography and has been working as a professional photographer for the past 12 years.

He said he enjoys working with people. "It's always a happy environment, and there is a lot of positive energy in the industry when you're out shooting and just being involved with people," he said.

Photographers help their subjects relax so that they are not too nervous during the shoots.

"I try to have a relaxing relationship with my clients, get to know them a bit ahead of time and also photograph them before the events so that there is more of a familiarity between me and my subjects," said Sylman.

"I give them instructions and talk to them when photographing them to help take their minds off some of the stressful things that may be taking place on the day of their event and make it more of a pleasant experience."

Both Sylman Photography and Platinum Studios do touch-ups for photographs as required.

Platinum Studios fully retouches all portraits, and everything produced for albums gets hands-on attention.

"We go an extra step for retouching for our albums," said Himell. "The extra details is one of the ways that we like to separate ourselves from other companies."

Sylman and Himell recommend that people book photographers about a year in advance. Some people even book as far ahead as two years.

Himell noted several things people should keep in mind when choosing a photographer.

"Look at the assembly of the album and the way things are put together," he said. "From a technical standpoint, consider the way things are lit, whether it is outdoors or inside at a party, where you have multiple lights and there is depth to the images.

"All of the photographers know how to take great pictures, but one thing that differentiates one company from the next is how well the service is from start to finish."

Sylman emphasized that the chemistry between clients and the photographer is key.

"The most important thing is personality and how well the clients mesh with the photographer," he said. "People should meet with a few photographers to decide who they would like to work with based on their personality and style of photography."

Planning anything six months in advance is absurd to many Israelis

Rabbi Markose put us at ease as we discussed location options, type of service, Sam's preparation plan and the logistics of the actual bar mitzvah day. Robinson's Arch at the Davidson Centre Archeological Park in Jerusalem at 7:30 a.m. was the chosen as the place and time.

Which brings me to the big question of logistics. How would I pull off a bar mitzvah in Israel if I was physically not there? I was fortunate to be in Israel last fall and did some research on my own. I connected with an Israeli travel agency, Eshet Incoming, to assist in securing our venues, tours, tour guides, buses and hotel rooms for our guests. Having an Israeli to be your voice, eyes and ears may not be necessary, but it sure gave me peace of mind.

This didn't mean that I could just – heaven forbid – sit back and relax. I've tried my best to stay organized and on top of my schedule and needs.

Israel is still Israel, and sometimes requests are not answered immediately, but keep in mind the time difference and the more relaxed attitude that prevails there. Planning anything six months in advance is absurd to many Israelis, but they're getting better at it, and, ultimately, they want your simchah to be a success, too.

Sending regular e-mails to our guests to update them on any changes or additions to our itinerary has also helped build excitement and make everyone feel part of the adventure.

As Sam's excitement about his upcoming bar mitzvah has escalated over the past year, so has the support of family and friends from near and far.

We feel fortunate to have a group of 50 people, Jews and non-Jews, who will be attending our celebration, from Canada, the United States and Brazil. We also look forward to sharing our simchah with our Israeli family and friends.

Being in Israel is amazing in and of itself, but being able to gather in Israel for such a special time in our lives with the many people whom we love is astounding.

Kids parties need not be extravagant. Really

By SHARON DUKE ESTROFF
Special to The CJN

It was the wedding invitation that convinced me: We modern moms and dads had officially lost our gumballs regarding our children's birthday parties.

"Master Jacob Estroff" read the ivory parchment envelope.

It took a moment to register that the addressee was in fact Jakey, my five-year old, and the bride-to-be, Miss Sophia Rosenthal (not her real name), was Sophie, his toothless classmate.

The party lived up to its invitation. There were bridesmaids, groomsmen and a mini-groom. There was a wedding cake taller than the bride herself, and even a mini chupah!

Of course, we Jewish parents come by our penchant for parties honestly. I mean, we've barely cleared labour and delivery before we're expected to pull off a bris or baby naming for 200.

It's just that somewhere between the petting zoo, the pony rides and the moonwalk, we end up with an empty wallet, a giant headache and a birthday kid who is so overwhelmed by the hoopla that he can barely enjoy his big day.

Fortunately, it's perfectly possible to plan a kid-friendly birthday bash without compromising our values, sanity and pocketbook.

All it takes is a little panning for gold.

You know, when you take a big clump of mud and swoosh it around in a pan until a few glistening specks of gold are all that remain. Well, we're going to do the same thing here. Only instead of mud, we're going to swoosh a big, mushy mess of modern birthday party madness.

Are you swooshing yet? Do you see those overpriced invitations and F.A.O. Schwartz goody bags spilling over the sides of the pan into a bucket by your feet? But don't go peeking at those golden nuggets just yet. Not until we've spent some time looking at the slush in the bucket – the parental myths that have contributed to our current state of birthday affairs.

Myth #1: Our kid's birthday party is a direct reflection of our parental prowess.

We accomplish many amazing feats as parents, such as getting our kids out the door and to school every morning, and keeping them safe, healthy and happy. Our child's birthday party is but one little parenting accomplishment in a year of millions. It's hardly a manifestation of our parental savvy.

Myth #2: The only place they serve grocery store birthday cakes is in the parental hall of shame

Have you ever bought a magazine claiming to contain "fool-proof birthday party ideas," only to wonder, after a page-and-a-half who is really the fool for having bought the magazine in the first place? Not only is making tulip-shaped cupcakes not foolproof, it takes a degree from the World Culinary Institute! Besides, our kids couldn't care less if their cupcakes are shaped like tulips or toilets as long as they're yummy, icing-soaked and have just the right number of candles.

Myth #3: Good parents plan one of-a-kind parties for their children.

You know that sinking feeling you get upon learning that another kid is having a birthday gala at the same secret site you've booked for your own child's party – only a week earlier? The nerve, you think. I've had that inflatable jumpy place booked for a year and that parent just swooped in and stole the idea right out from under me. But the reality is that our kids love playing on inflatable jumpy stuff. They'd do it day in and day out if we'd let them. Hey, would you turn up your nose at an opportunity to go to a spa just because you did the same thing last weekend? I think not.

Myth #4: Paying through the nose for our children's birthday parties is our financial obligation – like paying for university.

Although we've been programmed to believe that we haven't done our child justice unless we spend megabucks on his birthday party, it's simply not true. In fact, one of my boys' all-time favourite parties was the time we went to the park and played baseball. I brought a cake, some juice, plastic bases and sunblock, and they were happy as hamantashen for the duration.

Myth #5: It's all supposed to go off without a hitch

For my niece's sixth birthday, my sister-in-law booked the highly acclaimed Marvin the Magnificent Magician, months – if not years – in advance. You could taste the excitement as the guests counted down the seconds until Marvin arrived. And then, they counted some more. And some more. Until it became painfully evident that Marvin the Magnificent Magician had taken his vanishing act to the next level. That's when the kids started to build Oreo towers. They went through package after package of double stuffs until they'd constructed a veritable chocolate cookie Camelot. And then, it was time to go home. "Thanks, that was fun," the children told my catatonic sister-in-law as they exited. Lesson learned? Despite a birthday party disaster, my niece turned six, the guests were happy and we had a family memory that would last years.

OK, we're finally ready to peek at the golden nuggets, at those few precious, glimmering, real reasons that we plan birthday parties for our children. They look something like this:

- A fun, memorable day spent with family and friends.
- A means of making them feel happy, proud and loved.
- A celebration of their development, uniqueness and existence.

To add a little twist to your shindig, turn to byPeterandPauls.com, (416-410-0677 or 905-326-2000), your one-stop-shop for events.

It offers everything from catering and entertainment to gift baskets, bridal accessories, advertising design, and video and photo services.

"We have everything," said global communications director Nelson Antunes. "We have an umbrella of services that are easily accessible and a team of individuals that can accommodate anything."

Peter and Paul's hosts weddings, bar and bat mitzvahs, corporate functions, fundraisers and other social events at three separate venues with three different styles.

Paramount, located just 15 minutes from Pearson Airport, is a trendy, spacious hall that can fit up to 1,650 guests.

Bellagio, located at 8540 Jane St., is a smaller, boutique-style venue with three European-style rooms.

- ☐ Fully Kosher Facility
- ☐ Separate Kosher Kitchen Available
- ☑ Kosher Event Catering Available
- ☑ Capacity up to 100 People
- ☑ 100-300 Person Capacity
- ☑ Over 300 Person Capacity
- ☑ Wheelchair Accessible

"Bellagio is more of an intimate setting. It's private and exclusive," Antunes said.

The Manor, Paul and Peter's third location, is set in the middle of the Carrying Place Golf and Country Club's lush green lawns. Overlooking a lake, it is the perfect setting for an outdoor or indoor wedding.

ByPeterandPauls.com has been around for 26 years. In that time, it has expanded its catering services to include a wide range of national and international menus, including kosher meals.

"The caterers are open to every ethnic community. Indian, Asian, Jewish – we do it all here," Antunes said.

Peter and Paul's has also been actively giving back to the community. They host an annual golf tournament for the Hospital for Sick Children and have raised more than $780,000 so far for Sick Kids.

The company is also going green this summer with plans to have its own Earth Day this June to help clean up the community.

"Everyone's an apple, we're an orange," Antunes said. "We're very unique, we go over and above."

The Paramount is located just 15 minutes from Pearson International.

Liberty Grand is a popular venue for upscale events

By ASHLEY SPEGEL
Special to The CJN

For a venue that makes a regal impression, consider the lavish Liberty Grand Entertainment Complex for your simchah.

Erected in 1926, the historic 100,000-square-foot estate has been playing host to a wide array of events for more than 10 years. At the lakefront in downtown Toronto, the Liberty Grand exudes magnificence and luxury. It's become a popular location for upscale events and functions.

- ☐ Fully Kosher Facility
- ☐ Separate Kosher Kitchen Available
- ☑ Kosher Event Catering Available
- ☑ Capacity up to 100 People
- ☑ 100-300 Person Capacity
- ☑ Over 300 Person Capacity
- ☑ Wheelchair Accessible

The Liberty Grand (www.libertygrand.com or 416-542-3789) encompasses three spectacular banquet rooms, one transformable, multi-faceted space and a beautiful courtyard. The complex meets all interior standards on account of its various looks, including a classic ambience with sparkling chandeliers and stately ceilings, and a contemporary space with flashy lighting and sound capabilities.

When booking your event, the Liberty Grand offers a complimentary events coordinator who will hold your hand every step of the way to help you arrange the perfect décor, menu and lighting for your wedding, bar or bat mitzvah, anniversary or other function. Although the Liberty Grand doesn't have a kosher kitchen, the venue does accommodate those who require a kosher menu or specific diet.

Liberty Grand exudes magnificence.

"All our catering is done in-house with the exception of kosher catering, but clients are permitted to bring in outside kosher caterers for their occasion," says Robert Rosset, director of sales and catering for the Liberty Grand. "However, we do offer kosher catering where the food is prepared at an off-premise catering company."

There's no event too small or too large for the Liberty Grand, which is wheelchair accessible and can accommodate parties from 100 guests to 3,000. Its staff are committed to delivering high-quality service and hospitality for every occasion.

Flexibility is key with every decision made for your party, and the Liberty Grand will bend over backward to ensure all your desires – which can change frequently – are sufficiently met.

"Our facilities are built for multi-use and function, and they're not restrictive in how people can use the building," says Rosset. "We have a lot of room for great growth potential, and if events start off small, there's enough space to expand and grow larger."

The Artifacts Room is often used for bar or bat mitzvahs because it's easily transformable and holds sufficient amenities for projecting acute audio and lighting. The room has successfully hosted parties for the 2001 Toronto International Film Festival, Toronto Fashion Week's Fall/Winter 2001 and Spring/Summer 2002 and the Leaf Fund Annual Casino Night Fundraisers.

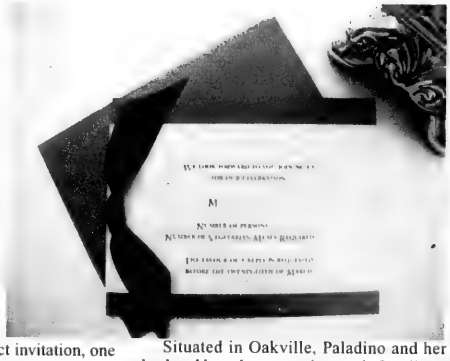
Invitations get simchahs off to a great start

By ASHLEY SPEGEL
Special to The CJN



Your guests would be lost without those custom invitations you sent out in the mail months before your celebration, and you can find the perfect card that reflects your occasion at Design Oriented, a Thornhill-based business that specializes in full-colour, custom-designed invitations.

For more than 20 years, Felice and Steven Waldman have been working with clients to achieve the perfect invitation, one that incorporates and crystallizes the theme or colour scheme of clients' simchahs.

"If someone has a specific flower they're using at their party, or they want polka dots, plaids or other colour choices, we can design something more appropriate for that event," Felice says.

"We have approximately 20 standard designs, and then the client can choose one and make a variation of them. It's custom designing an invitation for their needs."

Nothing gets partygoers more excited than an eye-catching invitation that foreshadows the memorable night ahead, and Design Oriented encourages clients to sit down and share ideas and concepts in order to create the perfect invitation artwork and layout.

"[Designing an invitation] is a great way to start [planning an affair], because it's the first thing clients receive for the event, and they can customise their occasion right from the beginning," Felice says.

Laura Paladino is also a wonderful choice when considering custom place settings, menus, invitations and event programs for your special day.

Situated in Oakville, Paladino and her husband have been creating cards for clients in Canada and the United States from their art studio since 2001.

Paladino, a former interior designer, is proud that her cards are original and adventurous, and she pushes clients to step outside the box to craft something that will stand out.

"When clients come out with original pieces, it really makes a difference for guests when they see the invitation, and it says a lot about the occasion," she says.

It seems impossible to find enough time in the day to do everything for your upcoming event, and Paladino takes that into consideration with an easy-to-navigate website that showcases invitation templates and designs. Clients can save time by ordering samples, find pricing information and getting ideas from the website.

Paladino emphasizes that her business is very client-oriented from start to finish, whether you're ordering online or in person.

"We always ask for as much information about the event and the client's personal style when starting out. Then we sit down and go through different samples of cards, ribbon samples and any other materials that they might need, and we take it from there," she says.

"The client is very involved from start to finish, and we go back and forth through e-mail with PDF files to makes sure the client is happy."

For more information on Design Oriented, call 905-764-0772 or visit its new website at www.designoriented.ca. To contact Laura Paladino, go to www.laurapaladino.com, or call 905-469-9520 or 1-866-265-0633. Samples on this page by Laura Paladino.

Strategies for dealing with difficult relatives

By TOBY KLEIN GREENWALD
Special to The CJN

Once there was a bride who was upset because her sister-in-law didn't congratulate her at her wedding. When she confronted her on the issue, the sister-in-law said, "Really? I didn't even notice."

Not an auspicious beginning, and the bitterness remained in the bride's heart for decades.

There are three kinds of difficult relatives, or difficult situations, that one may encounter when preparing for a wedding.

The first is a relative who makes unreasonable demands or who interferes in other unwelcome ways.

The second kind of difficult relative may exist as a result of divorce or remarriage.

The third is a difficult in-law situation.

Accepting a new member of the family, or becoming one, can be wonderful, or it can be as difficult as grafting a cactus shoot onto a water lily. Both sides have to be open-minded, open-hearted and (when feasible) open-fisted in order for the transition to go smoothly. At the very least, one has to choose her battles.

Rule one: Be firm but always polite. Always.

Remember the wise words of author and Presbyterian minister, Carl Buechner, "They may forget what you said, but they will never forget how you made them feel." When you've made a decision that you know someone won't like, tell them about it graciously. Disarm them with your kindness.

Rule two: Know thyself. Be aware of your own sensitivities.

Don't do something just to make someone else happy if it will make you miserable. If you detest pink with all your heart, don't agree to that colour scheme because your grandmother loves it. Buy her a pink corsage to wear at the wedding. Present it with a giant hug and kiss.

Rule Three: Keep your eye on the ball. Remember what's important.

No one will remember (or care) how many varieties of olives you served or whether the napkins were cream-coloured or white. What your guests will remember from your wedding is that there was joy between the couple and among the guests. If they choose to remember something less important, remind yourself (as often as necessary) that the flaw is with them, not you.

Difficult People: Close to Home

If your mom or dad don't want to take out a third mortgage on the house to pay for your wedding, they're not being difficult. They're being sane. The "work" you have to do is not on their willingness to part with their money, but on your own expectations.

Or the opposite could be true: the bride and groom want a small affair, and their parents feel that they "owe" invitations to many more guests. Suggest that your parents have an elegant, by-invitation-only kiddush or a sheva brachah meal to which they invite those extra guests, writing on the invitation, "The young couple has asked for a small wedding, but you are dear to our hearts and we'd like you to join us at…"

Leah Shifrin Averick, an expert on family and in-law relations, puts the question succinctly in her book, Don't Call me Mom. She writes, "But if you turn to parents for financial assistance, be prepared to compromise some of your wishes." In her suggestions to the parents, she writes: "Remember that it is your child's and future adult child-in-law's marriage celebration, as well as yours… Also, do not forget to consider the wishes and needs of the other set of parents."

What about your rebellious siblings, who want to come in torn jeans or in a tight, short strapless dress (to a religious wedding)? Or the vegetarian cousin? Or your aunt, a mediocre flower arranger who will feel hurt forever if you don't employ her?

Grit your teeth about your siblings – remember they are no reflection on you – and have a stock of attractive shawls available. Order takeout for the veggie. Let your aunt prepare Grandma's pink corsage.

Difficult People: Divorce or Other Sticky Issues

If a bride's and/or groom's parents had an ugly divorce, who will walk the bride and groom to the chupah? In Israel, and in chassidic circles, this is often solved by following the old Jerusalem custom of the mothers escorting the bride and the fathers escorting the groom.

What if the bride or groom suffered emotional or physical abuse at the hands of one of the parents, or abandonment? To what extent does a child "owe" a wedding invitation to such a father or mother if they come out of the woodwork for the wedding?

The ultimate decision should be his or her own, but the decision should be made in advance. No one should be expected to relive pain on their wedding day, but allowing the unwanted parent to show up and embarrass the bride or groom at the event is classless and cruel.

Go out of your way to treat step-parents and step-siblings with extra affection and attention. Include them in the planning stage, and remember to introduce them around at the wedding.

Difficult People: How to Keep In-Laws from Becoming Out-Laws

Averick says in an e-mail interview, "As much as some things change, some things never do, especially under the in-law sun… [There is] a Tunisian folk saying: 'I wish my daughter-in-law the heat of the summer sun and I wish my daughter the heat of the winter sun.'"

Break the chain. Visualize your new in-laws as your own. Be kind to all. Think out of the box. Keep your focus on what it important and get on with your life with your loving spouse.

Ayurvedic Centre's treatments heal 'body, mind and soul'

Spa Life

By KATHRYN KATES

Begum Teja realized her dream by opening up Elemental Embrace Wellness Spa Retreat in Brighton, Ont., 5½ years ago.

It is by no means a luxury spa. Instead the 20,000-square-foot Northumberland County Ayurvedic Centre, built on 30 acres, is a comfortable, simply designed retreat that caters to healing and wellness under den mother Teja, along with her friendly staff.

The Ugandan-born owner is a hands-on spa director; she's also an esthetician, Ayurvedic practitioner, colonic therapist and reiki master.

"We are an Ayurvedic place but in a western atmosphere – east and west meet here. Ayurveda, from India, is 5,000 years old. It is about healing of body, mind and soul. Our main packages are for detox and distress," says Teja.

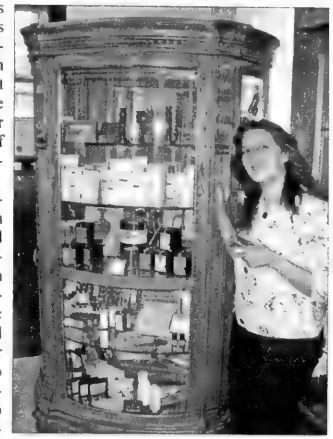
Packages from one day up to a week can be arranged. One-day packages include an Ayurvedic treatment and a spa treatment. The intense seven-day program includes consultation based on four different Ayurvedic treatments. All packages include use of the facilities, a morning yoga/meditation class and three healthy meals with both eastern and western culinary influences, and accommodation, sans TVs, in one of the 14 tastefully designed rooms, all with firm, corn-husk pillows and beds with foam mattresses.

Most of Elemental Embrace's clients come from the United States because Americans are more familiar with Ayurvedic treatments than Canadians, Teja says. Thirty per cent of the spa clientele are men, with that number growing because of their wives' recommendations.

There are 14 therapists, 11 of whom work full time. All treatments are personalized to suit each person. The staff includes an Ayurvedic Vaidyas, a medical and Ayurvedic doctor licensed in India who consults and administers treatments. Guests are made to feel welcome and relaxed – treatments are not hurried and if they run late, so be it.

Treatments include the Saarasota – a signature spa treatment that includes a herbal steam in a cabinet; aroma massage; a herbal wrap; mini facial; hotstone foot massage; and scalp massage. For those comfortable enough to try it, Elemental Embrace offers Colon Hydrotherapy using state-of-the-art safe equipment.

Ayurvedic treatments on offer include an Ayurvedic Vaidya Consultation, to determine your body constitution and current state, and allow the practitioner to suggest changes to diet, exercise and lifestyle. Nasya is a treatment in which oil or powder is placed into the nose, followed by a massage around the nose and chest. Teja says this is good for headaches, sinusitis, migraines, hormonal issues and physiological problems.



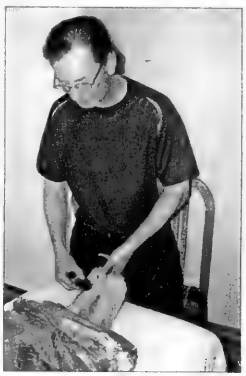
Begum Teja, Elemental Embrace owner.

A Shirodhara herbal oil treatment.

Shirodhara is administered by two therapists using four hands to fully massage the body in harmony, on a carved wood table. Then a warm stream of herbal oil is poured onto the forehead – over what is referred to as the "third eye." The sensation is very relaxing. The treatment ends in the steam cabinet, which helps to further absorb the herbs.

There are seven treatment rooms, a sauna, steam rooms, an indoor pool and a gym.

"We've tried to make the treatment rooms all look different," Teja says. "The Weightless Room has murals of the sky that make you feel like you're floating, the Grotto Room makes you feel like you are going down into a cave, and the peach-coloured Colonic Room has sayings on the wall that people who are anxious when they come in can read to calm themselves. The Aqua Bearer Room has an Egyptian feel – it is where we do our mud wraps. The Tips and Toes Room is designed with a Spanish feel.



The Saarasota

"Outside we have a reflective circle – it is a guided meditation. You go in with a concern, and you are guided through your issue. There is also a labyrinth, which is a meditative walk," she says.

For western services such as facials and body treatments the French product line Dr. Renaud is used. For all Ayurvedic services, oil- and herbal-based mixtures are administered. They are retailed for home care.

There are two golf courses nearby, and packages can be arranged to include golf.

Feel like a guest at your own function

By AMY SOBERANO
Special to The CJN

"A party planner is there to make you a guest at your own function," says party planner Heidi Gruenspan (905-738-5030). "We're there to absorb as much as we can from the client and to make sure everything comes to fruition."

Karen Garscadden, co-event director of Up and Coming Events (416-665-6100) along with Karen Jacobs, emphasizes the importance of personalized service in ensuring that each event is reflective of the people involved: "Every party has its own unique personality."

Pictures on this page supplied by Up and Coming Events

She refers to herself and her staff as "party architects" who are equipped to reduce the emotional and financial pressure felt by their clients by offering experience, resources and a strong network of professionals.

"We take the clients' message and transform it into an event," Garscadden says.

Both women stress the need to establish a comfortable and trusting relationship between the client and the party planner to ensure the success of the function.

"We're there to create a relationship so that when anyone needs something, they're comfortable with asking," Gruenspan says.

Referring to the ways party planners can help with your celebration, Gruenspan identifies peace of mind as the greatest gift they have to offer. "We're insurance," she says.

Additionally, Garscadden highlights perspective and extensive knowledge as two features that make a party planner a necessity. Detached from family dynamics and emotional involvement, they can step back and observe the situation more objectively.

"We plan events every weekend of the year. Our resources are broader and we can bring new creative ideas."

Garscadden points to the growing demand for uniqueness in parties, while people still want to maintain the conventional elements that tie all functions together. "People may think there's just one way of doing a party, but now more than ever, there is no such thing as a traditional party," she says.

In venues ranging from ballrooms to bowling alleys, banquet halls to stables or campgrounds, party planners are invaluable in bringing a vision to fruition without losing sight of the warmth and meaning of the celebration. From start to finish, the client receives expert support and advice in bringing each detail together as part of a united, unfragmented whole.

"Most of my clients would attest to the fact that, in the end, it's the best money they ever spent. There is lots of worrying without a planner," says Gruenspan of the work she and her associate Lisa Schneider do.

Clients generally contact a party planner as soon as they have established a date for their celebration, sometimes sooner if they wish to inquire about possible venues. This usually ranges from six months to three years before the simchah.

Initially, the party planner asks a lot of questions in order to get a feel for the clients' vision of the event, as well as to ensure that all logistical details are taken into consideration, such as whether the date falls on a lesser-known holiday. After assessing the pros and cons of the clients' choices, the party planner will build on that foundation, adding creative touches and smoothing out the details, Garscadden says.

Gruenspan highlights the party planner's responsibility to be alert and ready to deal with unforeseen circumstances. She herself has experienced everything from bomb threats to fires while on the job.

Garscadden echoes the sentiment, recalling a time when she and her staff managed to relocate an entire wedding with hardly a hitch after the synagogue reported no heat or hydro on the day of the simchah, as the couple posed for photos in the bride's home.

In today's technological society, the Internet has begun to make event planning a do-it-yourself process. However, while the web does provide important information, it lacks the expertise of someone who has been in the business for years and has established contacts in all areas of the industry.

Both Garscadden and Gruenspan cite personal recommendations as the most valuable method of selecting a party planner. They caution against arbitrarily choosing someone from the Yellow Pages, and stress the importance of having clients' trust and making them feel comfortable.

"We take the 'oy' out of joy!" Garscadden says.

Use party planner's expertise and experience

By RITA POLIAKOV
CJN Intern

From catering catastrophes to entertainment emergencies, planning an event can be a stressful endeavour, so why not leave it to the pros?

At Mint Lifestyle Events (416-923-6468, www.mintevents.com), they'll take care of everything for you.

"It's a one-stop shop," said Noah Cappe, one of the Mint co-owners. "We don't just do the entertainment and graphic work, we do invites, place cards, security and even valet service."

Cappe started Mint three years ago with his partners, Jared Florence and Jordan Fogle.

Cappe said it's their experience that keeps them ahead of the competition.

"We've been doing this for 10 years, we've worked on both sides of the fence and we really understand the dynamic of how it works," he said.

The three owners started out as DJs and worked their way up.

"We've done everything from MC-ing and managing to part-ownership. We've experienced every element. We pounded the pavement, did the right work, and we understand what goes into an event," he said.

Mint Events stands out for its incredible attention to detail and its personable staff. Cappe encourages each client to meet with his staff face to face, in order to understand exactly what they're looking for.

Mint Lifestyle Events makes the guests feel like they're in the spotlight.

"We make the guests feel like they're in the spotlight by listening to them," Cappe said. "We want to give everyone an opportunity to meet each other. Every guest is different and every event is different – $2,000 parties are just as important as $20,000 parties."

The key to each event, he said, is to make it about the customer, especially when dealing with younger clients.

"We make it a point to make the kid the star of the party. It's not about us, it's about the guest of honour. We build the event around them. We're there as a really good backup, but we don't come out with giant banners and signs," he said.

Mint's events are known for their originality and commitment to a theme. Whether it's a corporate event or a bat mitzvah, Mint will stay true to the theme from beginning to end with the help of its in-house creative department. During one video game-themed party, Mint created actual, playable video games as invitations.

"We made the guests part of the experience, that's what we try to do. There are no pre-made, cookie-cutter options. We're creative, we spend as much time as we can learning about the event," Cappe said.

The success of any party depends on the staff. At Mint, Cappe is very careful when hiring.

"Employees are hired based on personality and experience, not degrees. In this business, personality goes a long way. You need to be outgoing, warm and entertaining. We hire people who understand what we do," he said.

In order to keep Mint in the spotlight, Cappe and his colleagues are active nation-wide. This summer, they'll be launching a tour across Ontario.

"We give back to the community. We donate our services by throwing parties and camp socials," Cappe said. "I go to events and the kids know me."

While Mint is based in Toronto, the company has hosted events in Los Angeles and across Canada.

Cappe gives a simple reason for choosing Mint events: "There's nobody who does what we do," he said. "I worked with four different companies, big and small. We're the best."

Entertainers dazzle, mystify, and make 'em laugh

By SHLOMIT KRIGER
Special to The CJN

It's not every day that people find themselves leaving a party scratching their heads wondering how someone could have read their minds and unable to wipe a childish smirk off their faces. If you want to ensure that your guests are dazzled, mystified, and laughing until it hurts, Swaye Entertainment (416-545-0741 or www.swayeentertainment.com) has got the entertainment you crave.

Founded in Toronto in 1996 by its president and award-winning magician, Adam Swaye, Swaye Entertainment provides premier entertainment at a large variety of events, including house parties, conventions, sports games, trade shows, casinos, bar and bat mitzvahs, and store openings.

The company has worked with more than 100 entertainers. Some of its headliners include comedian Mike Bullard, award-winning impersonator Andre Phillip Gagnon, professional hypnotist Mike Mandel, and the human statue, robotic moving Silver Elvis.

Swaye has become very popular since he began performing magic at age 13.

He "fell in love with magic" at age 12, following a trip with his family that led him to learn some circus tricks and juggling, he said.

Soon after the trip, he went to a magic store and began taking lessons with a magician he met. A while later, another local magician, Gordon Precious, mentored him and helped him get into the field.

Swaye continued performing throughout his time at university and then later when he opened his company. He has performed for Fortune 500 companies, Ontario premiers and national sports fans.

About 10 years ago, the Hamilton Magic Association awarded Swaye the Scott Lang Award for best close-up magician of the year. (Close-up magic is performed for small groups of people who are standing or sitting nearby.)

Swaye said that his company's entertainers usually work while everyone else is playing.

"Sometimes there are last-minute bookings for events," he explained. "While most people are out with friends or family on weekends and holidays, we're usually working."

Adam Swaye holds all the aces

The entertainers spend the day working on the business side of their jobs and perform at various events at night. While Swaye is fortunate to be able to make a full-time living as a magician, some entertainers do have day jobs.

Still, following their passions keeps them motivated.

"I get to play where people want to be," said Swaye. "It's a fun atmosphere, and I get to make people laugh.

"It's one of those dream jobs that allows you to do what you love, you don't work a day in your life."

Swaye Entertainment also provides catering of some special foods, such as cotton candy, as well as a large variety of inflatable games, from backyard bouncers to those that are 15 feet high.

While most of Swaye Entertainment's clients have been in the Greater Toronto Area, the company has also provided performers and other forms of entertainment across Canada and the United States.

Last year, performers entertained crowds at the FIFA Under-20 World Cup and the Toronto FC games.

Those who have always dreamed of astounding audiences with diverse tricks and leaving them begging for more can take magic lessons, which the company offers for people of all ages. People hire magicians to teach them tricks at their homes, and corporations bring them in to help employees practise team building.

Swaye Entertainment works with party planners and DJs, and will customize an event package to suit your specific needs and budget.

With his background – more than 15 years of experience performing at various events and booking entertainers – Swaye can recommend entertainers who are best suited for your event.

Flexible gift-giving options from Mirvish Productions

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to the CJN

"...So long, farewell...," The Sound of Music launches the new season in October.

"People have become consumer-product fatigued," says Mirvish Productions director of communications John Karastamatis, given that most of today's biggest gift items will be obsolete in a year or two.

Instead, he says, "people are looking to give experiences for special occasions," from birthdays to anniversaries, graduations and more. "High on that list are cultural ones [experiences] – theatre tickets are very, very popular as gifts."

Mirvish has made giving the gift of theatre more flexible than ever: you're not just handing over a pair of tickets that may be hard to exchange for another date, or you find it's impossible to change seats or switch productions, Karastamatis says.

With gift certificates in any denomination, there are no more wrong guesses when gift-giving. "A lot of people buy a round number, or ask what the equivalent of two tickets to this show would cost." Gift certificates can be used for any Mirvish production, so if they're not Hairspray folks, maybe they'll enjoy this fall's by-popular-demand return of Spamalot.

For a more meaningful gift, season subscriptions are available from $90. The upcoming season is about as diverse as any in Mirvish history. "This is for someone who really has a passion about the performing arts," Karastamatis says.

The new season launches in October with a sensational new production of The Sound of Music, co-produced by Andrew Lloyd Weber. "He's always wanted to produce The Sound of Music," says Karastamatis. "It was the very first musical he saw on opening night in London when he was a child."

Typically, the role of Maria is played by an older, established actress, but, seeking a talented unknown, Weber will cast someone much younger, selected by Canadians from among 10 finalists on this summer's CBC reality series How Do You Solve a Problem Like Maria? Mirvish subscribers will be among the first to see her on stage in the role.

The eclectic season continues with glittering offerings such as A Chorus Line, The Color Purple (produced by Oprah Winfrey), Seana McKenna's captivating take on the ancient role of Medea and the edgy, passionate musical Spring Awakening.

"We like to have seasons that give you a sense of the entire range of theatrical shows," Karastamatis says. "Our subscription gives you a survey of what's happening in world theatre at this moment... we choose from...the best productions available around the world."

In June, the season that began with Weber as producer will close on a high note with Weber as composer – and the world première of a funny, heartbreaking new musical, The Boys in the Photograph, a tale of young love set against Ireland of the late 1960s. "It's quite exciting for us," says Karastamatis. "Subscribers will be the first to see it."

A Mirvish gift-pack has something for everyone.

When purchasing a subscription as a gift, you choose the section and day of the performances. The recipient is then free to choose seats within that section and schedule shows for the most convenient date. They can also share the tickets or pass them along – many families, companies and groups "pool" multiple subscriptions – but Karastamatis doubts they'll want to pass up on any of the 2008-09 offerings.

Other Mirvish productions are of special note when thinking about gift-giving include shows such as We Will Rock You and Dirty Dancing, "a story that has broad, broad appeal."

It's not even too early to think about Chanukah gifts: December's limited run of the new musical Chitty Chitty Bang Bang is already half sold out. "It will appeal to a lot of people," Karastamatis says of the timeless classic, with its flying car. "Many adults grew up with the story, and now they're looking for an opportunity to introduce it to their children and grandchildren."

Karastamatis recommends checking online (www.mirvish.com) for updates and to find out about new Mirvish productions. "We always have two or three shows playing at once," he says. And because gift certificates never expire, you can be sure recipients will find something to enjoy. "There's no shortage of shows to choose from."

More than flowers, you'll get flair to remember

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to the CJN

"We don't just drop off the flowers and leave," says Renee Birnbaum of An Affair to Remember. "There's a designer there with them for the day… we're there."

For Birnbaum, "there" means every step of the up-to-six-month journey to the wedding – or birthday party, anniversary, bar mitzvah or gala – of your dreams. "Once they're booked, they can come in as many times as they want."

Whether it's a total change of heart – "I had a bride change her entire colour scheme two weeks before the wedding" – or just discussing the limitless possibilities, Birnbaum goes the extra mile, sometimes literally: "We're happy to take a sample to the venue, bring the linen, bring the centrepiece, table settings."

And once a client has decided on what they want, what they've seen is exactly what they get.

Birnbaum or an associate takes a picture of all samples and puts it in their file. They then show up on the day of the event with exactly what the client has ordered.

"That's why you're hiring a professional," she says. "You should be able to relax."

Birnbaum has seen a lot of change in event décor since she started An Affair to Remember almost 20 years ago.

Today, while theme parties are still popular, she says it's more about the "look of the room" rather than strictly adhering to a theme at all costs.

Flowers add to the 'look of the room,' says Renee Birnbaum of An Affair to Remember.

Today's look definitely involves colour, such as bold jeweltones or bright primary colours for boys. "Greens are very hot now, along with burgundies and dark reds."

Even for weddings, where white is still the focus, elements of green or purple are creeping in, along with the unexpected flower shapes of hydrangeas and orchids.

Traditional elements such as centrepieces incorporate contemporary colours in thrilling new ways, like the refreshing cool lime-green blast of a spider mum or the fanfare of a purple dendrobium orchid. Beyond flowers, other elements are creeping into the spotlight – grass and twined wires add height and drama to even the simplest arrangement of girlie-pink gerbera daisies.

There's even a touch of high tech, Birnbaum says, with LED-lighted vases that glowingly accentuate lush displays of twigs, moss, crystals and candelabras, or a smaller-scale, sleeker modern arrangement.

"I own all my own pieces," says Birnbaum. That means from vases to chupahs, candles to drapery, An Affair to Remember can supply everything you need to get the look of your event just right.

If she doesn't have it? "I have designers and I have people to build things for me," she says. "We have a warehouse studio with a full floral fridge… if we don't have something, we work with rental companies and lighting companies. We can provide to the client anything that we need."

Birnbaum "doesn't only deliver a product," says Jackie Shaw, who, as director of operations and development for the Starlight Starbright Children's Foundation, has worked with An Affair to Remember on five galas. "She becomes part of an event."

For last year's gala, Birnbaum transformed the Liberty Grand with a Caribbean "great escapes" theme, including sun umbrellas made of orchids and an airline check-in counter in the lobby.

Vision doesn't have to be compromised by budget, either, Birnbaum says. "People call up and ask, 'What's your starting price?'… I don't have one."

Clients have to be realistic about their budget, but at either end of the scale, the event will still be beautiful. "They don't have to break the bank."

For a smaller wedding, Birnbaum might focus on the backdrop and bridal table instead of centrepieces – creating focal points for a sensational look. "I stand by the value… and the service that we give them."

Whether it's a fundraising luncheon, family event or gala, Birnbaum calls herself "a stickler" – not only for the large-scale elements but also the tiny, often neglected touches – "the processing of the flowers, making sure everything goes out finished, the detail is done, bouquets are wrapped properly… everything's finished properly."

The most satisfying calls are the ones Birnbaum gets the day after an event from people who saw the flowers, loved her work and want to book her for their event.

"That's the best referral."

Upscale resale gives you luxe for less

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to the CJN

Customers browsing through Deja Vu, Theresa Lobraico's upscale Markham clothing, store sometimes ask why there are dry-cleaning tags on many of the clothes.

That's their first realization that they're in a resale shop.

"I take that as a compliment," Lobraico says.

For anyone who associates resale clothing and consignment shops with dowdy dresses, clunky therapeutic shoes and the smell of mothballs, Deja Vu (www.dejavuboutique.ca, 905-472-9566; consignment by appointment only) offers luxe for less.

And why not? Why pay $300 to $450 for a pair of Cambio jeans when Deja Vu carries previously owned pairs for around $100?

At the more formal end of the spectrum are tremendous savings on evening wear, such as an elegant Vera Wang gown that retails for more than $1,000 while Deja Vu's price is $400. A $1,200 Hugo Boss suit might resell for $350, and accessories such as Coach and Fendi bags all come with similarly streamlined price tags. Other brands might include Versace, Votre Nom and Hilary Radley.

Deja Vu also carries a selection of new and sample merchandise from Frank Usher, Dusk and more.

What you won't find on the well-stocked racks at Deja Vu are mainstream brands available at any retail or resale shop.

"Every woman has clothes in her closet already," says Lobraico, who also offers in-home wardrobe and style consulting. "What she wants is something spectacular that you're not going to see everywhere else."

"I want wow," says client Lee, who drives in often from Pickering with her mother, Marian. "Anything you've seen in Vogue, you're going to see here."

That's especially important if you're a hostess looking for evening wear.

"The event is going to cost a fortune," but clothes don't have to, Lobraico says.

And even if you're just a guest, "you're going to look great, and no one has to know [it's resale] if you don't want them to."

With 15 years' experience, Lobraico only accepts for consignment "those pieces I feel I have a market for."

Her basic conditions are that clothing and accessories be current "within two years," of designer quality, and impeccably dry cleaned in like-new condition.

Whether in clients' homes or in the store, Lobraico is proud of her honesty, something girlfriends might not offer for fear of hurt feelings.

She deals it out gently and with a sense of humour.

"Customers thank me," she says.

It's not about putting them down, but rather steering them to clothes that look great.

"If it's not flattering, I'd just say 'Let's find something else.'"

Often, clients want more than clothes – they're looking to change their whole style.

Whether going through a life change, moving or downsizing, they want a style that will better reflect their personality.

"Fashion is trendy. Style is timeless," says Lobraico. "Style is your own personal signature."

You don't have to go broke to purchase an upscale designer gown.

Lobraico actually speaks at a women's shelter about image and how clothes can empower women.

"It's almost like dressing from the inside out."

She has also led government seminars on dressing for job interviews and in the workplace, and for self esteem.

As a single mother of three who launched her own business, she believes with a passion in what she does and offers far more than just a business transaction.

She's in touch regularly with an e-mail list of about 450 regular clients and will occasionally even e-mail them about a "surprise sale" with just a couple of days' notice.

Lobraico will also call one of her regulars if something comes in that she feels they'd love.

"It's like having a personal shopper," she says.

From casual to black-tie, from bar mitzvahs to galas, whether you're hosting or just enjoying the event, Deja Vu is sure to have the perfect outfit in a full range of current styles.

"They don't have to know I paid a fraction of the cost," because the end result is exactly the same, Lobraico says.

"People say, 'Wow! That's a great outfit.'"

Only your wallet will know the difference.

Simchah package includes a Broadway-quality play

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

There was much fanfare at the Toronto Centre for the Arts when Dancap Productions (416-644-3665; www.dancapticketts.com) announced its theatrical lineup for 2009 with a live musical send-off.

Dancap, the entertainment company founded by Aubrey Dan in 2007, is known for staging Broadway-quality productions.

The pre-Broadway production of Happy Days, A New Musical, which was co-written by songwriter Paul Williams and Garry Marshall, creator of the original 1970s television show, will kick off Dancap's 2009 series in February.

Anne of Green Gables, The Musical, a co-production with the Charlottetown Festival, debuts in May and Dr. Seuss' How the Grinch that Stole Christmas! The Musical, an all-Canadian production, runs from November through to January 2010. (Venues for the shows are not yet finalized.)

'It's family- friendly entertainment for all ages'

Cast members from all three productions were flown in from Charlottetown, Los Angeles and New York to perform. Also on hand were Williams of Happy Days and Canadian icon Don Harron, co-writer of the Anne of Green Gables musical.

Reporters were also treated to a smorgasbord of hors d'oeuvres prepared by Dancap Catering chef Kyle Hepburn. The food and drink were themed to symbolized the different productions. The Happy Days fare included mini burgers and shots of root-beer floats, while the smoked salmon blinis and raspberry cordials, and roast beef sandwiches represented Anne of Green Gables and The Grinch respectively.

"We wanted to give people a taste of what the season would be like, Dan told The CJN. "It's family-friendly entertainment for all ages."

This year is the 100th anniversary of the publication of the Canadian classic, Anne of Green Gables, he said. "We're bringing a piece of Charlottetown to Toronto."

Dancap tickets can include meals

The production is a good educational tool and so the company will be partnering with schools to give students exposure "to this real Canadian treasure."

He pointed to The Grinch as another production with multi-generational appeal, noting that many people can relate to the grinch character because being an outsider is a universal feeling. "It's a heart-warming show. With the multi-ethnic diversity of Toronto, everyone feels like the grinch sometimes."

Tickets are still available for the 2008 season, which resumes with Jersey Boys playing at the Elgin Theatre in July and Avenue Q opening at the Toronto Centre for the Arts the last week of August.

Dancap is also offering a new type of dinner theatre for shows at the Toronto Centre for the Arts (5040 Yonge St.). People can order a meal created by Dancap catering, when they purchase their theatre tickets.

The new catering package began with the May production of My Fair Lady, and it will be available for the run of Jersey Boys.

"We can seat 100 people downstairs and another 100 people upstairs. A three-course meal during the week will cost you $30, including coffee," Dan said.

Three-course meal for just $30

"We make it so easy. When you book your ticket, you can book your prix fixe meal. It's a seamless process.

"People can park and go for dinner. This is a very unusual convenience. What people want is convenience. It takes dinner theatre to a whole new level. It's unique in Toronto."

He said the meal packages are ideal for fundraisers and corporate events as well as birthday and anniversary gifts.

"You're giving a night out as a gift. Dancap gift certificates are great for Mother's Day and Father's Day.

He suggested that the theatre venue may also fit the needs of people who want a different kind of simchah or celebration.

"My niece is having her bat mitzvah party here instead of a more traditional venue. Some kids don't want to have these traditional parties."

The setting would also suit a more intimate party, however, people could opt to have a pre-show experience and later, a post-show party, he said.

"Our whole focus is catering to the customer. We make the ordinary extraordinary."

About Life

Dear Ella,

My husband Mike and I threw a black-tie event to renew our vows. We invited all of our friends, and it was truly like a second wedding.

At our age, we have a number of friends who are no longer with their spouses. One such couple are Warren and Pam, who have recently gone through a divorce. My husband golfs with Warren regularly, and I never lost touch with his ex-wife Pam. They were both invited, and we sat them at separate tables. They were both invited alone, but at the last minute, Pam asked us if she could bring a date. Although we were a little uncomfortable for Warren's sake, we decided that they're adults and it was not our place to refuse. Mike, however, did call Warren to let him know and offer him the option to bring a date, too. He declined.

You could have knocked me over with a feather when Pam waltzed into the hall in a skin-tight, sequined, black strapless ball gown with a drop-dead gorgeous younger man on her arm. Heads turned. I hadn't seen her for a while, and it was clear she'd had lots of work done. The two of them danced the night away as they gazed into each others' eyes. They were one of the last couples to leave.

It wasn't until later in the week that we found out her date was a paid escort! I could not believe what I was hearing. I am so angry with her that I haven't had the guts to call her to tell her how I feel. I feel like she made a complete mockery of what was supposed to be a very special occasion for Mike and me. What do you think of this prank?

She's Got Nerve

Dear She's Got Nerve

Let's not lose sight of what this whole evening was about. It was about you and Mike renewing your vows, and nothing should spoil that for you.

Now let's move on to Pam. When a person goes through a life-altering event such as a divorce, it's not uncommon for that individual to take stock of their life. Often they will do something out of character, such as go back to school, take a big trip or work on their appearance.

It sounds to me like this is exactly what Pam did. She took control of the way she looks and the way she wants others to look at her. This really is not your problem. Perhaps she should not have used your simchah for her "coming out," but she decided that she would take an uncomfortable situation and turn it around. For Pam, that meant hiring a date so she would not have to walk into your simchah alone. There's no question that she wanted heads to turn.

She did ask your permission to bring a date, and you agreed. Technically, she followed proper protocol. Would you have felt better if she looked a little more like she did in the past and brought someone she met through a dating service?

Please don't let the actions of one of your guests put a damper on what sounds like a very special evening that you and Mike shared.

A few years from now, it will just be something you add to the rest of your memories of what was a truly lovely and special occasion for you and your husband.

IsraAID provides relief in Burma

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The presence of Israeli relief teams is still being felt in Burma, as IsraAID recently dispatched a third team of medical and relief professionals to offer aid to the victims of the May 3 cyclone.

Cyclone Nargis devastated the Delta region of Myanmar, formerly known as Burma. It killed some 78,000 to 130,000 people and left hundreds of thousands vulnerable to disease and starvation.

This prompted the Israel Forum for International Humanitarian Aid (IsraAID) – an organization that represents 15 NGOs in Israel – to send a small team of doctors, nurses and water specialists to Myanmar just four days after the cyclone hit.

One month later, Israelis are still working in the field to try to help survivors bounce back from the disaster.

In a phone interview from Israel, Shachar Zahavi, the director of IsraAID, said Israeli doctors are in Yangon – Burma's largest city and former capital, also known as Rangoon – and relief professionals are in a small village called Tar Tipe, which is a four-hour boat ride down the river from Yangon.

IsraAID has already shipped 10 tons of relief supplies, including food, water, mattresses, buckets and clothes to distribute to the survivors.

Zahavi said that many who were left homeless fled from the Delta region to the outskirts of Yangon and built makeshift refugee camps. IsraAID volunteers were able to reach them to distribute basic supplies to them as well.

Father, daughter co-authors win book award

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Eight books and their authors were honoured with awards last week at the 20th annual Helen and Stan Vine Canadian Jewish Book Awards.

The awards ceremony attracted some 350 people to the Leah Posluns Theatre in Toronto for an evening of shmoozing and celebration of literary talent hosted by the Koffler Centre of the Arts.

Top fiction prize went to Toronto writer John Miller for his second novel, A Sharp Intake of Breath (Dundurn), which focuses on characters in a left-wing Jewish family in Toronto in the 1930s, one of whom goes to jail for stealing a diamond, another of whom is a friend of the radical Emma Goldman.

"I've loved these characters so much, and I'm thrilled that you seem moved by this story," Miller told jury members in accepting the award.

Anna Porter

The novel won out over Nancy Huston's Fault Lines, a tale of Holocaust survival that has been a best-seller in its original French in France and was nominated for that country's Prix Goncourt, as well as Britain's prestigious Orange Prize. Huston, a Canadian who lives in France, won a previous Canadian Jewish Book Award in fiction for her 1998 novel, The Mark of the Angel.

As in past years, the awards committee received more than 100 submissions. While the jury has been expanded by several members, the number of prize categories has been reduced to eight from the 10 or 11 awards that were often given in previous years.

Anna Porter, recipient of a recent Rogers Writers' Trust Non-fiction Prize, won the history prize for Kasztner's Train: The True Story of Rezso Kasztner, Unknown Hero of the Holocaust (Douglas & McIntyre). The award came as "a huge surprise – I wasn't expecting it," Porter told The CJN.

JNF Award Protested

LONDON, Ont. — Some 100 people demonstrated outside a June 1 Jewish National Fund Negev Dinner honouring the president of the University of Western Ontario. The Canadian Arab Federation, the Palestinian Arab Society of London and the Canadian Arab Society of London protested Paul Davenport's acceptance of the honour and JNF's land policies, the London Free Press reported.

Student Income Boost

MONTREAL — Montreal philanthropist Marcel Adams, founder of Iberville Developments, said last month that he will supplement the income of 10 Israeli student scientists funded in U.S. dollars by his Adams Family Foundation, in order to offset the 20 per cent rise in the shekel's value against the greenback. Adams, an 88-year-old Holocaust survivor, announced the one-time gift in Israel at a meeting of Adams Fellows last month, the Jerusalem Post reported.

Lawyers Honoured

TORONTO — Jewish lawyers make up more than half of the 10 winners of the Law Society of Upper Canada's 2008 awards. Earl Cherniak, Sidney Troister, Audrey Loeb and Clifford Lax of Toronto, and Abraham Feinstein of Ottawa received the Law Society Medal, the group's highest honour, on June 5. Toronto's Morley Wolfe, a former president of B'nai Brith Canada, won the Lincoln Alexander Award, named for the former Ontario lieutenant-governor and given for outstanding public service.

WORLD

Court Denies Appeal

PITTSBURGH — The Pennsylvania Supreme Court declined to hear the appeal of the man who killed Canadian rabbinical student Neal Rosenblum, 25, in Pittsburgh in 1986. Steven Tielsch was convicted in 2002 of third-degree murder and is serving 10 to 20 years in jail. Three juries were deadlocked in the case, and Tielsch was convicted after a fourth trial. Prosecutors said Rosenblum, a Torontonian, was shot because he looked Jewish.

Rabbi Turns Self In

SAO PAULO — An Israeli rabbi who fled to Brazil amid child-abuse allegations will likely be extradited for trial. Israeli police said they have asked Brazil to extradite Rabbi Elior Chen, 29, who surrendered to police in Sao Paulo last week. Israel issued an international arrest warrant for the rabbi, who allegedly counselled followers to beat and burn children to rid them of the devil. Some of the abuses caused life-threatening injuries. Rabbi Chen was previously said to be hiding in Canada.

Mistrial Declared

SEATTLE — A mistrial was declared June 4 in the case of the Seattle Jewish federation gunman. The jury wrestled with whether Naveed Haq, 32, was not guilty by reason of insanity when he stormed the federation in July 2006 and shot six employees, killing one woman. During deliberations, the jurors asked the judge to clarify the legal definition of insanity. The judge said she couldn't give them more help. Haq, who has a history of mental problems, had said he wanted to send a message about Israel and the Iraq war. Prosecutors said he planned the shooting carefully and knew right from wrong. They said they plan to retry the case this year.

Charges 'A Lie,' Agriprocessors Owner Says

NEW YORK — Aaron Rubashkin, owner of the embattled slaughterhouse Agriprocessors, America's largest kosher meat plant, denies he has engaged in unethical labour practices and blames the failure of U.S. immigration policy for his mostly illegal workforce.

In the first substantive comments by a company representative since U.S. authorities rounded up more than one-third of its employees on immigration charges in a May 12 raid on its Iowa plant, Rubashkin flatly denied allegations of worker mistreatment and plant mismanagement.

"Everything is a lie," Rubashkin, 80, told JTA in an interview May 30 outside his Brooklyn butcher shop.

The firm sells meat under labels such as Aaron's Best and Rubashkin's. No criminal charges have been laid, and most of the accusations are unproven. But nearly 300 ex-employees have pleaded guilty to various forms of fraud involving fake work documents and face deportation.

Meanwhile, several prominent Jews signed a boycott threat against the company. Rabbi Shlomo Riskin, Ruth Messinger and Rabbi Avi Weiss are among 1,000 people who signed a petition organized by a group of students at the liberal Orthodox seminary Yeshivat Chovevei Torah in New York. The group says the firm must comply with the labour requirements of both Jewish and secular law or it will begin a boycott on June 15. The Orthodox Union has also said it will withdraw its hechsher if criminal charges are laid.

JEWISH STUDIES TEACHERS

Hillel Community Day School in Rochester, New York (www.hillelschool.org) offers attractive opportunities for qualified Jewish Studies teachers interested in working in a dynamic Jewish educational environment in Rochester, New York, a community with high quality of life and attractive, affordable housing. For the 2008-2009 academic year, immediate staff openings are available in Grades 1 and 2. Hillel School has been implementing the Tal-am program and employment at the school would include training opportunities with these materials. Hillel School is also actively developing an integrated curriculum through collaboration and, at some grade levels, co-teaching by Judaic and General studies teachers.

Canada joins Israel in discussing terror threat

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Canada joined eight other western nations in Israel recently in a forum to discuss the international terrorism threat.

In an address to the First International Security Conference, held May 28 to 30 in Jerusalem, Canadian Ambassador John Allen called for "co-operation and co-ordination" to address an "ongoing threat."

John Allen

"We live in a time when terrorists see the whole world as their field of action, and so must we. Because they enjoy global reach, we need unparalleled co-operation. Because they often operate at a sub-state level, we must adopt a transnational approach ourselves," Allen said.

The conference, held in Jerusalem, brought together interior ministers and officials involved with internal security to "promote and strengthen the co-operation between the countries and to share the knowledge, capabilities and experience accumulated among the countries during their war against terror while facing other homeland security challenges," organizers said.

Joining Canada and the host Israelis were representatives from the United States, Germany, England, Italy, Spain and Poland.

Addressing the forum, Allen noted that Canada has signed a declaration of intent "to enhance co-operation between Israel and Canada in the area of public safety. This declaration will allow us to improve our combined efforts in the areas of organized crime, emergency management, crime prevention and other related public safety concerns.

"This declaration seeks to establish a more structured framework for the continued co-operation on public safety issues between Canada and Israel, and we look forward to building on it in the days ahead," the ambassador added.

Referring to previous terror attacks and conspiracies in New York, Barcelona and Montreal, Allen said "new intelligence reveals plans for other attacks, in different parts of the globe. We do not doubt for a moment the determination of our enemies, nor do we misinterpret any period of calm as the end of their designs. The fact is that the danger has not passed and we must be vigilant."

> 'Terrorist groups have no strategic plan. They simply execute an attack as soon as capability and opportunity meet'

Conference host Avi Dichter, Israel's minister of public security, said "the past five years of the first decade of the 21st century were probably the most lethal years in the history of terror." He pointed to the 9/11 attacks that killed 3,000 people in New York City and Washington, and to other deadly incidents in Madrid, Bali and London, as well as to the 900 Israelis killed during the first three years of the intifadah as examples.

"I have learned that terrorist groups have no strategic plan. They simply execute an attack as soon as capability and opportunity meet," Dichter said.

Dichter accused Syria of hosting and sheltering terrorist command centres of Hamas and Islamic Jihad, and he said the current peace initiative is "undoubtedly a strategic process on a global scale" designed to draw Syria closer to the western world.

The main terrorist threat emanates from Iran, he continued. Its regime uses terrorist organizations "to execute attacks in countries all over the world, including here in Israel. Striking Iran as a country of terror is a global necessity. Whether it is because of their development of nuclear weapons or whether it is because of their spearheading world terrorism, we are currently at a crucial and dangerous stage."

Into the eerie through Cabaret

There are no subtleties in Cabaret, the well-known musical now playing at the Stratford Festival. There couldn't be. The story is too harsh. Nor should there be if the music, lyrics and dance are to adequately convey the sinister spectacle of that brassy, brutal society. The very opening scene – seedy, stark – punches the audience into silence.

We enter the world of the hedonist, where life is lived hard and indulgently, where morals and morality do not exist, except perhaps as an academic concern in the classroom.

From the editor's desk

The story depicts life in Berlin as the 1920s were giving way to the '30s. German society was in the throes of the Versailles Treaty convulsion. The masses suffered from biting poverty; the elites were self-serving sybarites. An undercurrent of unrest was steadily growing and would soon destroy decency and goodness in its powerful undertow.

To portray this turbulent world, the author, Joe Masteroff, and playwright John Van Druten create the Kit Kat Klub, the cloudy mirror that reflects back to the audience the disturbed light of Berlin society at that time.

Into the club and its environs they bring a handful of key characters who embody that society.

The quality of the music and dancing is superb. Some of the music suggests the obvious and appropriate influence of Kurt Weill. The ensemble numbers are loud, brash and overwhelmingly eye-popping in costume and energy.

Many of the actors deserve high praise for their performances.

The endomorphic Bruce Dow sporting an anti-establishment mohawk haircut is superb as the ubiquitous narrator. He is an exemplar of the decadent amorality that suffuses life in the Kit Kat Klub. Though decadent, he is not vile; he rejects the villainy that encroaches upon the stage and soon overtakes the streets outside the Klub. When he is not stitching together the pieces of the story, he sits in the shadows, observing the decay of decency slowly unfolding on stage.

Dow brings just the right amount of irreverence and scorn to the role.

Trish Lindström is excellent as Sally Bowles. Loose and lascivious permeate her portrayal of the songstress and seductress.

She combines edginess and in-your-face impudence with high-energy singing and dancing. She delivers the play's signature song, Cabaret, with strength and confidence. Reflecting her own doubts over the path she has chosen, she begins the song tentatively, hesitantly. Then, her resignation evident and complete, she picks up the pace and the emotion, and finishes with the flourish for which the song is famous.

Nora McLellan as Fraulein Schneider, the equivocating "ordinary" German who closes her eyes to the ever deepening descent into moral chaos, is always a presence on stage. "One does what one must," becomes her personal anthem. At a late point in the play at the crescendo of the song What Would You Do?, she holds up her hands in perplexity, as if surrendering. In fact, of course, she does surrender her morals, her individuality and probably her chance for true happiness. "In the end," she asks, "what other choice have I?" The question is posed to us all.

Her chance at love appears in the character of Mr. Schultz, played warmly and elegantly by Frank Moore.

He brings weight and believability to the role. He is the paradigm of self-delusion, assuming the equanimity of the rule of law even though thugs and bullies and murderers control the instruments of state.

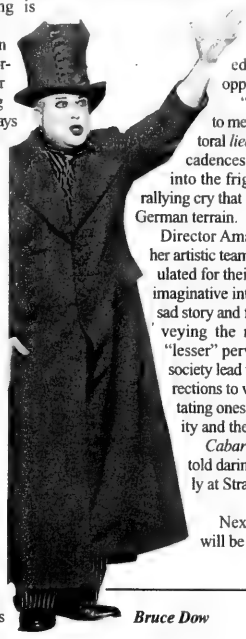
"Are we too old for words like love?" he asks innocently, and so sincerely. But he misses the point and thus misphrases the question. "Are we too doomed [German society] for words of love?" he should have asked.

In the end, he is always generous to others, but never to himself.

Cory O'Brien effectively portrays the unctuous but dark, duplicitous Nazi.

The first act slams shut and jars us to the point where we fear what comes next.

The action in Act II moves quickly and ominously. The dance line announces that the world has changed. The Nazis have arrived and are asserting their eerie control. The politics of evil arises like ugly, frightening gargoyles thrust suddenly in one's face. The mob is easily manipulated. Only a very few oppose or resist.



Bruce Dow

"Tomorrow belongs to me," the innocent pastoral lied begins with quiet cadences, but it transforms into the frightening beer hall rallying cry that thunders across all German terrain.

Director Amanda Dehnert and her artistic team are to be congratulated for their bold, aggressive, imaginative interpretation of this sad story and for effectively conveying the message that the "lesser" perversions of Berlin society lead ultimately in all directions to wider, more devastating ones of politics, morality and the soul.

Cabaret is a chilling tale told daringly and masterfully at Stratford.

Elie Wiesel honoured by Heschel school

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Fanaticism can never be an option when confronting other societies, Elie Wiesel told a Toronto Heschel School gala last week.

"It's up to you to make the world better. And in so doing, you are helping God," the renowned Nobel laureate, Holocaust survivor and human rights advocate told the more than 700 people who converged on the Direct Energy Centre June 2 to hear his words.

"When you study the Bible, not a single character is absolute. They all have shortcomings. It's human to fail. But it's crucial to learn from that failure," he said.

Wiesel was in town at the invitation of the Toronto Heschel School – founded on the humanitarian teachings and philosophy of the late Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel – to receive the first annual Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel Humanitarian Award.

The school's inaugural award gala raised more than $600,000 to help the school train teachers, create scholarships and enhance educational programs, organizers said.

Ticket prices ranged from $180 for general admission to $54,000 for a block of 16 tickets. The latter included a private, pre-ceremony dinner with Wiesel.

A silent auction was also held.

Prior to his speech, organizers surprised Wiesel by playing a pre-recorded greeting from Rabbi Heschel's daughter, Susannah Heschel, who is a professor of Jewish studies at Dartmouth College in New Hampshire.

Prof. Heschel recalled the long, deep friendship shared by her father and Wiesel.

"On Shabbat afternoons, they would walk together… and discuss the state of Jews in the Soviet Union," she said. "My father took great joy in his friendship with Elie."

By way of introduction, Gail Baker, Toronto Heschel School's principal and co-founder, praised Wiesel as a man "who has taught us to not give up on life and not give into despair."

She added that her school "strives to honour" Wiesel's teachings and that her students learn that "it's not a choice to stand up to injustice, it's a commandment."

Baker then turned to Wiesel and said, "Prof. Wiesel, I can assure you that in our school, the term 'Never again' will not become just another slogan." She then invited him to take the stage.

A visibly moved Wiesel took the podium, cupping his hands together in front of his mouth while taking in the applause from the appreciative audience.

"Every Shabbat, I would walk and discuss everything under the sun with Rabbi Heschel. We understood each other so well," recalled Wiesel, the winner of the 1987 Nobel Peace Prize and a humanities professor at Boston University.

Wiesel then spoke about an encounter he had with the Dalai Lama years ago and told of how he offered the pacifist leader advice on how to ensure that Tibetans survived their struggle by comparing them with the Jewish people.

"I told him the art of survival starts with the passion for learning," Wiesel said, noting that the Jews only took their Bible with them into exile and nothing else of value.

He exhorted the staff of the Toronto Heschel School to ensure that their students' "passion for learning" is always kindled.

"The relationship between teacher and pupil is sacred. The pupil is there to receive, the teacher to give. Together, they achieve the miracle of eternity. Words not forgotten," Wiesel said.

In a moment of levity, Wiesel spoke about how he became disenchanted with his philosophical pursuits.

"I studied philosophy because of the questions. I left because of the answers," he quipped to the crowd.

But existential questions always remained, ones that he and Rabbi Heschel would debate ad nauseum, he remembered.

"Is man God's mistake? His victim? His prisoner? We didn't have an answer," Wiesel opined. "So we sang Yiddish songs. And the song is the answer."

In his closing remarks, Wiesel said he hopes that all the students at the Toronto Heschel School will remember their heritage.

"Say to yourselves: the memory of my people is in my memory. As long as my memory lives, my people exist as a spark and a fire. And as long as my memory lives, that fire will never be extinguished."

Chassidic musicians fundraise for Safed

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

For more than 500 years, the Holy City of Tsfat (Safed) in the Galilee was the home of Jewish scholars, mystics and spiritual leaders.

Several earthquakes left the city in ruins in the middle of the last century. It was said that the city could not be rebuilt to its former grandeur, however, Breslev Rabbi Gedaliah Kenig received a directive from his teacher, Rabbi Avraham Sternhartz, who was then the leader of the Breslev chassidic community in Jerusalem, to undertake the task of rebuilding Tsfat.

Rabbi Kenig accepted the mission and worked tirelessly on it. When he died, he passed on the task to his three sons, who have continued in their father's footsteps.

Tsfat is once again a vibrant area. Located there are the non-profit institutions of Nachal Novea Mekor Chochma, founded in 1967, which include the Great Breslev Synagogue, a kolel, a mikvah and a nursery.

Rabbi Aharon Carmi, a member of the Nachal Novea Mekor Chochma's board of directors and the gabbai for Rabbi Elazar Mordechai Kenig, the community's spiritual leader, was in Toronto recently to prepare for a fundraising concert.

Welcome To Tsfat, featuring the group Simply Tsfat, will be held on June 17, at the Eglinton Grand, 400 Eglinton Ave. W. at 8 p.m.

"Simply Tsfat is a trio of talented chassidic Israeli musicians. In concert, they merge heaven and earth through music and stories," Rabbi Carmi said.

"The aim of the group is to spread the joy and inspiration of Judaism and to bring a breath of fresh air from the mystical city of Tsfat, the home of Kabbalah."

Nachal Novea Mekor Chochma's mission since 1967 has been to provide social and educational assistance to families in need.

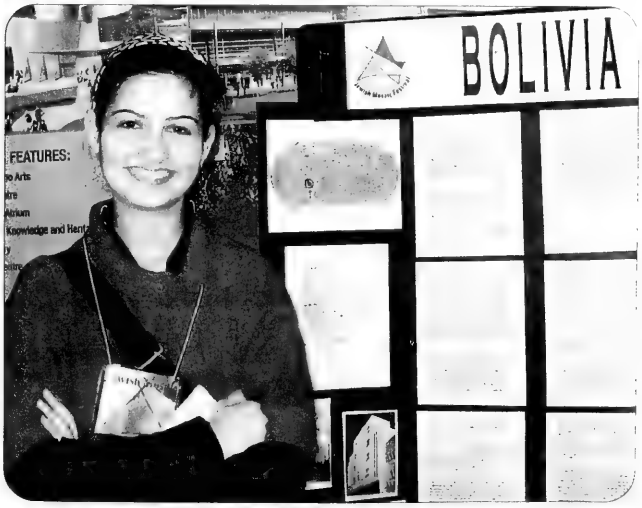
"We provide weekly food distribution to more than 200 families in need," Rabbi Carmi said. "A special project, Eat Well, Learn Well, was established to help children from underprivileged families to escape the hunger situation at home and to provide them with a hot, nutritious meal. We serve up to 400 children daily at our newly decorated soup kitchen."

The community offers many educational programs, including one that helps those with learning disabilities.

Because of the Second Lebanon War of 2006, the poverty in the city has worsened, Rabbi Carmi said. "Many visitors have stopped coming to Tsfat, therefore everyone's income is down. Some people are in such need that they rent out their homes and move in with others to get some money."

Nachal Novea Mekor Chochma has created a foundation to help and support needy families in the city.

To order tickets for the concert or for information,e-mail concertreservations@gmail.com; call Deena, 416-887-3779; fax 416-783-8141; or write to 208 Carmichael Ave., Toronto, Ont., M5M 2X3.



MOSAIC FESTIVAL: The second annual Mosaic Festival, held last week at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, highlighted multiculturalism within the Jewish community. Countries represented included Argentina, Barbados, Belgium, Bolivia, China, Ethiopia, India, Peru, Tunisia, Uruguay, Yemen, and Iran.

Clocks are ticking

Like small stones that fall of their own accord down a large hill, discrete events have a way of gaining their own momentum and crash landing with a thudding, far-reaching impact. This is the image evoked by a confluence of unrelated events that occurred last week. Ominously, all of them relate to Iran.

On the eve of his departure for Rome, where he attended the world food summit of the UN Food and Agriculture Organization, Iranian president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad once again fulminated against the Jewish state.

In a speech to foreign guests at an event marking the anniversary of the death of Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, the Iranian leader attacked Israel and the United States. "You should know that the criminal and terrorist Zionist regime, which has 60 years of plundering, aggression and crimes in its file, has reached the end of its work and will soon disappear off the geographical scene," Iran's official IRNA news agency quoted Ahmadinejad as saying.

Ahmadinejad's apologists will simply dismiss his comments as more wild, empty rhetoric, merely mischievous, wishful thinking. But the language is transparent and the threats are real.

Later in the week, the U.S. director of national intelligence, Mike McConnell, flew to Tel Aviv to discuss Iran's nuclear program. He met with his counterpart in the Israeli intelligence community and with Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak.

On Wednesday, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert held a private meeting with U.S. President George W. Bush to discuss, among other pressing subjects, Iran. "Naturally the Iranian issue was central to our talks, and our shared point of departure is the need to deal with Iran before it manages to acquire non-conventional capabilities," Olmert told reporters. Olmert added that, as a result of his meeting with Bush, there were fewer question marks between the two allies concerning the means, the time constraints and the level of American determination in dealing with the Iranian nuclear program.

The "level of American determination" is really a euphemism for the extent to which Bush is personally resolved to upgrade the steps to be taken against the Iranian regime, if not the Iranian nuclear program, before his term of office expires in six months. That "level" may have reached higher in light of the strong statements on behalf of Israel's security by presidential candidates John McCain and Barack Obama. "I will do everything in my power to prevent Iran from getting a nuclear weapon. Everything," Obama, the candidate considered the more dovish of the two, told the American Israel Public Affairs Committee gathering.

Whether the Europeans, Russians and Chinese share the American level of determination in dealing with the Iranian nuclear program will be a critical factor in deciding the next steps to be taken against Tehran. Alas, it is unlikely that they do. But various clocks are ticking, and the inevitable hour for decision is not far off. Events are unfolding, thundering down the hill. We await the impact of their landing.

Hezbollah's mindset

The profound difference for the respect of the rule of law was illustrated this month when Israel handed over convicted Hezbollah spy Nassim Nasser after he had completed his prison sentence ("Israeli soldiers' remains released," CJN, June 5). Hezbollah, as a part of the Lebanese government, ignores its commitment to allow the Red Cross to interview and ascertain the well-being of prisoners. Israel Defence Forces soldiers Eldad Regev and Ehud Goldwasser, if they are still alive, have not been afforded their rights under international law to be visited by the Red Cross.

The gruesome delivery of the remains of what are claimed to be Israeli soldiers is simply another illustration of Hezbollah's inhumane attitude toward Jews, dead or alive.

Islam professes that bodies of the deceased must be handled with dignity. To have kept the body parts of Israeli soldiers in the hope of achieving some exchange advantage is another despicable example of the mindset of Hezbollah.

Birth of a new stream of Judaism

Rabbi Martin Lockshin's article "Modern Orthodoxy decides to fight back" (CJN Perspectives, May 15) has many historical precedents. A group of rabbis is upset with the extremism of the main body and sets up a group within the mainstream. It is is eventually rebuffed and expelled by an intransigent establishment. It then grows to be a legitimate branch of Judaism in its own right. This is the exact history of how Chassidism broke from traditional Judaism; Reform broke from traditional Judaism; Conservative Judaism broke from Reform Judaism; and Reconstructionist Judaism from Conservative Judaism.

The historical evidence shows we are witnessing the birth of another and important, legitimate and independent stream of Judaism, modern Orthodoxy. Despite the protestations by these rabbis that they seek, above all, to avoid a split, they will not avoid it. It is not in their hands – it is the hands of the intransigent haredim, and all the evidence and history point toward one inevitable outcome.

Nero fiddled while Rome burned

We know full well that in a matter of months, Jerusalem could, God forfend, be divided again. Everyone knows about it, and yet we read and hear little about it. If there is any opposition to such a horrible, unimaginable eventuality, it is almost completely muted. We cannot ignore the fact that it is our leaders who are among the perpetrators of this travesty to God, Israel and the Jewish People.

Let us not emulate the emperor Nero who fiddled while Rome burned. Instead, let us make it known that we, each and every one of us who cares, will never accept the division of Jerusalem. Period.

Abuses at slaughterhouse a wake-up call

The many recent abuses of people, animals and the environment at the Agriprocessors' Postville, Iowa, kosher slaughterhouse should be a wake-up call to the need to consider many issues related to animal-based diets ("Embattled slaughterhouse seeks new CEO," CJN, June 5). It is essential that we consider that such diets are contributing significantly to: • an epidemic of heart disease, several forms of cancer and other diseases;

• global climate change, since, according to a 2006 UN report, animal-based agriculture emits more greenhouse gases (in CO_2 equivalents) than all the cars and other means of transportation worldwide combined (18 per cent vs. 13.5 per cent);

• widespread hunger, since over 70 per cent of the grain produced in the United States and more than 40 per cent produced worldwide are fed to farmed animals;

• increasing water and energy scarcities, since animal-based diets require up to 14 times as much water and 10 times as much energy as vegan (all-plant) diets.

And, the consumption of animal products is projected to double in 50 years, making the situation even worse. Hence, a major shift toward plant-based diets is essential to move our precious, but imperilled, planet to a sustainable path.

Israeli firms seek out alternative energy

By DINA KRAFT
JTA

At a lab in Rehovot, Israel, the man who developed the Arrow missile is consumed with his next mission: making Israel energy independent by using cheap solar power.

"The issue of energy is the greatest danger to Israel because in 30 years there will be no energy means, no oil and no gas, and the use of coal will be prohibited," said Dov Raviv, now the CEO of MST, an Israeli renewable energy company. "Without energy, Israel cannot survive, and we must find a substitute and find it fast. That is what I am trying to do."

Raviv's company is working to reduce the high price of solar power, which is not yet competitive with the price of conventional energy sources like oil, by more efficiently harnessing solar energy through a method of concentrating sunlight on a matrix of single solar cells.

MST is one of dozens of alternative energy startups across Israel seeking solutions to the global energy crisis.

Among the innovations under development are a gear system that dramatically boosts the efficiency of wind turbines, a device that would reduce gas emissions from trucks; the generation of bio-fuels from desert plants; and various techniques to generate energy from unlikely sources, including seaweed and sewage water.

Entrepreneurs say Israeli solutions can help not only Israel but the world.

"Israel has the minds, the R&D [research and development], the technology and the entrepreneurship, but we are lagging behind in terms of actual deployment," said David Schwartz, the chairman of MyPlanet, an Israeli consortium of companies involved in energy and security issues. "This is impeding reaching our full potential as a source of alternative energy for the world."

Israel's leadership in the development of alternative energy also can have security benefits. If the world is weaned from its overwhelming dependence on oil, the oil-rich autocratic regimes that surround the Jewish state, including Iran, will have less oil revenue to pay for their anti-Israel activities – whether the development of nuclear weapons or the funding of fundamentalist terrorist groups.

During a recent visit to Israel to accept the $1 million Dan David Award for promoting environmental awareness, former U.S. vice-president and environmental activist Al Gore asked a question many Israelis have been pondering themselves: "How is it here, in the land of the sun, there is no widespread use of solar energy?"

Alternative energy is "good for the Jews," Gore told a conference on the subject at Tel Aviv University.

Industry observers say more aggressive government policies, such as underwriting renewable energy initiatives and granting more land for power plants, are needed to bolster the development of alternative energy.

"Europe and the U.S. have made incredible strides," Schwartz said. "Israel has not."

Meanwhile, Israel has an energy shortage looming. Israel's supply capacity is 10,600 megawatts per day, and the country has come dangerously close to exceeding that demand on especially hot and cold days.

With limited energy reserves to accommodate for surges, and as the country's population and energy use grows, the problem is becoming more acute.

Amnon Shpira, the head of Israel's public utility authority, told JTA that plans are under way to launch deliberate rolling brownouts this summer among certain industries at peak times to deal with the problem.

Other short-term strategies include encouraging Israelis to scale back their electricity use, limiting the use of large appliances on certain days and setting their air conditioner thermostats at higher temperatures.

The head of the Israel Energy Forum, Yael Cohen-Paran, says some relatively simple measures could significantly reduce the load on the energy grid: cash rebates for those who purchase energy-efficient air conditioning and heating units, and government encouragement of energy-saving building practices.

The long-term solution, however, may require more of a shift.

At the Tel Aviv energy conference, Israel's infrastructure minister, Benjamin Ben-Eliezer, responded to criticism of government policy on the issue by announcing a commitment to increase the share of such energies to 15 to 20 per cent of Israel's total energy use by 2020, double that of previous targets.

He also pledged to adopt a plan to build one new solar station per year for the next 20 years and introduce a bill to make the Negev Desert and southern Israel a "national preference region" for renewable energies. Tax breaks and other incentives would be part of the package.

Turning Israel into a centre for clean technology could build new bridges between Israel and Diaspora Jews, says Jonathan Shapira, a recent American law school graduate living in Tel Aviv who organizes monthly meetings for entrepreneurs interested in clean tech and writes a blog on the subject.

As an example, Shapira cited the business park for renewable energy firms being built in the Arava, with funding from Toronto's Jewish community.

"Rather than just making a charitable donation, people are helping create the infrastructure for economic growth and a cleaner environment in Israel," Shapira said.

Yossi Abramowitz, the president of Arava Power, wants to install 62,500 solar panels by year's end on the sun-drenched sands of Israel's deserts. He says his company has found investors to pay for solar power stations that would be capable of supplying up to 500 megawatts of electricity for the country – nearly five per cent of Israel's daily energy needs during daylight hours.

The project relies on the use of photovoltaics, or PV, a relatively expensive technology that uses a fraction of the silicon used in conventional solar panels to convert sunlight-generated photons into energy.

But for this energy to be competitive on the open market, the government needs to double its current rate of subsidy, Abramowitz says, bringing Israel more in line with the levels of subsidy in countries such as Germany and Spain.

Funding for Abramowitz's project is also conditional upon the government promising a 20-year subsidy for the solar power, known as a feed-in tariff. Israel's public utility authority is scheduled to vote on the matter soon.

"While there is great innovation and technology in solar energy, there is zero commercial solar energy being generated today," Abramowitz said.

Ben-Gurion University of the Negev announced a new deal last week with the Israeli startup Zenith Solar to license solar energy technology developed by its researchers that could revolutionize the way solar power is collected and drastically reduce its price.

The new method, a form of "concentrated PV," would use fewer of the expensive silicon solar cells to create energy. Instead it would use low-cost glass mirrors to collect sunlight and then focus it onto a relatively small amount of those solar cells to generate power.

"We can envision systems of $1 per kilowatt for the entire system, which is the kind of costs that conventional fossil fuel costs before you start figuring in the costs of fuel they have to burn," said David Faiman, the chairman of the university's solar energy and environmental physics department and director of the National Solar Energy Center.

The Israeli founder of an algae fuel company called GreenFuel, Isaac Berzin, who was named by Time magazine as one of its Top 100 people in the world for 2008, says Israel is too small of a country to keep such technology to itself.

"Israel should be a catalyst for change," Berzin said. "Israel is a very small market, a very small place in the middle of nowhere, but it has here what it takes in terms of technology, the know-how to change the world."

Opinions

Their misleading narrative

As Israel celebrates the 60th anniversary of its restoration, its Arab adversaries again lament its founding, mourning, as they do annually at this time, their "nakba," their "catastrophe."

Their lexicon of manipulation, exaggeration, and inversion of historical facts – all geared towards a denial of Israel's legitimacy – continues to find traction the world over. However, this year, perhaps much more so than before, the notion of Palestinian "dispossession," as a devious and premeditated Zionist plot, has been gaining momentum.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

Take a peek at websites such as "Al-Awda, The Palestinian Right to Return Coalition" (www.al-awda.org). There you will see accounts of the Palestinian refugee predicament that underscore the distortions that Israel's Arab enemies have so zealously promoted – and that the gullible, the uninformed, and the declared anti-Zionists in the West and elsewhere, are so ready to accept.

According to such sources, Palestinian refugees are seen as "the indigenous inhabitants of Palestine"; Jewish militias "terrorized the Palestinian street, destroyed villages and slaughtered entire Palestinian families [in 1948]"; the Palestinian refugee problem occurred because of "a systematic policy of ethnic cleansing," and "dispossession and expulsion continued with the 1967 war, which Israel launched on its Arab neighbours and which resulted in the occupation of the Gaza Strip and the West Bank."

In fact, the Palestinians have very little evidence to back up their claim that they are the "indigenous inhabitants of Palestine." The history of the region, spanning some 5,000 years, is highly complex. It is one of conquest and further conquest with, from time to time, the Canaanites, Jews, Babylonians, Persians, Greeks, Romans, Byzantines, Christian crusaders, Turks, and Mamluks, among others, all asserting their sovereignty over the tiny slice of land where Israel is today. Amid all of this, Arabs ruled the area for only a relatively short period, from 638 until their defeat by the Crusaders in 1099.

Also, the accusation that the nascent Jewish state embarked on a declared policy of ridding the region of Arabs in 1948 has been credibly refuted again and again. And as to the charge that Israel started the wars against surrounding Arab nations, either in 1948 or 1967, this, too, is a flagrant misrepresentation of the historical record. On the contrary, by taking up arms in their efforts to destroy the Jewish state – rather than embracing the many peace initiatives that would have assured them of their own state – the Arabs accepted what has been termed by essayist Lawrence Auster as the "verdict of arms."

Fortunately for Israel, they lost that verdict in 1948 and then again in 1967. So, were it not for the intransigence of their leaders over the past 60 years, the outcome would have been vastly different – and so much better for all, both Palestinians and Israelis.

A genealogy project leads to fascinating find

I've been interested in my roots since childhood, but I recently renewed my ongoing interest because my daughter, Naomi, has had a year-long Grade 7 project on the topic. The journey has been enriching for both Naomi and for the whole family. We discovered much about our history and that of the assorted communities from which our ancestors came.

Yair Lootsteen in Jerusalem

Naomi is the progeny of a rich blend of different cultures and traditions, from East and from West, with grandparents from Poland, India, England and Holland, each with a unique mélange of ancestries.

She spent hours interviewing older family members, gathering historical facts and fascinating anecdotes, some of which were not previously known. Relatives willingly provided stories and information about their branches of the family, eager to help and to be part of the project.

The Internet has been central. We found archives, articles, stories and other materials about the places our forefathers had come from. Through it, we also found lost relatives. It helped us to build a family tree of more than 500 people.

While reams could be written about each of Naomi's grandparents and their pasts, one discovery we made while investigating my father's family history was particularly moving.

The decimation of Holland's Jewry in the Holocaust was immense. Of the 140,000 people registered as Jews with the Germans, 107,000 were deported and only 5,500 returned.

While researching the topic, we compiled a Lootsteen family tree going back eight generations. The story it tells is chilling. The Germans and the Dutch were pedantic about details. Precise deportation records exist, including for dozens of Lootsteens. For instance, my great-grandmother, Mietje Lootsteen, was deported to Auschwitz and murdered there on Sept. 21, 1942. Her son, Mozes (my grandfather's brother) met a similar fate on Jan. 31, 1943, as did his wife, Margareet, and their 14-year-old daughter, Mary, on Oct. 12, 1942.

Miraculously, my father's nuclear family survived, in no small measure because of my grandmother's bravery and her connections with the underground, and because my grandfather boldly removed the infamous yellow Star of David from his clothing.

At war's end, my grandparents knew of only five living Lootsteens – the four in their immediate family and one cousin. I grew up knowing there were no other Lootsteens in the world.

But researching the family tree, we discovered that one branch had apparently not been completely severed. While there were death dates for nearly all the Lootsteens, there wasn't one for a woman named Carla. If alive, she'd be my father's second cousin. I scoured the Internet for any possible sign of her, eventually coming up with what appeared to be a phone number in Holland.

I phoned with Naomi at my side. After all, it was her project that had produced these results. We dialed the number and, lo and behold, a man answered. I explained who I was and why we were calling. He listened, and after asking me a couple of questions, he passed me on to his wife, Carla.

We spoke for half an hour or so. At first, she was astonished, but she soon began to tell me her life story. She'd been hidden with good people after both her parents were taken away, and she came out of the war thinking that she was the only Lootsteen on earth.

I got back to my father with the amazing news. Ever since, he and Carla have been in touch several times a week, by phone or via the Internet – just getting to know each other. Carla, who knew of no living relatives, enjoyed learning of her "new" extended family, and we were curious about hers.

All of this culminated, at the beginning of May, with a trip to Holland by my father, sister and me to meet Carla and her family. It was wonderful, emotional and natural. We hit it off famously. The experience left us feeling that it was the beginning of a great relationship.

None of this would have happened if it weren't for Naomi's school project. But it also required courage on the part of my father and Carla, and their willingness to take the emotional plunge into the past and open old wounds. Not everyone could travel that road. They consented, and we have all been enriched and rewarded.

Time is short. Those who remember will disappear. If you can, go down the road. Help them take the plunge before it's too late. The rewards will be gratifying.

Post-Olmert political reform?

As the sordid details of the "Olmert saga" are revealed, Israelis are also getting a second chance at much-needed political reform. Our electoral system, developed in Poland during the 19th century and adopted by the Zionist movement, has perpetuated a corrupt and incompetent political class. Many of Israel's "best and brightest" have avoided or dropped out of politics after realizing that success was incompatible with maintaining moral principles.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

The dysfunctional electoral system is also a major source of the gridlock that has served Israel so poorly. After the founding generation of idealists – former prime minister David Ben-Gurion, Menachem Begin and their contemporaries – passed on, the centrality of political parties has allowed mediocre people (at best) to manipulate the system.

This framework excludes talented outsiders and allows corrupt elites to control the system. Their power is based on their role in small parties, which are justified on narrow ideological, religious and other grounds, and the fate of government coalitions is determined by the personal desires of their leaders. Israel's national interests are lost in the process.

The dysfunctional nature of party-based politics and the need for reform was widely understood a number of years ago. Indeed, the Kadima party was created by former prime minister Ariel Sharon in response to public demands for a broad-based framework that would unite pragmatists from different groups.

But Sharon's stroke ended this experiment, leaving Ehud Olmert as the accidental prime minister, with no interest in a reform process that would impede his own access to money and power. His first test was in the 2006 Lebanon war, and while his performance was less than adequate, he has been able to cling to power.

Olmert's downfall would allow Israelis to try political reform again, based on support for leaders whose skills go beyond manipulation and fundraising. One option is Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, who was until recently more of an outsider in politics, but she lacks the necessary experience.

Threats from Iran, Hamas, Lebanon, North Korean nuclear reactors in Syria, etc., highlight the importance of security credentials for Israel's future leaders. Within Kadima, former IDF chief of staff Shaul Mofaz, is clearly eager to become prime minister, but the years that Mofaz has spent in politics have tainted him. In the other parties, former prime ministers Benjamin Netanyahu and Ehud Barak are unlikely candidates for reforming the system. The Likud and Labor parties are the pillars of the failed political framework.

More likely, leaders of the "second wave" of reform will come from a cadre of respected Israelis who left politics rather than joining in the corruption, as well as from former Israel Defence Forces generals with track records that combine competence and the refusal to play the political game by the old rules.

Uzi Dayan and Moshe Ya'alon both fit this description – as military leaders, they demonstrated both skill and commitment to the national interest. And after leaving the IDF, both have spoken out on public issues while refusing to be tarnished by old-style politics. There are many others in this group.

In restarting the reform process, the need to separate money from politics is central. No democracy is immune – the British Labour Party has had its share of funding scandals, and despite financing regulations, U.S. election campaigns are dependent on massive donations. But in Israel, the fragmented political system has greatly amplified the harmful impact of dependence on influential donors and the resulting "get rich quick" schemes.

Earlier, money was generated through the alliance between the Histadrut labour union and the Labor party, and when Labor finally lost power in 1977, the centre of gravity shifted to wealthy individuals, both in Israel and abroad. Neither arrangement placed the national interest at the centre of the political process.

The post-Olmert era will present another opportunity for reform based on the principles of good government. Changing the system will not cure all of Israel's problems – internal or external – but it will give us a fighting chance to choose the type of leaders that are necessary for Israel's success in the next 60 years.

The Kirshner File

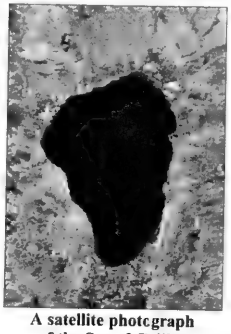
It all comes down to land in talks with Syria

Ever the realist, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert warned last month that negotiations with Syria will be long and difficult. He made that sober comment shortly after Israel and Syria jointly announced that they had held indirect peace talks in Istanbul through Turkish mediation. Israel's objective is an agreement modelled after its 1979 peace treaty with Egypt, the first Arab country to formally recognize Israel.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Though details are still sketchy, these discussions were launched last year, when Olmert finally realized that it is "best to talk and not shoot." Yet Israel and Syria have been there before, having gone through two sets of face-to-face talks since the 1991 Madrid peace conference. The first phase ended in the winter of 1996, while the second one lasted for just over a year, from 1999 to 2000.

According to the Syrians, a great many of the issues were settled when the talks collapsed, a claim Israel does not dispute. By all accounts, the talks foundered over the demarcation of the border, though this is not to say that other important issues, from security arrangements to water rights, were completely resolved. Now, eight years later, this festering issue is at the forefront yet again, even though Israel and Syria have not resumed direct negotiations.



A satellite photograph of the Sea of Galilee

Syria – which has fought Israel in four wars and numerous skirmishes since the first Arab-Israeli conflict in 1948 – agreed to a resumption of talks after receiving categorical assurances from Israel, via Turkey, that it would withdraw from the Golan Heights and return to the pre-1967 armistice lines in exchange for a peace treaty. "We received commitments for a withdrawal from the Golan to the June 4, 1967 line," said Syrian Foreign Minister Walid Moallem.

As he suggested, this is not a new pledge. Yitzhak Rabin, the former Israeli prime minister, set the precedent in 1993, when he conveyed a message to Damascus, through the United States, that Israel would cede the Golan in full if all its needs were met. Rabin's declaration is known as the "Rabin deposit."

Ehud Barak, the current Israeli defence minister, promised to honour it and not to "erase the past," when he was prime minister from 1999 onward. In fact, Barak got cold feet when the moment of truth dawned.

With talks deadlocked, Bill Clinton, the then-U.S. president, tried to salvage them at a summit with his Syrian counterpart, Hafez Assad, in Geneva in March 2000. Since Clinton did not have a firm commitment in hand from Barak that Israel would relinquish all the territory claimed by Assad, the meeting was a failure, signifying the end of one more frustrating chapter in Israel's on-again, off-again talks with Syria.

In light of this missed opportunity, the question that now arises is whether history will repeat itself. It is far too early to draw hard and fast conclusions, but judging by Olmert's most recent statements on the territorial issue, one might well conclude that he may not be as forthcoming as Syria seems to assume.

Addressing the Knesset's foreign affairs and defence committee, he denied reports that he had accepted Syria's condition for renewing talks, Israel's withdrawal to the pre-Six Day War lines. "All I said to the Syrians was that I know what you want, and you know what I want," he said. "There was no commitment beyond that."

In the wake of Olmert's remarks, Israeli newspapers quoted unnamed sources as saying that Israel had no intention of meeting Syria's demand. Moallem countered that Israel had indeed made such a commitment. Amid the confusion, the Israeli press quoted yet another high-level official as saying that Olmert had, in fact, given Syria a "formula" for the Golan that its president, Bashar Assad, had sought.

Last week, Assad – Hafez Assad's son – talked about that contentious matter. "What is on the agenda is the return of all land," he asserted, adding that negotiations would eventually require international sponsorship and the participation of the United States.

Clearly, the dispute over territory is at the heart of Israel's conflict with Syria, though Syria's alliance with Iran and its continuing support of Hezbollah are also issues of great concern to Israel.

The territorial issue has its origins in the period after World War I, when Britain and France laid claim to former Ottoman domains in the Middle East. In 1923, the two colonial powers established what would be the international border between Palestine and Syria. Under the agreement, the Sea of Galilee, including a 10-metre strip along its northeastern shore, was allotted to Palestine. The 1947 United Nations partition plan placed the Sea of Galilee in the proposed Jewish state.

During the War of Independence, the Syrian army seized about 25 kilometres of land in the Jordan Valley, west of the international border. Among its conquests was the northeastern corner of the Sea of Galilee, which presently supplies Israel with half of its freshwater. By the terms of the 1949 armistice accord, Syria retained that sliver of land. Israel recaptured it, as well as the adjacent Shebaa Farms region, during the Six Day War.

Israel established settlements on the Golan, repelled a Syrian offensive to reconquer these lands in the 1973 Yom Kippur War, and annexed the Golan in 1981.

The status quo remained intact until the 1991 Gulf War, waged by the United States and its European and Arab allies against Iraq. In gratitude for Arab backing and assistance, Washington pressed Israel to negotiate with Syria to defuse the Arab-Israeli conflict. Israel concentrated on the Syrian track, at the expense of the Palestinian one (which became active again with the launch of the 1993 Oslo process).

Israel's policy from the outset was that the depth of a withdrawal would be equal to the depth of security and normalization offered by Syria. Rabin's successors – Shimon Peres, Benjamin Netanyahu and Barak – worked on the assumption that Syria would be satisfied with a pullback to the international border. They miscalculated. Syria insisted on a withdrawal to the June 4, 1967 lines, and this remains its position today.

Israel can legitimately claim that Syria has no right whatsoever to land it conquered in 1948, but Syria can refute that argument by pointing out that Israel acquired far more land in that war than it was entitled to under the United Nations two-state plan.

The situation, however, is not hopeless. Several years ago, Alon Liel, the former director general of Israel's foreign ministry, discussed these issues with Ibrahim Suleiman, a Syrian American who has close ties with the Syrian government.

These informal discussions, which concluded in the summer of 2006, took place with Israel's and Syria's consent and climaxed with an agreement under which a "peace park" would be created in the disputed zone between the international border and the June 4 border. It remains to be seen whether this proposal will resurface should Israel and Syria resume direct negotiations. But obviously, it will only be relevant if Israel and Syria can agree on a common border.

Surveys indicate that about two-thirds of Israelis would oppose a complete withdrawal from the Golan. Such is their mistrust of Syrian motives and intentions.

Yet it is worth noting that, while 70 per cent of Israelis opposed a pullout from the Sinai Peninsula before the 1978 Camp David accords, 70 per cent supported a withdrawal after Israel and Egypt forged a historic rapprochement.

It would therefore seem that public opinion in Israel is susceptible to changing circumstances on the ground.

New camp director plans to expand Jewish education

By RITA POLIAKOV
CJN Intern

After nine years of teaching Judaism through rope-climbing and water-skiing, Camp George is celebrating its 10th summer with a new director.

Jeff Rose, the former director of Camp Sabra in Missouri, is planning to expand the camp's interactive Jewish education with new programs.

Rose, who has a degree in education and a lifetime of camping experience, isn't trying to change the direction of the camp.

"I'm just ushering it into the next 10 years," he said. "I won't change the basic pillars. [My goal] is to make Judaism a little more engaging."

Camp George uses informal lessons to integrate Jewish teachings into everyday life. The lessons include skits and interactive videos about Judaism.

"We don't give them a textbook," said Ira Schweitzer, a faculty member at the camp and the director of education for Temple Sinai. "We're trying to teach in a fun way. I do things down at the ropes course to teach about co-operation, or I'll go mountain biking. Some staff use arts and crafts. We're not bound by walls."

Rabbi Erin Polonsky, who is also from the Temple Sinai, uses the camp's environment to take a different approach to education.

"You can be a little different than [you might be] in religious schooling. You can go outside – if we wanted to, we could just sit outside under a tree or have class in the middle of the night and talk about the stars. There's all kinds of possibilities," she said.

Camp George, located on Maple Lake, just southeast of Parry Sound, Ont., is the only Canadian camp that is part of the Union for Reform Judaism (URJ). Staff members use the camp's 200 acres of space as a classroom. Bike paths, rope courses and the surrounding waterfront are used for religious teachings.

"We make the Jewish culture surround them. [The camp] is built on a peninsula, so we have a lot of water activities," Rose said. "Jewish programming might have a stigma – it's not synonymous with camp, but we pride ourselves in [the fact that campers] don't know that they're learning."

Jeff Rose

Rose will use his experience to make the camp even more interactive through daily services and new programming.

"I grew up [camping] in Ontario. I put everything I've learned into practice, I try to duplicate the things that I loved," Rose said. "We do daily prayers where the kids are actively creating their own services through creative readings or skits. We need something different every year."

This year, Rose plans on introducing a videography program in which kids can shoot videos around the camp about Judaism and turn those videos into half-hour news shows.

He also plans to expand the music program by bringing in more instruments for campers.

Deborah Cooper, who is part of the steering committee, is enthusiastic about expanding this program.

"The bigger vision is to have children more involved. If they're more involved in music, it will give them a part to play in the services," she said.

Cooper sees Rose's experience and personality as an asset to the camp. "I think any director of a Jewish camp is an educator. Jeff is aware of this. He's a great people person – that's what drew [the committee] to him," she said.

"Jeff comes with a great treasure of experience. URJ camps are different – they blend the best of Ontario camping with Jewish camping and Jeff understands both."

Camp George is made up of faculty and staff from educational and religious backgrounds. Rabbis and Jewish educational directors live at the camp.

"One of [our] greatest resources is the number of Jewish professionals at camp. It's somehow very different when a kid can sit down on a log and chat. They get to know [each other] as people," Cooper said.

Rose also sees this as an asset.

"[Jewish professionals] are around camp all the time. I think kids like it. They see them as human beings. The idea is to make Judaism a living thing," he said.

Rose hopes to continue to immerse campers in Judaism through the Tikkun Olam program.

"It's the Jewish value of repairing the world," he said. "[Campers] are taught to give back to the community. Last year they learned to respect elderly people, this year we're looking at collaborating with the Koby Mandell Foundation [which helps Israeli children traumatized by terror]."

Rose also plans to use the Birthday Angels program to help teach kids about charity. Through this program, campers who are celebrating a birthday will be able to sponsor a birthday party for a disadvantaged child in Israel.

Ron Polster, the former director of Camp George, has seen the camp grow in the past five years.

"It's a young camp, we needed more of a community spirit," he said. "It's become more of a summer continuum. Campers looked forward to [coming back] and becoming CIT's [counsellors-in-training] or staff."

Cooper has high hopes for Rose.

"He's a passionate person. We're thrilled to have [him] with us," she said.

Community shows support for Israeli soldiers

By RITA POLIAKOV

No army in the world can compare to the Israeli Defence Forces, said Stan Moneta, chairman of the Canadian Zionist Cultural Association (CZCA) at a fundraiser for Israeli soldiers.

Moneta was speaking at a recent gala hosted by the Association for the Soldiers of Israel in Canada (ASI) on behalf of the CZCA. He emphasized the importance of Canadian support, both financially and morally.

"We stand with Israel because Israel's cause is our cause," he said to an audience of around 800 guests. "The IDF are laying their lives on the line not only to protect the state of Israel but [also] for you and all Jews."

Amir Gissin, the consul general of Israel for Toronto and Western Canada, also spoke at the June 1 event. He stressed that Israeli soldiers' activities are not limited to Israel.

"The IDF saves lives, and not just in Israel – all over the world," he said. "When national disasters happen, when terrorist attacks happen, IDF specialists have been there, even in countries that are not so friendly to Israel."

ASI and CZCA support Israeli soldiers and their friends and family. ASI does this through programs such as DIGNITY, which provides special grants to soldiers and their families in financial need. CZCA also has a DIGNITY program that provides food packages for families of soldiers.

Four Israeli soldiers spoke at the gala, offering their thanks and sharing their stories.

Maj. Shay Claper, a husband and father of three, talked about his experience in the middle of battle.

"With bullets whistling over head, [I thought], 'I am going to help [fight] and [rescue] the wounded, but I, myself, may not come back,'" he said.

At the time, Claper's thoughts turned to his children and the last phone conversation he had with his wife a few hours before, during which he had learned that she was pregnant. Still, he did not turn back.

"I [went] to fight. You do it because it's the right thing to do. [There was] no hesitation, you do it with all your heart. You are not fighting just for yourself, you are fighting for your people, for your country, for your children," he said.

The IDF saves lives all over the world

Capt. O., who can't be named for security purposes, is a pilot in the IDF. During a mission, the left engine of his helicopter exploded, forcing him to crash land the aircraft in a manner that would save the lives of the 22 special unit soldiers aboard. After he landed, the soldiers transferred to another helicopter and continued their mission.

"That night, we did two missions back to back. It shows you the kind of determination required," he said.

Capt. O. ended by thanking the guests, who gave the soldiers a standing ovation.

"Your efforts are no different than the efforts of a soldier fighting for Israel's right to exist," he told the audience.

Brig.-Gen. Avigdor Kahalani, the chairman of the Association for the Wellbeing of Israel's Soldiers in Israel, emphasized the importance of supporting the IDF.

"[They] need this kind of evening. [It gives] our soldiers the feeling that we're behind them," he said.

Benefit attendees entertained, enlightened

By PAUL LUNGEN

The Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center (FSWC) has had some pretty impressive fundraising events in past years, featuring A-list headliners.

Last year it was the Goreacle – Al Gore – the former U.S. vice-president and Democratic presidential candidate who is one of the foremost advocates for countering climate change.

A few years before that, his former boss president Bill Clinton headlined the event.

You can't get much more A-list than that. But for 2008, the FSWC may well have outdone itself, if not for celebrity status, at least for interesting, entertaining, thought-provoking and often hilarious presentations.

Led by high-energy, self-deprecating, Cheetos-loving television host Glenn Beck, and supported by the scholarly musings of former Republican House Speaker Newt Gingrich and former Democratic House leader Dick Gephardt, the trio thoroughly engaged 2,600 people, including 1,000 students, attending the Spirit of Hope benefit at the Sony Centre for the Performing Arts.

Speaking in a "Situation Room" format, the threesome opined on a variety of topics ranging from the presidential race south of the border to the dangers posed by Iran to climate change. There was even some mention of the Canadian scene when Gingrich turned to the audience and urged Canadians to get rid of the country's human rights commissions which are, he said, "an act of tyranny." Last week Mark Steyn, a conservative author and columnist, along with Maclean's magazine, were called before a commission tribunal in British Columbia to determine whether excerpts from Steyn's book, America Alone, published in the magazine, violated the province's anti-hate laws by offending Muslims.

A second Canadian reference occurred when Beck, introducing the dignitaries, recited the full title of Jason Kenney, Minister for Multiculturalism and Canadian Identity. "I don't even know what that is," he quipped.

Humour punctuated the proceedings with Gingrich lampooning presidential hopeful Barack Obama's hope/change slogans in a manner that would do Saturday Night Live proud. Beck said "the thing I like about Canada is that you never have to apologize for Jimmy Carter."

But there was also serious discussion during the evening. In opening remarks, Beck described his personal evolution from a Cheetos-eating "slug" being fed the news to a more concerned individual. Sept. 11 changed him and a trip to Israel showed him it was not the country portrayed in the media. It was time for the Cheetos-eating public to wake up and take a stand, he said.

Beck voiced strong opinions on the threats posed by Iran and about the upcoming presidential election. He called the three remaining candidates – Hillary Clinton, John McCain and Barack Obama – Larry, Moe and Curly, and asked, "who is there who really hears what people are saying to move us in the right direction?"

Gephardt said, "I think this will be the toughest time to be president ever."

The new president, he said, should level with the American people on energy, the economy, jobs, terrorism and foreign policy "and ask us to take a stand" – even to make sacrifices.

Providing thumbnail sketches of the candidates, Gingrich said McCain was passionate about security, Clinton was "the least risky" of the three while Obama is "a total wild card." The American people could get lucky and he could turn into another John F. Kennedy. If they're unlucky, he could become a second Carter.

"I don't think he knows who he is," the former speaker stated.

Beck was much more critical of Obama. He noted his links to radicals, including a proponent of suicide bombings, and he pointed to his confusion over which concentration camp his uncle helped liberate (the candidate confused Auschwitz with Buchenwald). More important, Beck said, was that he not appease the kind of people who created the concentration camps.

That led him into a discussion of Iran, whose president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, holds the messianic belief in the return of a lost 12th imam and is willing to hasten his arrival in blood and chaos. A deterrence policy vis-a-vis Iran would not work, he suggested.

Gephardt said the use of force against Iran must remain on the table while Gingrich said Iran has paid no price for its role in the killings of American soldiers in Iraq. The "penalty" could include acts to destabilize and replace the Iranian regime, he said.

Gephardt asserted that reliance on Mideast oil lay at the root of America's problems, including terrorism, and he advocated the government step in to raise taxes and develop alternatives "to free ourselves of Middle Eastern oil."

Gingrich called for development of clean-burning coal plants and for drilling for oil that has already been found in the United States.

"A country determined to be suicidally stupid should not be surprised to pay a cost" for not developing new energy sources, he said.

The event raised more than $1.9 million to support the Friends' education programs that address issues of racism, anti-Semitism, terrorism and genocide.

The event has become the FSWC's "must attend event of the year," Avi Benlolo, president and CEO of FSWC, said.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

We should be wary of Durban II

Guest Voice

By KEITH LANDY

Late last month, more than 100 Jewish leaders from around the world gathered in Geneva at an international conference under the auspices of UN Watch to strategize for what has become known as the Durban Review Conference (DRC).

The DRC, scheduled for April 2009 in Geneva, is a follow-up to the World Conference Against Racism (WCAR), held in Durban, South Africa, in 2001, which was one of the most hate-filled, anti-Semitic, anti-Israel gatherings in recent memory. Given how preparatory conferences for the DRC have developed, it seems clear we are once again heading towards a radical Islamic-inspired hate fest against Israel.

The WCAR, also known as Durban I, became a forum to attack Israel, invoke the infamous allegation that Zionism is a form of racism, and even deny the uniqueness of the Holocaust. Even worse than the official conference was the parallel NGO forum, where many participants openly expressed hatred towards Israel and Jewish NGO representatives in attendance. The forum adopted an extreme declaration that sought not only to criticize Israel but also to delegitimize its very existence.

The final declaration and program of action from Durban I was eventually cleansed of some of its worst language, but only after the United States and Israel withdrew from the conference, and with the help of Canadian officials present at Durban 1. However, the Palestinian-Israeli conflict was the only regional conflict mentioned in these two documents – with "the plight of Palestinians" listed in the section titled "Victims of Racism" – compelling the United States and Israel to cast negative votes when they were submitted to the UN General Assembly for approval.

In December 2006, the General Assembly decided to convene a WCAR review conference in 2009 "on the implementation of the Durban Declaration and Programme of Action," and it asked the UN Human Rights Council (HRC) to plan the conference.

Considering the structure of the HRC and its hostility toward Israel, it was all but certain that the preparatory process would be marred by attempts to single out and censure the Jewish state. Indeed, the committee established by the council to oversee the preparations for the review conference included Libya as elected chair and Iran and Cuba among 19 vice-chairs.

Last fall, the HRC put together a plan to guide preparations for the Review Conference and submitted it to the General Assembly for its approval. The plan went beyond the parameters set by the resolution adopted by the General Assembly in 2006 to accommodate Islamic states seeking to introduce new accusations against the West of "defamation of Islam." Accordingly, the plan stipulated that the Review Conference will not only concentrate on the implementation of the Durban Declaration and Program of Action, but also consider "further actions, initiatives and practical solutions for combating all the contemporary scourges of racism." It also stipulated regional preparatory meetings, although western countries and others expressed opposition to such meetings. As a result, the European Union and other western countries voted against the plan in the General Assembly.

On Jan. 23, Canada courageously announced that it would not take part in the DRC, citing the degeneration of Durban I into "open and divisive expressions of intolerance and anti-Semitism that undermined the principles of the United Nations and the very goals the conference sought to achieve." Canada also said it had hoped the preparatory process would "remedy the mistakes of the past," but concluded that it will not.

Discussions at the recent UN Watch Geneva gathering acknowledged this viewpoint, although a significant number of groups remained wary of pulling out altogether. As such, discussions ensued about developing red lines that, if crossed, will be points of no return. These red lines, once agreed upon, will be the markers for Jewish groups to determine any participation in the 2009 Geneva conference.

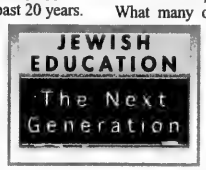
As acknowledged by two General Assembly resolutions, the UN bears a special responsibility to assure that the Holocaust and its lessons are never forgotten and that it will serve as a warning to all people of the profound dangers of hatred, bigotry, and racism. Sadly, plans for the DRC seem more intent on delegitimizing Israel and the Jewish people. All countries that hold to values of democracy and ideals that reject racism and anti-Semitism must stand in solidarity with the Jewish people and deny a legitimate stage to those who would target Israel and world Jewry.

Keith Landy is past president of Canadian Jewish Congress and a CJC delegate to WCAR in 2001. He was a participant in the recent UN Watch conference in Geneva.

Reaching the adult learner

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

With much of the focus of Jewish education centred around children in day and supplementary schools, it's worth noting that there has been a steady and quiet surge in Jewish learning opportunities for adults over the past 20 years.



Although some of this popularity can be attributed to the desire for Jewish growth, it is undeniable that a key factor is social, to feel a sense of community. In a recent study, Diane Schuster and Lisa Grant argue that Jewish adults "tend to initiate new Jewish learning at times of transition in their personal and professional lives… Some are motivated to acquire new competencies; others are looking to socialize with other Jews; others to find answers to spiritual questions."

Because such learning often happens at the margins of the adult's day, and must compete with a myriad of other life commitments (e.g., work, family, entertainment), adult courses are often conducted on a miniature scale, from four to six weeks at a time. The grownup student is a consumer who shops for lectures or courses that seem appealing or directly relevant to their life situation, be it classes on Jewish parenting, Judaism on relationships, or the ethics of money. What many of these students have in common is a desire for a non-judgmental, safe learning atmosphere. The safety is not physical but emotional.

Some adults have bad memories of afternoon or day school, where as children they were subject to less-than-optimal environments, ranging from dull to possibly punitive, and where ostensible intellectual or linguistic deficiencies may have been exposed and commented upon by teachers. Obviously, as adults, they don't want their Jewish educational experience to repeat that cycle of shame. This can lead to some foreboding about engaging in Torah in any way at this point in their lives, which can be offset by a nurturing teacher/facilitator, and by the feeling that their opinion is not only valued but that the accumulation of their life lessons can bring a unique perspective to the textual material being studied.

We tend to understand that a non-threatening and encouraging classroom is seminal to the education of children, but we may overlook its centrality in the lives of adults as well. Despite having "grown up," adult learners still have significant need for comfort and collegiality. Once that is established, reigniting a feeling of competence that the texts can be negotiated and even enjoyed is the fundamental task for the adult educator.

Ultimately, the inspiring of adult learning can bear fruit in many ways. Foremost is the satisfaction of developing a renewed relationship with the heritage of Judaism. But there are also long-term benefits for Jewish families. When children see their parents immersed in Torah study, they are absorbing a powerful message regarding Judaism's beauty and daily relevance. Years later, when those children become parents, they will reach out and back, almost unconsciously, for the Jewish model that they were given by their parents. The recollection of a house in which Torah was valued, not just in word, but in deed, will remain with them forever.

Jewish Life

Revelatory revisionist history

Human Smoke* by Nicholson Baker, Simon & Schuster.

Books
Bernard Baskin

This provocative and disturbing book is concerned with the political and social landscape that gave rise to World War II, up until the time of the participation of the United States.

Nicholson Baker, a confirmed pacifist, has collected 474 brief footnoted vignettes from many sources: newspaper reports, radio speeches, memos, memoirs, public proclamations, etc., that depict mankind's descent into the madness of war.

The book's main figures include Winston Churchill and Franklin D. Roosevelt; members of the international pacifist movement, including Mahatma Gandhi; Adolf Hitler and his entourage; and diarists such as Victor Kemmerer in Dresden and Mihail Sebastian in Bucharest.

Churchill is depicted as a mercurial personality – impetuous, bloodthirsty, fearless and bullying – and exhilarated by war and his power to make history.

One of our great aims Churchill wrote, in July 1941, "is the delivery on German towns of the largest possible quantity of bombs per night." Soon afterward, he said publicly, "It is time that the Germans should be made to suffer in their own homeland and cities something of the torments they have let loose upon their neighbours and upon the world."

This was his undeviating aim even when the bombing was largely ineffectual in destroying military and industrial targets.

In 1927, he visited Rome and declared, "I could not help being charmed by Signor [Benito] Mussolini's gentle and simple bearing, and by his calm, detached poise in spite of so many burdens and dangers."

"If I had been an Italian, I am sure I should have been entirely with you from the beginning to the end of your victorious struggle against the bestial appetites and passions of Leninism."

It was Churchill's decision that the British government hold 11,000 people in its detention facilities, most of them Jews. Eventually, some refugees were shipped to Canada. One inmate wrote, "I am witness to how a great nation thought it right – for the first time in the long centuries of its heroic history – to begin a war for the liberation of western civilization by imprisoning the most embittered enemies of its own enemies."

Roosevelt, regarded as a friend and icon by masses of American Jews, was actually hardly friendly to Jews. In 1922, he noticed that Jews made up one-third of the freshman class of Harvard University. He went to the Harvard board of overseers, of which he was a member. "It was decided," he later explained, "that over a period of years, the number of Jews should be reduced one or two per cent a year until it was down to 15 per cent."

In 1939, Congress considered a bill to rescue a number of European Jewish children. Roosevelt opposed it. As a result, it never left committee. Unhappily, he showed little concern or sympathy for the plight of European Jewry.

Regarding Asia, the author makes clear that the Japanese on a number of occasions protested the military buildup of Pearl Harbor. The American ambassador to Japan warned Roosevelt that he was pushing Japan toward armed conflict, but the president continued his war preparations, which included allocating $100 billion for airplanes alone.

In the volume's afterward, the author confides that the basic questions he hoped to answer were these: "Was it a good war? Did waging it help anyone who needed help?" He believes that peace overtures from the enemy should have been considered and perhaps accepted. It would have prevented the death of millions of human beings and the devastation of much of civilized society.

But, of course, peace with the enemy would have meant ceding Europe to Hitler's Germany and Asia to Japan. Would German and Japanese imperialists have been content with a limited victory? Would the remainder of European Jewry and Nazi "undesirables" been slaughtered without compunction?

This well-documented and revisionist book is revelatory and shocking. It would have us believe that blood-lust was pervasive and that few of the principal figures engaged in the terrible struggle, even on the allied side, had clean hands or merciful hearts.

Summer camp nostalgia, Pt. 1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Hello Muddah, hello Fadduh,
Here I am at Camp Granada.
Camp is very entertaining,
And they say we'll have some fun if it stops raining.
[tinyurl.com/49az2d]

Whether you went to Camp Massad, Camp Ramah, , Camp Moshava… or Allan Sherman's fabled Camp Granada, nothing can compare to those long days and bug-filled nights at summer camp. As your kids count down the days and you finish ironing on the labels, here's a look at some summer camp memories.

Dina Fuchs owes a lot to her summer camp. Her existence. Dina's parents met at a Jewish camp. And Dina continued her family's connection to the camp when she packed up at the tender age of seven. But for Dina, things didn't start off too well: "To me, camp was like a Jewish juvenile detention centre."

Eventually, things changed and now she looks back fondly at those years. "My camp memories still sneak up on me once in awhile. One day, I was walking to my car after a rainstorm and I caught a whiff of that sweet grass-soaked fragrance that lingers after a summer downpour. And in that instant, I was carried back to those sleepy mornings where I stood shivering in the dewy field at Camp Judaea – standing with my hands folded behind me, singing Hatikvah." [tinyurl.com/2haq9j]

A few summers ago, Contact, The Journal of Jewish Life Network, devoted an entire issue to Jewish Summer Camps: Our Precious Resource. If you love camp or want to understand more about it, do yourself a favour and download this lovely 16-page magazine. [tinyurl.com/6875uw]

As you scan the web, it actually is fascinating to note how many scholarly studies you'll find that have examined the importance of camping in Jewish life. One that keeps on coming up is "Limud by the Lake: Fulfilling the Educational Potential of Jewish Summer Camps." [tinyurl.com/5n9wb8]

Given its role in North American Jewish life, it shouldn't be that surprising that the Jewish Museum of Maryland decided to focus on the summertime ritual. The museum's Avi Decter explains that for many Jews, "the fundamental values we acquired came from or were reinforced at summer camp – fairness, teamwork and respect for others, pride and self-confidence, the importance of tradition, a sense of belonging to a community. A show about camping is not history lite, but history lived!" [tinyurl.com/4vcbdh]

Understanding what camp really is like can be daunting for parents, especially if they never had the opportunity to experience it themselves when they were young. If you're in that category and your kids are about to set off, then hitch a ride with Amy Baskin. As the mother of a child at Camp George in Parry Sound, Ont., [george.urjcamps.org] she knows the drill. In Scenes from Summer Camp, she's written a sneak-peak tour for those who don't:

• About the cabins: the camp cabin is a social microcosm where lifelong friendships are forged and every night is a slumber party. Try to ignore the lingering odour of wet towels and grubby socks.

• About the canoe trip: on canoe trips, kids experience the wonder of time slowing down. After a hard day's paddle, a group of usually hyperkinetic 11-year-olds sit silently on a rock transfixed as a beaver swims back and forth gathering sticks for a dam.

Camp is not only a special time for kids but also for the parents they left stranded back in the city. Stay on the same webpage for Parents Do the Darndest Things. Let's just say that this story hits a bit too close to home: "To his profound embarrassment, one 12-year-old camper opened his trunk and discovered his mom had packed all his clothes in 14 separate zip-lock bags. As he was to be at camp for two weeks, there were 14 pairs of socks, 14 pairs of underwear, 14 T-shirts – one complete outfit per bag."

Israeli scientist wins L'Oreal Prize

Credits Weizmann Institute of Science for believing in her

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Ada Yonath, a molecular biologist at the Weizmann Institute of Science, has become the first Israeli to receive the $100,000 L'Oreal and UNESCO For Women in Science Life's Work Prize.

Five prizes are awarded annually to outstanding female scientists on each continent. Yonath represented Europe/Israel. The prize was established by the cosmetics company in 1998 to promote the advancement of women in science.

Born in Jerusalem in 1939, Yonath is a crystallographer best known for her work on the structure of ribosomes. She received her PhD at Weizmann and in 1970 established what was for nearly 10 years the only protein crystallography laboratory in Israel.

At a recent roundtable discussion at L'Oreal Canada's Toronto offices, Yonath said L'Oreal helps promote women in a field that is typically male dominated.

"The barriers and challenges facing women in science are not scientific. The challenges lie in the fact that women are less motivated to compete at higher levels. They worry more about their families than men, and they don't often have the emotional support necessary to pursue high-level studies."

Michael Meyer, national executive vice-president of Weizmann Science Canada, said that although 50 per cent of Weizmann students are women, few of those "end up in academia."

Ada Yonath is a molecular biologist at the Weizmann Institute

To encourage women to pursue postdoctoral studies, he said, a special scholarship has been set up at Weizmann.

One recipient of that scholarship, physicist Nirit Dudovich, worked at the National Research Council in Ottawa before becoming the first female senior scientist at Weizmann, he said.

Yonath said that she spends a lot of time encouraging girls to go into science.

"I meet with girls to show them what I do, we have a camp for science lovers, and we sponsor physics tournaments," she said. "We try to give equal opportunity to males and females. We don't want to discriminate either positively or negatively."

Growing up, Yonath said, she was always interested in science, and she conducted her own experiments at home.

"Once, I broke my arm trying to calculate the height of our balcony, and another time, a fire broke out when I tried to see if water moves faster than kerosene. [The problem started] when my father came outside to smoke."

After high school and military service, she earned her bachelor's degree in chemistry and master's degree in biophysics at Hebrew University before joining Weizmann.

She also held a number of postdoctoral positions – always balancing her career and her family, she said – at such places as the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and Carnegie Mellon University, and she has won prizes for her work, including the Israel Prize, the Wolf Prize (Israel's equivalent to the Nobel Prize), and Columbia University's Louis Gross Horwitz Prize.

She credits Weizmann for believing in her before she began winning prizes. "They let me work on something that might not have matured. They saw a light at the end of the tunnel."

Group for people with eating disorders gets grant

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Eating Disorders of York Region (EDOYR) has received a $125,500 grant from the Ontario Trillium Foundation.

The award, recently presented by Thornhill MPP Peter Shurman and Trillium Foundation volunteer Gary Gladstone at a reception at Thornhill Square, will be paid over three years.

EDOYR, a not-for-profit organization, was founded in 2004 by a group of parents and friends whose families had been affected by eating disorders, mainly anorexia and bulimia. It was to be primarily a support group, but also intended to seek increased government support and assistance for people with these diseases.

Meetings were held in various locations until last September, when permanent facilities were opened at Thornhill Square.

Janice Morgante, executive director of EDOYR, said the grant was to pay for staff, an executive director, two facilitators and part of the rent for the offices.

"The idea is to help organizations get on their feet," she said, not to be permanent funding. The foundation helps define and carry out a graduated series of goals.

EDOYR has held a number of public information nights, which, Morgante said, have been well received. It has gone to schools, established a resource centre and library, and held programs. It has also organized support groups, therapy groups, open forums and special events.

Telephone referral lines and help lines have provided information and help to an increasing number of people, she said. The website has been beefed up, and more volunteers have been recruited.

The Ontario Trillium Foundation, an agency of the Ontario government, provides grants to charitable and not-for-profit organizations working in the fields of arts and culture, sports and recreation, the environment, and human and social services.

One of the requirements for the grant is more fundraising. Every year, Morgante said, the organization holds Wings of Hope, a gala and silent auction. Last year's event raised $50,000, she said, and plans are underway for the 2008 program, A Salute to the Sensation Sixties, to be held in November.

A media release stresses that eating disorders, "contrary to popular belief, do not have anything to do with food or weight. They are unhealthy coping strategies that are adopted to help the individual deal with underlying stressors that are too difficult or painful to approach head on."

Eating disorders, the release asserts, "are devastating, life-threatening illnesses that have severe physical and psychological ramifications for individuals and their families."

In fact, the daughter of one of the founders of EDOYR died last month from complications of what speakers at her funeral called "this insidious disease."

Book offers new take on parents and Jewish schools

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Alex Pomson and Randal Schnoor originally set out to write a book about teachers in Jewish day schools, but as their research progressed they shifted their focus to parents.

Their new book, Jewish Day School in the Lives of Adult Jews (Wayne State University Press, $26.95), focuses on Toronto's Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School.

The Penna school is unique, among other reasons, for its non-traditional location away from the suburbs where most of the Jewish community lives, and for its student population, which has an uncommonly high proportion of children of intermarried or same-sex couples.

But Schnoor, a sociologist who teaches at York University's Centre for Jewish Studies, and Pomson, a senior lecturer at the Melton Centre for Jewish Education at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, maintain that lessons can be drawn from their research that are broadly applicable.

"It's not that the phenomena we saw there don't occur anywhere else," said Pomson. "What was unusual was the intensity of the phenomena because of the intensity of the proportion of families that don't have deep Jewish backgrounds or large Jewish networks.

"Our argument is that it's possible that more such families could be attracted to Jewish day schools if the schools knew better how to talk their language."

The book began as a sabbatical project for Pomson when he served as co-coordinator of the Jewish Teacher Education Program at York University.

Early in the project, his focus was on how teachers translate ideas for use in the classroom. But the more time he spent at the school, the more he became aware of "the frequent and often intense presence of parents," he said in a phone interview from Chicago on a recent visit to North America.

Schnoor and research assistant Dafna Ross came on board following the receipt of a research grant five months into the project.

As research progressed, Pomson said, "we were frequently deeply surprised by how meaningful and deeply important what parents were doing, was to them as adult Jews."

The widespread nature of that discovery, which was observed in the two other Toronto day schools and three American ones that were studied, came as a surprise to Pomson, a father of four whose children attended an Orthodox day school in Toronto before the family moved to Israel in 2004.

Another surprise for Pomson was the role of non-Jewish parents in the school community. "I came to the project deeply skeptical about the possibility of raising Jewishly literate and committed kids in intermarried families, and I saw plenty of examples of families who were intermarried and who were deeply invested in their children's education.

"Whether you can generalize from that, I don't think I'm prepared to say, because this is a really small sample, but I was surprised by how seriously interested many non-Jewish parents were in their child's schooling."

Another phenomenon noted in the book was the role the school played in some cases by acting as a synagogue substitute, in part by providing a Jewish community and also by serving as a resource for information on Judaism.

Pomson said that "very little" has been published on the subject of day schools, and even less on the subject of day school parents.

He expects the new book will be used in academic settings, both graduate and undergraduate, in courses on contemporary Jewry and Jewish education. As well, he said, professional and lay leaders of Jewish day schools may discover new ideas about the relationship between parents and their children's schools.

Schools may not realize that parents look for schools to help them connect to their peers, to a Jewish community and to Jewish learning, said Schnoor. "They might want to pay more attention to that in the marketing of their schools."

The father of a 3-year-old daughter and 2-year-old son, Schnoor – who graduated from United Synagogue Day School and the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto – found the project had personal relevance for him and his wife as they investigated Jewish schools for their children.

As a parent, said Schnoor, "I'm looking for, among other things, a parent body that I'm going to feel comfortable with over the next few years."

Although he noted that there is more to a school than its parent body, "the research reinforced for me the importance of the way a school can provide a comfortable fit for a Jewish parent."

Omission

In "Israel faces leadership crisis: Birthright co-founder" (CJN, May 29), some information was omitted. Evan Cooperman and Warren Blatt co-chaired the "Bay St. Meets Wall St." event.

Alleged terrorists saw Canadian Jews as 'enemies'

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Canadian Jews are the enemy.

That's the gist of phone conversations recorded by legal wiretaps between individuals who allegedly plotted to carry out terrorist attacks in Canada, a Toronto man's trial heard last week.

Snippets of the recorded conversations heard in a Brampton, Ont., courtroom June 5 included one alleged co-conspirator exhorting another to attack a Jew if he was "pro-Zion" or if he "wears a big Jewish thing" – likely referring to a kippah or shtreiml.

Another excerpt had an alleged co-conspirator stating to another that Jews are "all our enemies. It's not enough to say they're only my enemy in a certain part of land… every single Jew is your enemy."

The trial stems from a massive police terror investigation that led to the arrest of 18 Torontonians, mostly young offenders, in June 2006. Charges against seven of the accused have been stayed.

The man on trial was 18 when he was arrested. Now 20, he's the only young offender still being charged as an outcome of the investigation.

Bernie Farber, CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress, told The CJN his organization was taken aback by the wiretap evidence.

"While viscerally we have always understood this hatred is out there, it nonetheless remains shocking to see it come out in a court of law," Farber said.

He added that Congress has always striven to reach out to Canadian Muslims to bridge gaps between the two communities and will continue to do so.

"We've broken bread with them," he said proudly

"We will continue our work with the moderate Muslim community, which makes up, I believe, the vast majority of Muslims in this country," Farber added. "Sadly, it is more difficult to reach out to those [radical Muslims] who want to see you dead and buried."

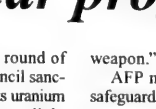
UN body shines new spotlight on Iran's nuclear program

According to Reports



By PAUL MICHAELS

Iran, already under a third round of (albeit tepid) UN Security Council sanctions due its refusal to suspend its uranium enrichment program, is in the spotlight again regarding its nuclear ambitions.

In a May 26 report, the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) expressed "serious concern" that Iran is hiding information about possible nuclear weapons work.

Iran has long denied that it's aiming to develop nuclear weapons. Last November, it felt vindicated by the bombshell U.S. National Intelligence Estimate (NIE) report, which claimed, "with high confidence," that Tehran had halted its nuclear weapons program in 2003.

At the time, most of the media reported the NIE claim as established fact rather than what it was – a high-probability estimate. Largely missed was the further claim that the NIE judged "with moderate-to-high confidence that Tehran at a minimum is keeping open the option to develop nuclear weapons" and has "the scientific, technical and industrial capacity" to do so.

What makes the IAEA expression of serious concern about an Iranian nuclear weapons program so important is that it comes from a UN agency rather than a U.S. government body. Recent American intelligence estimates have been either skeptically received or wrapped in controversy, as was the case when the Central Intelligence Agency reported that former Iraq dictator Saddam Hussein was working on nuclear weapons just prior to the U.S.-led invasion in 2003.

In "Look Who's Tough on Iran Now" (New York Times, June 1), William J. Broad wrote: "In the annals of role reversal, the switch by the United Nations' atomic sleuths in Vienna and the American intelligence community has been striking. Having long taken a back seat to the Bush administration in publicly challenging Iran's nuclear program, the global inspectors last week moved into the driver's seat, demanding that Tehran come clean on any progress it has made toward building a bomb."

In "IAEA meets to discuss Iran's alleged nuclear weapons work," June 2, Agence France Presse (AFP) reported that the IAEA report alleged that "Iran may have been looking into high explosives of the sort used in implosion-type nuclear bombs, and exploring modifications to missiles consistent with making them capable of delivering a nuclear weapon."

AFP noted that the IAEA's head of safeguards, Olli Heinonen, briefed diplomats on the technical aspects of the report and "expressed 'alarm' that Iran has in its possession a document describing the process for making what could be the core of a nuclear weapon."

The IAEA apparently accepted the previous NIE estimate that Iran suspended its nuclear weapons program a few years ago. However, it is refusing to accept Tehran's repeated denials that it had been working on nuclear warheads. The UN agency is demanding that Iran disclose 18 secretly obtained documents. It views Iran's defiant push for uranium fuel as the key ingredient that can be used to easily revive its weapons program. (Israeli and other experts strongly believe that Iran never ceased working on the warheads.)

The Economist's May 31 editorial, "Iran's endless filibuster," pointed to three specific target areas of the IAEA inquiry: "high-explosive testing of triggers for nuclear bombs, a plan for an underground nuclear-test shaft, and efforts to redesign the nose-cone of Iran's far-flying Shahab-3 rocket to accommodate a nuclear warhead."

Iran is denying work in any field and generally is stonewalling any request for documents or information.

Precisely what can be done to force Iran to comply remains the principal challenge for the international community. But at least this is something the international community now understands it must do, most likely through economic sanctions that actually have teeth. If all else fails, the threat of military action remains an option.

* * *

In "Iran blames 'Zionists' for rising food prices" (National Post, June 4), Malcolm Moore wrote from Italy that Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad "used a United Nations food summit in Rome [on June 3] to attack Israel, hinting that 'Zionists' were behind rising food prices across the world."

This is the latest crazed statement from the Iranian president, who the day before, on his first visit to Western Europe, used the occasion to declare that it would serve the interests "of the people of Europe if Israel ceased to exist."

Canadian to attend child survivors' reunion

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Leslie Kleinman plans to attend an unusual reunion in Germany.

Kleinman, a Holocaust survivor who is originally from Romania, will be the sole Canadian at the gathering, which is scheduled to take place in Kloster Indersdorf from July 27 to Aug. 2.

A retired dress manufacturer from Sauble Beach, Ont., he will meet 13 other survivors (and their relatives) from Israel, Britain, Brazil and the United States at the planned reunion.

Anna Andlauer

Kloster Indersdorf, near Munich, was a displaced children's centre established by the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration after the end of World War II.

For a brief period, Kloster Indersdorf catered to former forced labourers from Poland, but from July 1946 onward, it housed only Jewish survivors like Kleinman.

Born and raised in Satu Mare (Satmar) on May 29, 1929, he is the sole survivor of a large family that was wiped out during the Holocaust.

His father, a rabbi, died in the Soviet Union while digging trenches for the Romanian army. He was sent to the Russian war front by the Romanian government, an ally of Nazi Germany.

In April 1944, following his death, Kleinman, his mother and seven siblings – three brothers and four sisters – were deported to Auschwitz.

Separated from them after their arrival in that concentration camp, Kleinman never saw them again. Against all odds, he survived the rigours of Auschwitz for about a year.

He was liberated by the American army on April 23, 1945 after a "death march" from Flossenburg to Dachau.

"A Jewish sergeant found me and took me to a U.S. military hospital," Kleinman said in an interview last week.

Several months later, having recovered from his ordeal, he was placed in Kloster Indersdorf – then the site of a Bavarian monastery – where child survivors from Poland, Romania and Hungary found a refuge.

Within about six months, Kleinman was dispatched to a youth hostel in London, England.

He lived in England for 35 years, raising a family and earning a living in what he describes as the "shmatte trade."

He and his wife immigrated to Canada in 1980, settling in Sauble Beach, a resort close to Owen Sound.

He looks forward to the reunion, which is being organized by a German citizen, Anna Andlauer, a 57-year-old retired grammar school teacher.

"It will be a unique chance for the survivors to see each other again," she said from her home in the town of Indersdorf.

Andlauer has a keen interest in the Holocaust, having worked as a guide at the former Dachau concentration camp for 20 years now.

She has also written newspaper articles and a book about survivors.

Not until recently did she learn that child survivors were cared for in Kloster Indersdorf.

Galvanized by her discovery, Andlauer began to research the topic, finding photographs and lists of survivors at the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, the Museum of Jewish Heritage in New York City and the United Nations archives.

Jewish girls in Kloster Indersdorf in 1946. If you recognize yourself or anybody you know, please contact Anna Andlauer at andlauer@onlinehome.de

She then wrote hundreds of letters and e-mails in an attempt to track down former residents of Kloster Indersdorf. So far, Andlauer has turned up the names of 30 such survivors.

"Anna found me through two boys, now living in San Francisco, who had studied with my father," said Kleinman, who belatedly plans to celebrate his bar mitzvah on May 31 in Owen Sound.

"He missed his bar mitzvah during his time of persecution," Andlauer explained.

Ga'ava provides social network, support for GLBT

By RIVA GOLD
Special to The CJN

MONTREAL — Ga'ava is a new student-run organization serving the gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgendered (GLBT) Jewish community in Montreal.

Ga'ava (Hebrew for "pride") aims to create and sustain a social network for people of various sexual orientations across the city. Since its formal launch party at l'Original in March, the group has hosted several events, from movie nights to a special "pride-oriented" Birthright trip.

Ga'ava was launched in December by its president Joey Waknin, a current McGill student and former Concordian. "Feygelah [the previous Jewish GLBT umbrella group in Montreal] was inactive, so there was no longer a place for GLBTs to gather together," he said.

Waknin and students from other campuses wanted to help GLBTs feel that they are part of a group within the Jewish community. With the support of Hillel Montreal and a handful of other organizations, they founded Ga'ava.

Aside from social events, Ga'ava also provides support services to assist those struggling with their sexual orientation. Its projects are designed to meet various health and social needs of GLBT Jews.

"We will gladly offer an ear to anyone who needs one," Waknin said. "We direct people towards moral support and self-acceptance. As the name implies, you have to have pride in your identity and be proud of who you are."

Ga'ava also aims to create a safe space for GLBTs within the broader community. "We're trying to develop awareness through education," Waknin said. "We try to create an inclusive group that will unite all members of the Jewish community, gay or straight."

It's no coincidence that Ga'ava boasts an extremely wide assortment of members. "We're open to everyone," Waknin said. "We strive to create a place where anyone can feel welcomed, regardless of their sexual orientation."

The organization includes Jews of every sexual orientation, be they heterosexual, homosexual, lesbian, bisexual, asexual, transgendered, or pansexual (a sexual orientation characterized by the potential for esthetic attraction, romantic love and/or sexual desire for people, regardless of their gender identity or biological sex).

At the same time, Ga'ava also aims to help people adhere to their Jewish heritage while accepting their orientation. The organization is open to Jews from all streams. "We're here to promote diversity," Waknin said.

Next year, Ga'ava hopes to expand its member base. Currently, those building the organization are students from Dawson College, McGill University, University of Montreal, l'Université du Québec à Montréal , Concordia University and even the University of Toronto.

"We've been working pretty intensely on reaching out to new members from different places," Waknin said. In future, he hopes to expand the core group. "We are hoping a more varied set of individuals will be willing to offer an extra hand."

Waknin said that there are many projects in store for Ga'ava in the years to come. "I don't want to spoil the surprises... but we will be present everywhere there's a Jewish concentration," he said.

Seniors' taxi service is a well-kept secret

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Mort Weisberg, supervisor of Circle of Care's transportation services department, wants to share a well-kept secret.

For almost nine years, the agency has been transporting seniors to appointments, grocery stores and social engagements for a nominal round trip fee.

The program started in 2000 with one vehicle and one part-time driver doing 40 rides a month, he said, and has grown to include seven vehicles, with two on order, and 11 drivers doing 1,500 rides monthly.

"We still have capacity for more passengers. I don't want to keep this service a secret," said Weisberg, a retired advertising executive who was a driver himself for two years before taking on his present position.

He said drivers can pick up passengers anywhere in the service's catchment area – Centre Street in the north to St. Clair Avenue in the south, and Dufferin Street in the west to Bayview Avenue in the east. It is a two-zone service, with Sheppard Avenue being the dividing line.

The price for the service is $10 for a home-to-home round trip for one zone, and $15 for a round trip through two zones, which "lies somewhere between a taxi and Wheel-Trans, but many people are not eligible for Wheel-Trans because they need to prove a disability."

The exception, Weisberg said, is that the service includes trips to North York General Hospital at Leslie Street and Sheppard, which is outside the catchment area. "We stress medical appointments – they are working towards a downtown hospital run – and we want to make it easy for seniors to have easy access to their doctors."

People in their 50s who have a disability may be considered, he said.

Weisberg said the service provides more than a ride. "The drivers are all 'junior seniors,' and we pick up passengers in our brand-new vans and create a social environment for them. We also load their groceries onto the van and then into their homes. Passengers have praised our drivers and called us their lifeline. They're able to maintain some independence, and they don't have to depend on their family."

Weisberg, who came to Circle of Care two weeks after he retired from advertising, said that he's never felt so good about working with people. "It is a treat for me to come to work."

Passengers need good cognitive skills, he said, and the vans are not wheelchair accessible.

The service is available Monday to Thursday from 9:15 a.m. to 4 p.m., and Friday until 1 p.m. Rides can be booked up to three weeks in advance for medical appointments, and passengers can call for a ride at the last minute, he said. "Chances are we will be able to take them. There is no penalty for cancelling, so spots open up."

There is typically a three-day waiting period to sign up for the service. For information, call 416-635-2860.

STUDENT FUNDRAISERS:

Students at Leo Baeck Day School's south campus present a cheque for $965 to Ellen Schwartz, third from right, co-founder of Jacob's Ladder, the Canadian Foundation of Control of Neurodegenerative Disease. The students beaded bracelets and necklaces over recess time and sold them at open houses to support the cause. Pictured with Schwartz, from left, are Pauline Landen, Samantha Flomen, Jaclyn Flomen, Kaley Willer and Eric Petersiel.

The degree of Doctor of Philosophy (Honoris Causa) is awarded to Dr. Goodall in recognition of her global contribution as a humanitarian, conservationist and peace activist and, in particular, for her initiative in founding Roots & Shoots – a global program that encourages young people to address both human and environmental issues in their communities, and aims to foster a new generation of enlightened leaders.

Presented by Canadian Friends of Haifa University in partnership with the Jane Goodall Institute of Canada, proceeds from the Tribute Dinner will be directed to the following projects in Israel and Canada:

- the establishment of Jane Goodall Scholarships in Environmental Studies for bright, deserving students at the University of Haifa, and the creation of a Roots & Shoots program at the University, and
- funding for ongoing development and expansion of the Roots & Shoots program in Canada, including the establishment of a youth leadership component and the creation of national youth campaigns.

So, how much do you want to lose weight?

Lisa Weinberg

About Nutrition

Q. I have tried to lose weight many times, and I really believe that I know what to eat and what not to eat, but I just can't seem to stick to any diet. Why is this?

A. This is such a common scenario that you are not alone. I often spend a lot of time with patients who are trying to lose weight, educating them more about the behavioural aspects of weight loss than about the nutritional requirements.

Many people trying to lose weight have been doing so for most of their lives. They are "professional dieters" who have read numerous books, tried many diets and are very well-educated on how to diet. So why are they unsuccessful? I think you want to consider a few possibilities that may apply to your situation.

One thing I believe is necessary when it comes to weight loss is is to have a clear understanding of the difference between wanting to lose weight and being willing to do the work required. It's much easier to say you really want to lose X amount of weight, or weigh a particular amount, or look like her or him, or like you did before. Or you want to fit into certain clothes. But are you willing to do the work needed? This is a tough but honest question. If the answer is a resounding, definitive yes, then you are guaranteed success in achieving your goal. If it's a more hesitant commitment, then you may be in for a bit of an uphill battle or in need of changing your thought process more than just your diet. If you frequently want to eat the piece of cake, etc., in front of you, more than you want to lose the weight, then the cake will often win.

You want to change your thought process from looking at a food and saying or thinking, "I want that and I can't have it" – in other words, feeling deprived, to instead believing that "I can have it, but I don't want it, because it's getting me further away from my goal."

There may be a few other obstacles at play here, too. Many people unintentionally sabotage themselves, for example, by having tempting food in the house. It's not good enough to say, "I have willpower. I can avoid all of my favourite foods." You have to get them out of the house, out of your car, off your desk and out of your purse, or you are setting yourself up for failure. Few people have enough willpower to avoid these temptations, and I think that's OK and normal.

We all have foods that call our name, foods that when they are in the pantry or on the counter, call to us. So don't buy them! It's much easier to walk by them in the grocery store once than to do so in your kitchen a hundred times. I know what you're thinking – I hear it all the time – "there are other people in the house who eat it too." They probably don't need it either.

The other very significant barrier in weight loss often is why we eat. Everyone knows that sometimes we eat if we are bored, depressed or stressed, or simply for social reasons, but it is really important to look at ourselves and evaluate how often we do this, in order to determine if it is having a negative impact on our weight or health. Once we have identified if or when we eat for emotional or social reasons alone, we can start to implement strategies to reduce this behaviour and, more importantly, to recognize when it's happening.

The last strategy that I find educational for people perpetually struggling to lose weight is probably the easiest – keep a food diary. This entails writing down everything you eat and drink every day, including portions. You must do this right after eating, and not try to recall accurately at 11 o'clock at night what you ate all day. There are two reasons this works. First, people are often shocked to see what they actually ate while watching TV, for example, or what they snacked on while cooking dinner. More importantly, it makes you think twice about everything you eat when you know that you have to write it down. Committing to black and white is taking ownership, and you will make smarter choices.

For anyone struggling with why weight loss seems difficult to achieve or stick to, consider whether some of these suggestions might apply to you and whether you can adopt any of these strategies to assist you in being more successful.

For every "good" day you have, pat yourself on the back, because it is hard work. Good luck!

FUNDRAISING POWERHOUSE: Amanda Belzowski, 10, presents Rocco Rossi, centre, of the Heart and Stroke Foundation of Ontario with a cheque for $101,087, representing the total amount she has raised for the foundation by selling lemonade over the last 10 years. This year, she raised money in memory of her great-grandfather, David Dale, who passed away in December. He had an artificial heart valve and had helped Amanda right from the beginning 10 years ago. With Amanda and Rossi at the June 1 Becel Ride for Heart are her father Dan, who is holding her brother Joshua, and her mother Lisa.

CARNIVAL KIDS: Grade 1 student Rachel Bloom and her brother Benjamin, in Grade 5, were all smiles May 28 after enjoying the carnival rides at the annual barbecue at United Synagogue Day School's Beth Tikvah campus.

Doctor quits rather than treat ailing man

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Special to the CJN

WINNIPEG — The doctor who originally wanted to remove an Orthodox Jewish man from life support last fall has resigned from Winnipeg's Grace Hospital, saying that "continued support of the patient is tantamount to torture."

The trial to decide whether the hospital has the right to remove Sam Golubchuk's life support against his family's wishes and religious beliefs is set to begin Nov. 24, almost one year after Golubchuk's family initially obtained an injunction against doctors who wanted to remove the 84-year-old from life support.

In an affidavit, Dr. Anand Kumar said he withdrew his services because it is "in violation of my medical ethics to continue [treating Golubchuk]." He also said he believes that the "services administered in accordance with the [injunction] order are not of any medical benefit," and in fact cause harm to Golubchuk because they're uncomfortable and painful.

In his resignation letter, Kumar wrote, "If we honestly attempt to follow the Court mandate to focus on keeping Mr. Golubchuk from his natural death, we will likely have to continue to surgically hack away at his infected flesh at the bedside in order to keep the infection at bay. This is grotesque. To inflict this kind of assault on him without reasonable hope of benefit is an abomination. I can't do it."

On June 3, Grace Hospital made a motion to the Court of Queen's Bench to have the trial moved up from November to September because Kumar quit.

Gord McKinnon, the hospital's lawyer, told the court Kumar's resignation leaves the facility with only five intensive care specialists.

Dr. Elizabeth Cowden, the hospital's chief medical officer, said in an affidavit that if other physicians were also to withdraw their services, the intensive care unit "may be forced to close."

The court also heard from the hospital's lawyers that Golubchuk is "barely above a vegetative state," and that nurses are also experiencing a great deal of stress in providing care that they believe is harmful to a patient's dignity.

The lawyer for Golubchuk's family, Neil Kravetsky, responded that Golubchuk's condition is no worse than it was several months ago, and that it has actually improved from last November, when the court first issued the injunction preventing the removal of Golubchuk from life support.

Kravetsky noted that the hospital could have appealed the injunction to a higher court but did not do so.

He also said that because he is a sole practitioner, he will not be ready to conduct the trial at the earlier date. He emphasized that the complex case will involve bringing in out-of-town medical experts, and that moving up the date would leave him with inadequate time to properly prepare his case. He also has another trial set for September.

Kravetsky argued that the idea other intensive care specialists at the hospital may follow Kumar's lead in resigning is "merely a hypothetical."

In any event, he said, the case will take months to go through the courts, particularly since it's unlikely that a judge would render a decision immediately after a trial.

Chief Justice Marc Monnin is expected to make a decision regarding trial dates shortly. In the meantime, the injunction remains in force.

Golubchuk has been in the intensive care unit since last October, when he was admitted suffering from pneumonia and pulmonary hypertension, and was put on life support Nov. 3.

Montreal bagels eaten in outerspace

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

Could there be better free publicity on – or off – the planet than to have it revealed that the renowned Montreal bagel has been eaten among the stars?

Or can bagels be so good as to be literally out of this world?

That was the case recently after media across Canada reported that Montreal-born astronaut Greg Chamitoff, aboard the Discovery space shuttle on his way to a six-month stay at the International Space Station, lifted off on May 31 carrying with him 18 authentic Montreal sesame seed bagels from the Fairmount Bagel Factory.

It couldn't hurt, of course, that Chamitoff's aunt, Mona Shlafman, owns the business.

Gregory "is in touch with us all the time," said Cote St. Luc resident Shlafman, whose late brother, Usher (also known as Ashley), was Chamitoff's father.

"He called us up and said he would like to take some bagels along."

The general media got wind of it through a family friend, Sol Boxenbaum, who disclosed the news on a program he hosts on radio station CJAD.

"After that, people were calling us left, right and centre," Shlafman said.

As was reported in a March 27 CJN interview, Chamitoff and his family moved to California when he was 11 after spending his formative years in Chomedey, Laval.

Shlafman said that although her nephew was originally informed he could take a mere seven bagels along as part of a "wish list" the astronauts get, she sent him four packages of six anyway, of which he was ultimately allowed to bring three on board.

Shlafman, who sent the bagels to her nephew only one day before blastoff to maximize their freshness, is also pretty confident they were all eaten up by the time the crew got to the Space Station two days later.

She said the recent media coverage has been the most the family has gotten since the Bagel Factory reopened its doors almost 30 years ago. She said if St. Viateur Bagel – the city's other main contender for king of the bagel hill and only one block away – was in any way envious about the publicity, "they didn't show it," and were in fact very gracious.

Her nephew always enjoys her bagels during his visits to Montreal, she said, including prior to the current mission when he and the Discovery crew underwent training on the Canadian-designed robotic arm at the Canadian Space Agency in Longueuil.

Shlafman said she was "very, very nervous" prior to her nephew's liftoff, but said he received spiritual support through "two beautiful Jewish prayers" given to him by Shlafman's daughter, Rhonda, and granddaughter Jacqueline Rose, 7, a student at United Talmud Torahs in Snowdon.

In his personal possessions kit, Chamitoff also carried with him on board two rocket-shaped, handcrafted mezuzot designed by Tel Aviv judaica silversmith and artisan Laura Cowan.

He is scheduled to return to Earth in the fall.

First Nations group supports Israel

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Special to the CJN

WINNIPEG — An aboriginal Christian leader here has founded a new solidarity organization with Israel in honour of Israel's 60th birthday.

Rev. Raymond McLean, the pastor of the First Nations Family Worship Centre, launched the organization, World Indigenous Nations for Israel, to galvanize support for the State of Israel.

"No one in the aboriginal community has ever done this before. We will go from church to church, and I believe that within two years we can have one million people registered as members," he said. The group's motto is, "Wherever we stand, we stand for Israel."

A recent celebration of Israel's birthday in Rev. McLean's church on Flora Avenue, in the heart of the north end of the city, was televised by Songs of Living Waters Ministries, an affiliate of the Miracle Channel. The Miracle Channel is a Canadian Christian television station.

Rev. McLean, who was in Israel for Yom Ha'atzmaut, had brought back Israeli flags, which were used to decorate the church. Dale Jack, an aboriginal woman, sang Hatikvah at the celebrations.

"We are going to be celebrating all year, because the Jewish people got their land back that God had promised them," Rev. McLean told the revellers at the Israel birthday festivities. "As long as we're going to be on this planet, we stand with Israel…We are commanded to love Israel and to pray for the peace of Jerusalem.

"I believe that since the Jewish people are God's chosen people, we have to stand with them."

Christian aboriginal leader Rev. Irvin Wilson also spoke at the event. "We are going to stand with the real indigenous nation, the people of Israel," he said.

Those attending the event sang and danced, many with Israeli flags in hand, during the celebration that lasted for more than two hours.

Phyllis Godfrey, an aboriginal woman, held a "tabert," a round decorative item with tassles on it while she danced at the event. She said she made the tabert, which was decorated with a Magen David and a dove, by hand.

Rev. McLean has been to Israel eight times and will be leading a tour to Israel this July. "I try to lead two trips a year to Israel," he said.

He also attended the Walk for Israel, which took place here on May 25, in celebration of Israel's 60th birthday.

People can join World Indigenous Nations for Israel online when the organization's website is up.

שיאר ספרים

שבוע הספר במרתף של סיגל

שנים נהנתי לשמוע רבים וטובים מיכם מתלוננים שאי אפשר להשיג בטורונטו ספרות טובה עכשווית מהארץ, ושאת הכל צריך להביא משם. אז יש לי הודעה בשבילם-לא עוד!

מאחר וענף התקשורת הטלפונית משותע לכוח עבודה קבוע, כי סטודנטים נשארים שם תקופות קצרות בלבד -הקים ד"ר ויגש קורס להכשרת בעלי המוגבלויות, והעובדים שלו נחטפו לעבודה.

בתג הפסח קיבל ד"ר ויגש מכתב תודה מהעובדים שלו ובו היה כתוב: "זהו תג חירותנו הראשון".

כל הסקרים מראים שאם יתקיימו בחירות עכשיו-תימחק מפלג תקדימה, וממפלגת העבודה כמעט לא ישאר דבר. לשון אחרת-הליכה לבחירות ביוזמת מפלגת העבודה או קדימה תביא למחיקתן. יתרה מזאת-גם ש"ס והגימלאים עושים רושם כמו מי שלא ירוויח בבחירות מוקדמות. מאוד ברור שהמרוויחים הישירים יהיו נתניהו והליכוד.

כל מי שמכיר את ההידבקות לכיסא של הפוליטיקאי הישראלי המצוי מבין שאנשי העבודה, קדימה וש"ס לא יבצעו התאבדות המונית רק כדי לראות את נתניהו עולה.

ועל כן הדרכה יותר סביר שלמרות התצהרות-יסכימו השותפים הקואליציוניים למנהיג חדש למפלגת קדימה-קרוב לודאי ציפי לבני. אבל שישאר בינינו.

Peace Now made the 'unthinkable thinkable'

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Peace Now made the "unthinkable thinkable," says Sheldon Gordon, the president of Canadian Friends of Peace Now, which marks its 28th anniversary this year.

"Peace Now has won legitimacy, in Israel and the Jewish Disapora, for the idea of a two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian dispute," said Gordon, referring to the Israeli grassroots movement that has called for territorial compromise and Palestinian statehood since its inception exactly three decades ago.

"Even Likudniks pay lip service to the concept," he added. "It wasn't that long ago that the idea of partitioning the Land of Israel was heresy to the right. Even the centre rejected the possibility of a PLO-led Palestinian state. Peace Now has made the unthinkable thinkable."

Gordon, who has headed CFPN for the past year, says it has played a valuable role in this country. "CFPN, by its presence, shows that the Jewish community is not monolithic in its views on Israel, and that it is legitimate to question policies of an Israeli government while at the same time supporting the state of Israel and its right to exist in peace and security."

Saying that Peace Now has exerted considerable influence on Israeli politics, he said, "It says something that the prime minister of Israel today talks like a member of Peace Now."

Peace Now was founded in March 1978 after Israel and Egypt launched peace talks. Concerned that the then Israeli prime minister, Menachem Begin, was not sufficiently flexible, a group of Israeli soldiers and officers wrote a letter asking him to desist from steps "that could cause endless problems to our people and our state."

They argued that Jewish settlements in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip were counterproductive and that Israel's occupation of the territories could undermine Israel's Jewish character.

Thirty years on, Peace Now – which monitors the building of Jewish settlements in the territories and strives to bring together Israelis and Arabs in dialogue forums – advocates policies that are consistently supported by "a majority of Israelis in public opinion polls," Gordon observed.

Sheldon Gordon

Nonetheless, CFPN – a constituent organization of Canadian Jewish Congress – is for all practical purposes shunned by the Canada-Israel Committee. "It's hard to be part of the debate, let alone influence it, when we are denied a seat on the Canada-Israel Committee's board," he said.

Gordon, a journalist, admits that CFPN is still far from popular among some Canadian Jews.

"There's no denying we are a minority taste in the Jewish community. That said, we are considered more 'respectable' and 'mainstream' today than in the early 1980s. My goodness, we're even welcome to hold events in Conservative synagogues, which wasn't always the case. The Canadian Jewish News writes articles about us and covers our events. Even the Jewish Tribune [the house organ of B'nai Brith Canada] does so from time to time."

CFPN was founded in 1980 by Mel Shipman in Toronto and by Dr. Frank Guttman in Montreal.

"We don't have members as such," Gordon said. "We have supporters, donors, 2,500 across Canada. The number has held fairly steady."

Peace Now supports a comprehensive settlement of the Arab-Israeli conflict that would facilitate Arab recognition of Israel.

"The Beirut plan, reaffirmed by the Saudis, provides such a framework," he said in a reference to a 2002 Arab peace plan that calls for a full Israeli withdrawal from the territories and a resolution of the Palestinian refugee problem in exchange for peace and normalization with all member states of the Arab League.

"Peace Now would welcome a peace settlement based on whatever degree of territorial withdrawal by Israel is acceptable to both sides," said Gordon. "This is likely to require an Israeli withdrawal from the West Bank, in the case of the Palestinians, and from the Golan Heights, in the case of Syria, that is far reaching and may not be total. Israel [may be able to retain] some settlement blocs in the West Bank in return for compensating the Palestinians with alternative territory."

Gordon said that Israel's settlements are not the sole impediment but definitely "a major obstacle" in the attainment of peace.

He warned that their continued growth may "foreclose any eventual possibility of peace."

Asked if he is hopeful about the prospects of peace now or in the near future, he replied, "We've learned from sad experience that it never pays to be overly hopeful about the Arab-Israeli dispute."

Indeed, he noted, Peace Now suffered a series of setbacks with the collapse of the 1993 Oslo peace process, the eruption of the second Palestinian uprising in 2000 and the ascension of Hamas following its victory in 2006 parliamentary elections and its seizure of Gaza last June.

Nevertheless, Gordon points to what he described as "hopeful signs."

As he put it, "One is that Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of Israel and President Mahmoud Abbas of the Palestinian Authority both seem sincere in their desire for a peace settlement. They are hampered, however, by their domestic political weakness.

"Another hopeful sign is that Israel and Syria are engaged in indirect negotiations through Turkey. Yet another encouraging sign is that the hands-off approach of the Bush administration toward the conflict might be succeeded by a more activist U.S. administration, particularly if Barack Obama is elected president in November."

Gordon said that Israel should try to strengthen Abbas, at least in the eyes of Palestinians, by dismantling roadblocks and checkpoints not vital to its security yet interfere with "Palestinian economic and labour mobility within the West Bank."

He urged Israel to continue negotiating indirectly with Hamas, through Egypt, so that a long-term truce can be signed that results in the release of abducted soldier Gilad Shalit, who was kidnapped near Gaza two years ago this month.

Gordon warned that Hamas can block a peace agreement. "It can play, and is playing, the role of spoiler. It's somewhat surreal for Abbas and Olmert to be negotiating a final-status agreement while Hamas is firing rockets at Sderot and triggering Israeli retaliation that harms Palestinian civilians in Gaza."

He opposes Israel's current blockade of Gaza. "It has been a moral and strategic failure. It punishes Gaza's entire civilian population with severe humanitarian deprivation, which is unethical, and has totally failed to dislodge Hamas or weaken its hold on power in Gaza."

Iran's pursuit of a nuclear capability, within the context of a radicalized Middle East, is the greatest external threat Israel faces, according to Gordon.

On the home front, the biggest internal threat Israel confronts is its "fragmented and dysfunctional political system," which he said, thwarts the achievement of a realistic peace agreement that the majority of Israelis and Palestinians could support.

Military recruitment targets Jewish community

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

When it comes to public perceptions about the military, there are several myths that recruiters, both in Canada and the United States, have to contend with. Like the one that says only poorly educated people with few prospects would enlist, or another that holds that the pool of potential recruits has dried up because of unpopular wars in Afghanistan and Iraq.

In fact, applications to the Canadian Armed Forces were so numerous in the past year, recruiters responded by increasing their quota to 6,800 from 6,400. Thousands more were turned away.

In the United States, the Pentagon announced this month that all military services met or exceeded their recruiting goals for April. The Marine Corps led the way, signing 142 per cent of the number it was looking for.

As for the educational level of soldiers, the military on both sides of the border boast higher levels of educated personnel than can be found in the general population.

In fact, providing a university education or training in a trade is one of the Canadian Armed Forces' key enticements and is one referred to often by Maj.-Gen. Walter Semianiw, chief of military personnel of the Forces. New recruits can combine a top level education in the field of their choice, paid for by the Forces, with the opportunity to serve their country, he said.

Semianiw made his pitch to the The CJN as the military ramps up its efforts to seek new recruits in the Jewish community.

That effort is just getting underway, and a complete marketing strategy hasn't yet been developed. But Semianiw expects the campaign will include advertising and personal appearances at synagogues and high schools.

The target market is 19-to-25-year-olds, but recruits in their late 40s are also welcome, he said.

The Forces will be expanding in the next few years and needs more people. As part of a $30-billion renewal, the military will expand to 100,000 soldiers, sailors and airmen, up from the current 89,000. Both the regular forces and reserves will grow. The regular forces will increase to 70,000 from 65,000, and the reserves to 30,000 from 24,000.

Reserves train on weekends and during the summer, and are posted within Canada, unless personnel volunteer for service abroad.

Semianiw, who calls himself the forces' CEO for human resources, said military recruitment within the Jewish community "is part of a broader effort as part of a diversity piece."

A "passionate" proponent of diversifying the Forces, Semianiw said the military ought to reflect the reality of Canadian society.

"The greatness of the country is its pluralism," he said on the line from Ottawa. "It is a mosaic, and by and large, people live peacefully together."

Canadians have an international reputation as an effective force, including in non-combat roles of reconstruction and negotiation. Semianiw attributes that to Canadians' comfort in dealing with people of different backgrounds, a strength that translates well abroad.

In preparing a pitch to the Jewish community, Semianiw sought the advice of Rabbi Reuven Bulka, co-president of Canadian Jewish Congress.

Rabbi Bulka said he was "delighted" at the interest shown in the Jewish community by the general.

"I'm a military man from way back," Rabbi Bulka said. "I appreciate it when people put their lives on the line to protect our freedom. You can't take that for granted."

Rabbi Bulka said Congress supports the Forces' recruitment efforts, and he expects to join Semianiw in presenting the virtues of military life.

"He wants to go on a road show together to speak to various and sundry Jewish audiences," Rabbi Bulka said.

The Forces don't currently possess a statistical breakdown of its ethnic composition, though that data might be gathered in coming years. "I can't tell how many Jews there are, but I know there are some," Semianiw said.

(The military has added two Jewish chaplains, even though Rabbi Bulka said there are hardly enough Jewish soldiers to warrant it. He called it a "visionary" development, especially in view of expected higher numbers of Jewish recruits.)

The Forces has lots to offer Jewish recruits, the general continued. At the head of the list is the opportunity to serve Canada as instructed by the country's political leadership. Jewish soldiers can do so knowing they need not compromise their unique identities.

Semianiw said soldiers' "hard [field] rations" are already kosher and providing kosher food for those who request it "is where we are heading." Soldiers will also be accommodated so they can observe Jewish holidays. Other religious requirements will also be respected, including religious clothing and the treatment of injured or killed soldiers.

Those accommodations are not limited to Jewish personnel. "It is about allowing individuals to practise their faith" and stepping away from "a cookie-cutter approach" towards military personnel, he said.

Then there are the educational benefits – "the big selling point," said Rabbi Bulka.

The Forces offers recruits the opportunity to pursue a post-secondary education and professional development at taxpayers' expense, Semianiw said.

Soldiers can take their degree at recognized Canadian institutions of higher learning, with the military underwriting a three or four-year degree and even post-graduate education, all the while paying recruits a monthly wage of about $700, he said.

In exchange, the military expects at least three years of service.

Once recruits join the regular forces, they are paid at competitive rates. Reservists, who work in their regular jobs during the week, earn a daily wage during weekend and summertime service. They include people in all sorts of professions, Semianiw noted, doctors and lawyers among them.

When a national emergency strikes, such as spring flooding in Winnipeg or ice storms in Quebec, the Forces dispatch reserve volunteers to assist.

And what about the combat role of the Forces? Or even jumping out of the back of an airplane, as is highlighted in recent Forces television advertising?

Recruits can apply to more than 100 jobs, among them the search-and-rescue crew, known as Sartech. Those are the guys seen in TV commercials parachuting out of a plane or being lowered out of a Cormorant helicopter on a rescue mission.

Semianiw said participating in combat missions is only one of many reasons Canadians join the Forces.

"At the end we want people to join who want to serve the nation,' he said.

"As part of serving the nation you develop a warrior spirit," and that includes "protecting, defending and upholding Canadian values," he added.

U.S., Israel close to stopping Iranian nukes: Olmert

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

WASHINGTON — After meeting with U.S. President George W. Bush in Washington last week, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said the end of Iran's controversial nuclear program was approaching.

"With every day that passes, we are getting closer to stopping Iran's nuclear program," he said, adding that substantial steps are being taken to handle the Iranian threat in "a more effective manner."

Olmert added that, as a result of the hour-long meeting with Bush, there were fewer question marks between the two allies concerning the means, time constraints, and level of U.S. determination in dealing with the Iranian nuclear program.

"Naturally, the Iranian issue was central to our talks, and our shared point of departure is the need to deal with Iran before it manages to acquire non-conventional capabilities," Olmert told reporters.

He said the two leaders also discussed the talks with the Palestinians and Lebanon, and Bush asked to be briefed on developments with Syria, with whom Israel recently re-started peace talks.

"Every day that goes by we are making significant steps in dealing with this problem [Iran]. We, with the world under American leadership, are dealing with it in an effort to reach the goal which is to prevent Iran from acquiring [nuclear] arms," Olmert said.

Asked about Democratic presidential nominee Barack Obama's speech last week to the AIPAC conference, in which he vowed that Jerusalem will forever be Israel's undivided capital, Olmert said he did not hear the speech himself, but that "from what I heard, [Obama, U.S. Senator Hillary Clinton and Republican presidential nominee John McCain] had impressive performances [at AIPAC] and I am very impressed by these declarations. I will speak with all of them by phone."

Iran is an "existential threat to peace," Bush told Olmert.

"It is very important for the world to take the Iranian threat seriously, which the United States does," Bush said as he began White House talks with Olmert, who was visiting amid a corruption scandal at home that could drive him from office and disrupt the Israeli-Palestinian peace process.

The Washington talks came a day after Olmert issued his toughest warning yet to Tehran, saying Iran's nuclear program must be stopped by "all possible means."

Bush assured Olmert of the U.S. commitment to Israel.

Olmert, at Bush's side in the Oval Office, agreed that Iran poses "the main threat to all of us."

Olmert also told Bush that Israel appreciates the comments he made during his visit to Israel last month, when he participated in celebrations of the country's 60th anniversary. Olmert told his host that Israel values his friendship and commitment to its security.

Israelis continue to offer aid in Burma

They have also dispatched medical specialists to train 500 local doctors to deal with large-scale disasters.

"They are not used to dealing with massive natural disasters, so our teams went into a couple of hospitals in Yangon and trained them on how to deal with massive casualties, [sharing] the expertise that our doctors gain in Israel because of suicide bombings," Zahavi said.

IsraAID has been gaining recognition and respect in the region because of the success of its efforts.

Last month, Israel was one of about 50 countries invited to attend the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) conference, which was held to raise funds for disaster relief.

Dr. Ephraim Laor, an IsraAID representative, was asked by Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs to join Israel's ambassador to Yangon to attend and present an overall plan to assist the population affected by the cyclone.

Zahavi said that permits to enter villages in the Delta region were hard to get, but because of the connections IsraAID made with local officials, it was able to obtain government approval to enter them.

Speaking last Thursday, he said that members of the third Israeli relief team had been in Myanmar for the previous two weeks, and he said he hoped they would soon be replaced by another team.

He said the amount of time that IsraAID spends in Myanmar will depend on the funding it gets.

Israeli medical professionals who volunteered with IsraAID in Myanmar led a class to train local doctors and nurses how to deal with large-scale disasters.

Zahavi said he is looking into establishing a long-term medical rehabilitation program and has approached some of IsraAID's donors in Israel and North America, including UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, for funding that would allow IsraAID to remain in Myanmar from six months to a year.

"Currently, with the funding that we have from the Jewish federation of Toronto and a couple other federations and private donors, I think we'll be able to work there for the next month or month-and-a-half," he said.

Federation president Ted Sokolsky said he is pleased to have established a relationship with IsraAID.

"Whenever there are these kinds of disasters and relief efforts, we always think of IsraAID first, because we really trust their ability to get into troubled areas of the world effectively and efficiently," Sokolsky said.

The $20,000 that the federation donated last month went entirely to fund IsraAID's mission, and it has since donated another $20,000, Sokolsky added.

"There is a double benefit. Obviously, the good work that they do is really important, but we also back them because we think it's great for these parts of the world to get another view, a positive view, of Israel and Israelis."

Zahavi said that he is thrilled about his connection with the federation.

"I can tell you for a fact that they're one of the few federations that really understand the basic need to respond immediately to these disasters... They also understand the concept of international aid and using Israeli expertise," Zahavi said.

"We really see this as a fruitful partnership, and we're overwhelmed with the support of the Jewish community there."

Few Jordanians will mention 'Israel'

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Special to The CJN

AMMAN, Jordan — As Israel celebrates its 60th anniversary, it is difficult to find people on the streets in the cities of Jordan who are willing to utter the word "Israel."

For the majority of Jordanians I spoke to, all of the land between the Mediterranean and the Jordan River is "Palestine," notwithstanding the existence of a 1994 peace agreement between Israel and Jordan.

In the small, remote village of Umm Qais, Ibrahim Al-Arousan, 37, sat in the Resthouse Restaurant, which has a commanding view of the Kinneret, the Golan Heights and the Galilee. Al-Arousan has a degree in conservation and heritage management from Yarmouk University in Irbid, Jordan.

Looking toward the Kinneret, Al-Arousan said, "There is Tabariyyeh [Tiberias], and Lake Taberiyyah [the Sea of Galilee] in Palestine… Before the occupation in 1948, my father and uncle used to travel back and forth with their caravan of camels from Taberiyyeh to Um Qais."

In Um Qais, where few Westerners ever visit, virtually none of the villagers will use the word "Israel." Shopkeepers Omar and Salam Malkawy told visitors, "You must go to the [Resthouse] restaurant to see the view of 'Palestine.'"

When Mustafa Mahmoud, who is studying accountancy, was asked whether he would like to visit Lake Taberiyyah, he answered, "No, don't want to go. War," he said, gesturing as if he is holding a gun.

Mahmoud's friend, Hammad Ibraham, from Amman, looked toward Israel and said, "It's dangerous." He added that he is afraid to go to Israel, since he would be shot at there.

In Madaba, outside of Amman, Esau Amjad, a university-educated tour guide, refers to a mosaic map of Ashkelon as "Ashkelon, Palestine."

In the village of Pella, Adnan Matar, a wealthy building contractor, looked out past the Jordan valley and said, "That's Palestine, occupied Palestine." When asked what he sees beyond the West Bank, he refused to say "Israel," but answered, "That's west of Palestine."

Bob, an American archeologist, who wouldn't give his last name, recalled that he once used the word "Israel" when in a taxi in Amman, and he said he could feel the tension afterward. As a result, he tells friends who visit not to use the word.

In Amman and it's environs, many tourist shops sell coffee mugs with a map of the West Bank and Gaza, as well as Israel proper, with the word "Palestine" on it. The map has the Israeli cities of Tel Aviv and Netanya marked on it. There are also gold necklaces with the same map, marked Palestine, for sale.

Abdullah Aloush, of Um Qais, who speaks English fluently, made a distinction between Jews and Israelis. "There's no problem, for Jews coming here. Even if the villagers know they are Jewish, nobody will be against them." But when asked about Israelis coming to visit, Aloush will not use the words "Israel" or "Israelis."

In the five-star Royal Amman Hotel, Mohammed Alkalq, who is studying hotel management and was raised in Jenin, in the West Bank, said he left Jenin because of the economic stagnation there. "There is no tourism in Palestine, because of the war there."

When asked who the war is between, he answered, "Between Palestine and the Jews." When asked if he means that there is a war between Palestine and Israel, he refused to use the word "Israel." He answered, "No, between Palestine and the Jews."

Erin is an American who lives in east Jerusalem and was travelling in Jordan. She refused to give her last name. "I was surprised at how many Palestinians I met used the word 'Jew' but not the words 'Israel' or 'Israelis,'" she said.

About 60 per cent of Jordan's population is made up of Palestinians who fled, mostly from the West Bank, during the wars of 1948 and 1967 and after the Gulf War in 1991.

The relatively few Jordanians I encountered who were willing to use the word "Israel" are not of Palestinian origin.

For example, at the Pella Resthouse, built in 1992 by U.S. aid, manager M.E. Deeb Hussein said, " I have been to Israel four times. I studied archeology in Jordan and Israel. I have been to the Weizmann Institute in Rehovot and to the Hebrew University in Jerusalem… Everyone is welcome here. "

Mohammad Janajrah, a driver for Payless Car Rentals in Amman, who recently retired from the Jordanian army after 18 years of service, said he wants to go to Israel.

"My parents went to Tel-Aviv and liked it, and some day I, too, will go."

American Christian builds Jewish library in Lithuania

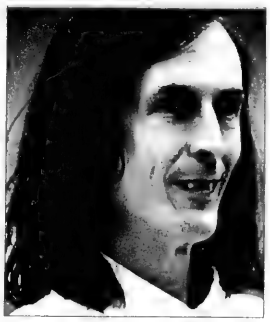
By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

An American Christian of British and Irish descent has embarked on an ambitious project to create a Jewish library in Vilnius (Vilna), whose legendary Jewish community was virtually wiped out by the Nazis in Lithuania.

Wyman Brent, a 45-year-old Baptist originally from Lynchburg, Va., is using his own funds to build the library, but his project is backed by a corps of supporters ranging from British historian Sir Martin Gilbert to the co-founder of the National Organization for Women, Sonia Pressman Fuentes.

"I've always loved libraries and I'm fascinated with Jewish culture," said Brent, who hopes to have the library up and running by 2010, the 65th anniversary of the end of World War II.

If all goes according to plan, it will have a collection of 100,000 books, CDs and DVDs, and will serve as a venue for concerts, art exhibitions, poetry readings and lectures.



Wyman Brent

The proposed library will be nothing if not eclectic.

"If the book is by a Jewish author, it can be on any topic, whether it has a Jewish theme or not," Brent said in an interview from San Diego, Calif., where he currently lives. "If the book is by a non-Jewish author, whether it is fiction or non-fiction, the topic must have some Jewish connection as long as it is not anti-Semitic."

All books will be in English so as to draw in the greatest possible number of users, he explained.

"It will attract locals who are looking to improve their English. The idea is to make the library the largest source of English language material in Vilnius. The study of English is very popular in Lithuania now that it a member of the European Union.

"And if they gain some familiarity with Jewish culture and shed some prejudice along the way, all the better," he added. "What better legacy to leave than a place of learning and education dedicated to fighting prejudice and intolerance?"

Brent, who has been working on the project since 2004, has collected 4,000 books so far, mainly at his own expense.

"While I am like Tevye in that I am not a rich man," he said in a reference to the fabled dairy farmer in Fiddler on the Roof, "it has been a pleasure spending what little money I have in buying books for the library."

Still other books have come from the Vilnius Jewish community and Hillel, the North American Jewish student organization.

As well, the musician Janis Ian has donated CDs and the painter Judy Chicago has promised artwork once the library opens.

"Sir Martin has agreed to donate a signed copy of each of the 79 books he has written or edited," Brent noted.

Brent, an online merchant, chose Vilnius as the site of the library after falling in love with the city on his first visit in 1994. He went to Lithuania in the first place because of his fascination with the republics of the former Soviet Union.

"I returned in 1995 and lived there for a full year, both in 1996 and 1997 and 2001 and 2002. This year, I lived in Vilnius for over two months.

"Another reason for choosing Vilna is that it was a centre of Jewish culture and learning [in the first three decades of the 20th century]. There is a good reason it was known as the Jerusalem of Lithuania. With more than 100 synagogues and prayer houses, and with so many Jewish newspapers, it was a city which spread Jewish thought around the world."

Brent intends to launch the project by opening a small version of the library next year. "Vilna will be the cultural capital of the European Union in 2009 and thus will be the focus of media attention. It will be a perfect time to open up something Jewish. Then I hope to open up a permanent location in 2010."

He is being assisted by a Lithuanian Christian, the proprietor of a chain of hostels who believes in his project and is currently looking for a proper site, probably on Pylimo Street, where a synagogue and three Jewish museums are located. "Non-Jewish Lithuanians have voiced interest in and support for the library," Brent said.

Nevertheless, he pointed out, there is an undercurrent of anti-Semitism in Lithuania today.

Jewish institutions in Vilnius have also rallied behind the project.

"The staff of the Vilna Gaon Jewish Museum, the Vilnius Yiddish Institute, the Jewish Culture and Information Center and the principal of the Jewish school have expressed support. And so has the Israeli Embassy."

Brent conceived the project after one of his friends wrote an article on Jews in Tijuana, Mexico.

His immersion in Jewish culture per se, however, began when he started reading books about World War II and the Holocaust.

A high school graduate who has been a voracious reader all his life, Brent is an agnostic who respects all faiths and has a special admiration for and affinity with Jewish culture.

"I am not the king of the world and I can never end anti-Semitism, but if I can open a few minds to the beauty of Jewish culture, I will have done my part to make the world a better place."

Israel Briefs

Shelling kills Negev man

An Israeli man was killed and four other people were wounded last Thursday when Palestinians in the Gaza Strip fired a mortar shell into Kibbutz Nir Oz in the western Negev. Amnon Rosenberg, 51, a father of three from nearby Kibbutz Nirim, was killed when the shell hit outside the paint factory at Kibbutz Nir Oz, southwest of Sderot. Three of the casualties were moderately wounded and the fourth sustained minor wounds in the strike. All the victims were hit with shrapnel from the shell. Not long after the mortar shell strike, Palestinian doctors said a four-year-old girl was killed and her mother wounded by an Israel Air Force attack on Gaza.

Abbas wants Hamas talks

Mahmoud Abbas called for reopening dialogue with Hamas. In a televised speech last Wednesday evening to the Palestinian people, the Palestinian Authority president offered no details about future talks. In his address, Abbas criticized Israel for continuing to build in the settlements and he pledged to call for new presidential and parliamentary elections if the dialogue with Hamas is successful, Associated Press reported.

Israel identifies remains

Israel confirmed that body parts received from Hezbollah belong to Israeli military servicemen killed in the Second Lebanon War. Military sources said that DNA testing performed on human remains repatriated from Lebanon determined that they came from a four-man air crew whose helicopter was shot down by Hezbollah during the 2006 war and an infantryman hit by a missile in a separate battle. Hezbollah handed over the body parts June 1 after Israel freed a Lebanese-born Jew who had completed a prison term for spying. Nine soldiers killed in the 2006 war were not buried intact, Israeli sources said.

More houses for Jerusalem

Israel announced plans to build hundreds of new homes in Jewish neighbourhoods of eastern Jerusalem. The Housing Ministry said June 1 that it would invite construction bids for 763 new housing units in Pisgat Zeev and 121 in Har Homa. The projects, Housing Minister Zeev Boim was quoted as saying, are part of the Israeli government's effort to "bolster" the capital. Pisgat Zeev and Har Homa are on land that Israel captured in the 1967 Six-Day War and where Palestinians want to found a state, though they are included in Jerusalem municipal limits. The Palestinian Authority denounced the new housing plans, saying they contravened the U.S.-sponsored "road map" peace plan that requires a freeze on settlement construction in the West Bank.

U.S. presidential nominees address AIPAC

Israeli, U.S. safety essential, says McCain

BY RON KAMPEAS
JTA

WASHINGTON — No religious group rejects the Iraq war more than American Jews do. But in a bit of political jujitsu, John McCain is making the policy his own in his plea for Jewish votes.

The Republican presidential nominee made headlines – and drew heavy fire from Democrats – for launching this year's American Israel Public Affairs Committee conference on June 2 with an attack on Democratic nominee Barack Obama's Iran policy.

But more remarkable was how McCain, an Arizona senator, chose to close his speech: defending his commitment to an unpopular war by casting it as important for Israel's safety.

"Another matter of great importance to the security of both America and Israel is Iraq," he said. "You would never know from listening to those who are still caught up in angry arguments over yesterday's options, but our troops in Iraq have made hard-won progress under Gen. Petraeus' new strategy."

McCain was referring to the troop escalation that he advocated a year ago, and that was carried out under the command of David Petraeus, the top U.S. commander in Iraq.

John McCain

"It's worth recalling that America's progress in Iraq is the direct result of the new strategy that Senator Obama vehemently opposed," McCain continued. "Allowing a potential terrorist sanctuary would profoundly affect the security of the United States, Israel and our other friends, and would invite further intervention from Iraq's neighbours, including a very much emboldened Iran. We must not let this happen."

The line earned applause at the AIPAC policy conference – the lobby's membership skews more hawkish on foreign policy than the wider Jewish voting public – but how it will play with the broader American Jewish public remains to be seen.

Jews and black Protestants oppose the war in greater numbers than any other religious group – more than 70 per cent, according to some polls. That and McCain's commitment to conservative social mores – particularly his anti-abortion positions and stated admiration for recent GOP judicial nominations – would apparently make him a difficult sell to American Jews.

But recent polling has shown McCain – in a race against Obama – faring much better among Jews than any Republican candidate has since former president Ronald Reagan. In a Gallup poll of Jewish voters last month, McCain garnered 32 per cent again Obama's 61 per cent, substantially better than the 24-75 oreak President George W. Bush earned in 2004.

McCain's backers credit a "straight talk" strategy, which would explain McCain's tack at the AIPAC conference: they say voters favour a candidate who says what he means even when they don't agree with him, the backers say.

"What is most strikingly different from other candidates is that he is strongly principled and an independent thinker," Lew Eisenberg, a McCain campaign national finance co-chairman, told JTA. He cited McCain's backing for the surge a year ago and his backing for an unpopular immigration reform bill around the same time.

Democrats are not allowing McCain's "straight talk" reputation to go unchallenged. In his AIPAC speech, McCain targeted Obama's signature foreign policy distinction – his willingness to directly engage with the leaders of pariah nations, including Iran.

"The Iranians have spent years working toward a nuclear program, and the idea that they now seek nuclear weapons because we refuse to engage in presidential-level talks is a serious misreading of history," McCain said.

That sparked a long, detailed reply from the Obama campaign outlining the Illinois senator's advocacy of tough Iran sanctions bills and resolutions. The statement also continued a Democratic plan to associate McCain with Bush, the most unpopular president in polling history.

"John McCain stubbornly insists on continuing a dangerous and failed foreign policy that has clearly made the United States and Israel less secure," the Obama statement said. "Here are the results of the policies that John McCain has supported, and would continue. During the Bush administration, Iran has dramatically expanded its nuclear program, going from zero centrifuges to more than 3,000 centrifuges.

"During the Bush Administration, Iran has expanded its influence throughout a vitally important region, plying Hamas and Hezbollah with money and arms. During the Bush Administration, Hamas took over Gaza. Most importantly, the war in Iraq that John McCain supported and promises to continue indefinitely has done more to dramatically strengthen and embolden Iran than anything in a generation."

In a recent interview with the Atlantic, McCain showed a willingness to chart his own course, even while echoing much of Bush's thinking on Iran and Iraq. In particular, he signalled a commitment to playing a more active personal role in Israeli-Palestinian talks.

"I would have a hands-on approach," McCain said in the interview, in sharp contrast to the current president's much-noted reluctance to play such a role. "I would be the chief negotiator. I have been there for 30 years. I know the leaders. I know them extremely well. [Israeli Defence Minister] Ehud Barak and I have gone back 30 years. I knew [Prime Minister Ehud] Olmert when he was mayor of Jerusalem. I've met many times with [Likud leader Benjamin] Netanyahu. I've met with [Palestinian Authority President] Mahmoud Abbas."

Republicans' foreign policy has hurt Israel, says Obama

By AMI EDEN
JTA

WASHINGTON — After months of seeking to paint each other as opposites on Mideast policy, Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton were on the same page June 4 at the AIPAC policy conference as they ripped into the Bush administration and Republican presidential candidate John McCain on several fronts.

In back-to-back speeches a day after Obama clinched the Democratic presidential nomination, the two U.S. senators eschewed any attempt to differentiate themselves. Instead, they both argued that the Bush administration's policies on Iran and Iraq have hurt U.S. and Israeli interests.

They also sought to paint McCain as bent on carrying out those same policies if he wins the presidency.

Obama began his remarks with praise for Clinton and her candidacy, and the New York senator returned the favour, assuring the thousands of delegates at the annual policy forum of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee that Obama would be a dependable ally in the White House.

Barak Obama

"I know Senator Obama knows what is at stake here," Clinton said of her colleague from Illinois, adding, "Let me be very clear: I know Senator Obama will be a good friend to Israel."

Jewish Democratic insiders said the speeches not only signalled a rapprochement between the candidates, but reflected the emergence of a wider, more aggressive party strategy for fending off Republican efforts to peel away Jewish votes and contributions.

A few years ago, many Democratic activists and lawmakers would have been content to stick with the line that both parties were equally strong on Israel. Now as Iran pushes ahead with its nuclear program, support remains low for the Iraq war and Israel continues to face Hamas rocket attacks, Jewish Democrats see an opening to rebut the Republicans' claim to be the party that's best for Israel.

"This is a new approach," said Steve Rabinowitz, a Democratic consultant whose communications firm also does work for many Jewish organizations. "Two years ago, many thought it would be difficult to persuade people that [President] George W. Bush had not been good for Israel, even dangerous to try it. It's not only a case that can be made now, it's also true."

Rabinowitz said many Democrats feel emboldened to push that argument given the Republicans' harsh rhetoric about Obama and Israel. McCain, an Arizona senator, has portrayed Obama as a Hamas-supported candidate, and Bush delivered a speech at the Knesset last month that many observers viewed as an attempt to tag the Illinois Democrat as an appeaser.

In his own speech to AIPAC on June 2, McCain said Obama's plan for a phased Iraq pullout would create a "potential terrorist sanctuary" that would profoundly "affect the security of the United States, Israel and our other friends, and would invite further intervention from Iraq's neighbors, including a very much emboldened Iran."

But Obama fired back, painting Republicans as advancing a reckless foreign policy that has hurt Israel.

"I don't think any of us can be satisfied that America's recent foreign policy has made Israel more secure," Obama said. "Hamas now controls Gaza. Hezbollah has tightened its grip on southern Lebanon and is flexing its muscles in Beirut. Because of the war in Iraq, Iran – which always posed a greater threat to Israel than Iraq – is emboldened, and poses the greatest strategic challenge to the United States and Israel in the Middle East in a generation.

"Iraq is unstable, and Al Qaeda has stepped up its recruitment. Israel's quest for peace with its neighbors has stalled, despite the heavy burdens borne by the Israeli people. And America is more isolated in the region, reducing our strength and jeopardizing Israel's safety."

"Senator McCain refuses to understand or acknowledge the failure of the policy that he would continue," he said. "I refuse to continue a policy that has made the United States and Israel less secure."

In a conference call immediately after the speech, McCain's highest profile Jewish supporter, U.S. Senator Joe Lieberman, rejected Obama's arguments, saying he was wrong to blame Iran's resurgent power on the Iraq war.

"If Israel is in danger today, it is not because of American foreign policy," Lieberman told reporters. "It's because Iran is a terrorist, expansionist state."

For most of the speech Obama voiced unabashed support for Israel. At one point, though, he did say that Israel could do more to ease Palestinian suffering and live up to prior commitments to refrain from building new settlements. Obama also stressed the need for a two-state solution, adding that Israel must remain a Jewish state with secure borders.

Obama also made several points more often associated with his hawkish Jewish critics: he insisted that Jerusalem must remain Israel's undivided capital and stressed his willingness to resort to military force if diplomacy failed to thwart Iran's nuclear ambition.

"I will do everything in my power to prevent Iran from getting a nuclear weapon," he said. "Everything."

Obama also appeared to hedge on what some saw as an openness to Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

Though Clinton appeared to draw a warmer reaction, Obama received several standing ovations, including when he spoke of Judaism's commitment to social justice and the importance of forging strong ties between the Jewish and African-American communities.

1948...They Were There

In Jerusalem, 'it was a miracle they got through it'

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Canadian Miriam Beckerman, who made aliyah to Israel in 1947 and stayed for five years, said that people who come to Israel today have no idea what the pioneers did and tend to take the existence of the country for granted.

Beckerman, 80, an award-winning Yiddish translator, experienced the highs and lows of living in Israel before, during and after Israel's War of Independence, and she recalled a time when the country was established by Jews dedicated to founding a Jewish state.

Miriam Beckerman today

As a teenager living in Toronto, Beckerman was a member of Habonim, a Labour Zionist youth group.

"People like [Israel's first prime minister David] Ben-Gurion used to come to Canada – we had a real Zionist education – and we were asked to join Hechalutz [a Zionist group that operated agricultural training farms] and go to Israel, and I took it seriously," Beckerman said.

"But a lot of people aren't aware that a Canadian Jew in 1947 could not go legally to live in Eretz Israel... European [Jews] had a chance if they could get a certificate, the DPs, but they weren't going to give certificates to Canadians or Americans, because there was no urgency there."

But she explained that at the time, Canadians were British subjects and had British passports, so she was given clearance to go to Palestine, since it was then ruled by the British Mandate.

She said before making aliyah, she and all the other Zionists were sent to hachsharot (agricultural training farms).

"People who were waiting to go to Palestine, the Zionist youth groups would go to hachshrah, where they would live and work communally and learn a little about farming and agriculture, to prepare you for working the land [in Israel]."

By 1947, Beckerman was prepared to make aliyah, and she travelled to New York with a friend named Harry Berstein where they boarded the Marine Carp.

"It was converted from a wartime ship – it wasn't like the luxury ships. It must have been a troop ship," she said.

"I had heard stories about immigrants when they came to Canada, how rough the trip was and how they suffered. The first three days out of New York were very stormy and rough, and I thought, 'Oh God, how am I going to get through this?' But after three days it was OK," she said, adding that the journey lasted two weeks.

She said that representatives from the Sochnut, the Jewish Agency, were on the ship, because although the British ruled Palestine then, the Sochnut was in charge of Jewish immigration.

Beckerman said that when she was given her identity card, she was asked for her passport.

"Being very naïve, I handed over my passport. They said, 'When you get to the kibbutz, you'll get your passport back.' When I finally got it back, I realized that they had used it to bring in people from the DP camps. How do I know? Because it had a stamp on it from Italy, and I knew I had never been to Italy. They had taken out my picture and used it to bring in other immigrants."

She said she assumed it was the work of the Bricha, the illegal immigration movement founded in 1945 that brought European Jews, Holocaust survivors, to Israel.

She said she was 19 when she arrived in Kfar Blum, a kibbutz in the Upper Galilee, in 1947.

"Kfar Blum is in the Hula Valley, and all around were hills. The hills were bare and you couldn't see beyond the hills, so it was like you were buried in a hole. It was so depressing. It wasn't as though you were close to any city," she said.

"The thing about arriving in Kfar Blum was that I had no family, I didn't know the language and it was not easy."

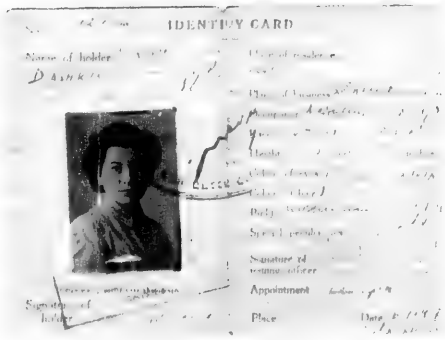
She stayed in Kfar Blum for about three months, until her friend, Berstein, told her that he would be relocating to another kibbutz, Ramat Yochanan, and she decided to go with him.

"They had a group of youth aliyah there from Italy... They had a Palmach group [the Haganah's fighting force] there and there you could get the feel of the country because it was near Haifa... It was within walking distance of Kfar Attah."

She said that when she went on a tour to visit another settlement called Ma'ayan Baruch, she decided to relocate once again.

This is where she met her late husband Moshe Beckerman, who passed away in 1993.

He was a sabra who had been with the British eighth army from Palestine. He served under the British in the battle for North Africa, but spent most of the war years in a POW camp, she said.



Beckerman's identity card

After they married in October 1947, they moved to Tel Aviv, where her husband was originally from, and he worked as a foreman for the boats in the Tel Aviv port, where he supervised the loading and unloading of ships.

Beckerman recalled a night when her husband came home very late from work.

"They were bringing in neshek [weapons] from Czechoslovakia and it was hidden underneath sacks of onions and at night, in the dark, they would toss the onions into the Mediterranean and dig out the weapons."

She said that her husband was secretly working for the Haganah, the underground Jewish defence force.

"In those years, everything was very secret. So, when I met him, he didn't talk about what he was doing there in the kibbutz, but actually, he was training the Palmachnikim," she said.

"Of course no one talked about what they were doing. It was all very quiet, hidden."

Beckerman said that when Israel gained independence in 1948, there was great rejoicing, but it was bittersweet because of the war that followed.

"Everything was strictly rationed. You had to stand in line for everything. You got maybe three eggs a week per family and meat was really, really rare. I remember we used to buy a chicken on the black market and share it between two families. People can't imagine how scarce everything was," Beckerman recalled.

"I remember being out on the [balcony] and all of a sudden seeing planes overhead... There would be sirens going on to go down. There were no [bomb shelters] in those years, so we used to go down to the first floor of the apartment that was considered the most secure place in the building," she said.

"Everyone was affected. We knew people who were living in Jerusalem, and after the war we visited there and they told us horrendous stories... In order to get heat – because it can get quite cold in Jerusalem in the winter – they had to burn furniture... They suffered terribly in Jerusalem. It was a miracle that they got through it."

In 1952, the Beckermans decided to move to Canada together.

"When we came to Canada, we had to go to London, England, to get a visa so they checked his records and... in 1952 he received all the medals that were awarded to him [by the British]," she said.

"One of the medals is so ironic. It is for serving in Palestine from 1945 to 1948, when he was fighting the British men."

Since moving back to Canada, she's been back to Israel about a dozen times.

Beckerman still has family there, including her daughter and four grandchildren, and she also has two sons and two grandchildren in Toronto.

But despite having moved back to Canada, Israel will always be special to her.

"I consider it my second home."

And now for something completely different: HEEBONICS

Personal trainer to the stars

By AMY SOBERANO
Special to The CJN

"While I don't turn down money, it's the idea of making a large-scale difference that inspires me the most," says 33-year-old Harley Pasternak.

Perhaps one of the most sought-after personal trainers by celebrities all over the world, Pasternak preaches a message of healthy living that is indeed spreading at a rapid pace.

One of many artists who credits Pasternak's 5-Factor Diet with her elite fitness level is singer Alicia Keys. "With Harley's plan, the focus is not on starving yourself but on healthful living, so you don't feel like you're missing out on the foods you love," she reports on his website (www.5factordiet.com). "Once you get started, you get addicted to looking, feeling, and living your best."

A personal trainer with a celebrity clientele, Harley Pasternak has become a bit of celebrity himself, with appearances on Oprah and The Today Show.

Along with Grammy Award-winner Keys, Pasternak has worked with celebrities such as Halle Berry, Kanye West, Jessica Simpson, Miley Cyrus, Orlando Bloom, John Mayer, Katherine Heigl, Eve, Benjamin Bratt, LL Cool J and Adam Brody.

In fact, on the same day Pasternak granted The CJN an interview, Eva Mendes, Jeff Goldblum, Common, Paul Rudd, Jonah Hill and Ellen Page strolled through Pasternak's Los Angeles-based studio.

"Just when I think I've worked with someone in amazing spirits, I get the chance to work with someone else," says Pasternak.

Growing up in Toronto, Pasternak began to discover his niche in fitness as a hockey player. He started working out at a nearby Y in order to enhance his on-ice performance and became intrigued by the results.

"I loved that by doing a certain activity in the gym, it would change how I looked and felt," says Pasternak. "I became fascinated with fitness."

And when both of his brothers were diagnosed with type 1 diabetes, nutrition became of paramount concern to his family.

"I tried to instil in my brothers the importance of eating well and staying fit to keep them healthy."

Pasternak's line of work requires a constant balancing of physical training with nutrition, and he describes the two domains as inseparable.

"They're equally important. You can't have one without the other. There is a synergy that occurs with both of them."

After graduating from York Mills Collegiate in Toronto, Pasternak went on to pursue an honours degree in kinesiology at the University of Western Ontario and a master's of science in exercise physiology and nutritional sciences at the University of Toronto.

He is a member of the American College of Sports Medicine and the Canadian Society of Exercise Physiology.

While enrolled in university, Pasternak began a small personal-training business out of Bally Total Fitness, at the age of 18. "I never thought it could be like this," he says. "It wasn't the typical Jewish boy's professional path."

While operating his business, Pasternak was struggling to obtain a high score on his MCAT (medical college admission test) in an attempt to pursue a more tried-and-tested option. "I was failing to get into medical school, but my business was growing. I didn't realize that my career was right in front of my eyes," he says.

As his training business blossomed, he and his staff began to work with actors who came into Toronto to shoot their films. Among his first clients were Peta Wilson, star of the 1997 to 2001 TV series La Femme Nikita; Dennis Quaid and Juliette Lewis on the set of Cold Creek Manor; and Jennifer Lopez and James Caviezel during the production of Angel Eyes.

Concurrently, Pasternak was researching the effects of nutritional supplements on the strength and endurance of soldiers, at the Defense and Civil Institute of Environmental Medicine, for his master's degree. During his research, he noticed the bodies of the subjects began to develop following relatively brief workouts of 15 to 20 minutes. Intrigued by the concept of short and intense workouts, Pasternak introduced them to his fitness clients, scheduling workouts at the same time as 25-minute lunch breaks on set. His clients were happy with the results of the program, which was divided into five five-minute phases.

"I got a reputation as being able to get people into great shape in short periods of time," said Pasternak of his growth in popularity among celebrities with tight schedules.

What is now known as Harley's 5-Factor Diet, a book he wrote in 2006, calls for eating five meals a day, shifting one's eating pattern from what he refers to as "gorging to grazing."

The inspiration for the diet came from studying under U of T professors whose research found smaller and more frequent meals to be ideal for facilitating healthy blood sugar and appetite control.

The final component of the regiment is the five-minute preparation of dishes with just five ingredients, something that Pasternak developed on the job while he prepared meals in his clients' trailers with limited time and resources.

His big break came when Don Carmody, a major Canadian film producer, invited him to work with the cast of a movie, which was to star Halle Berry.

Despite having to cover his own expenses, Pasternak pounced on the chance to work with her. He reduced her daily workouts from 1½ hours to just 30 minutes and got the opportunity to prepare her for the Catwoman movie.

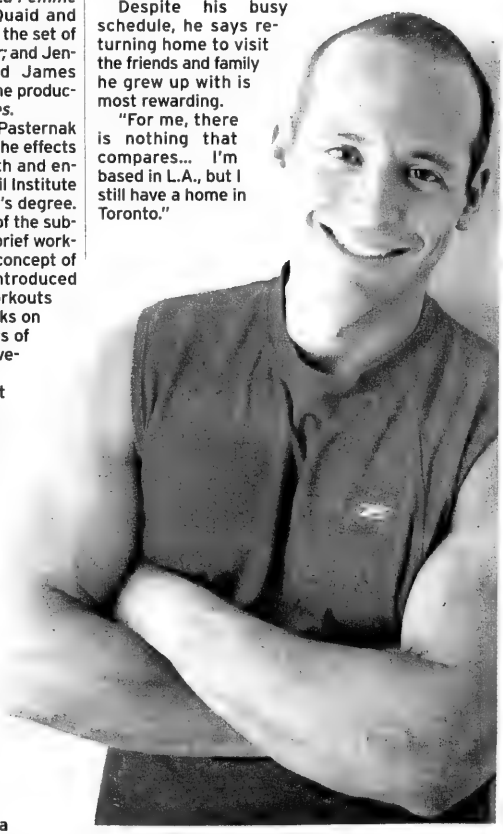
"Getting Halle in shape for Catwoman got me attention and on Oprah... things just blew up after that," Pasternak says. In addition to being featured on The Oprah Winfrey Show, Pasternak has become a regular on NBC's The Today Show, having appeared once a month for the past 10 months.

He has also made television appearances in slightly less professional capacities. His Los Angeles home has been explored by MTV's Cribs, a reality television program that features tours of the houses and mansions of celebrities, and he has appeared on America's Next Top Model, Access Hollywood and VH, E!.

In addition, Pasternak has worked closely with Nintendo Wii to produce Wiifit, an interactive video game that promotes activity and exercise in its users.

Despite his busy schedule, he says returning home to visit the friends and family he grew up with is most rewarding.

"For me, there is nothing that compares... I'm based in L.A., but I still have a home in Toronto."



Tulchinsky's history of Canada's Jews is an impressive work

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Gerald Tulchinsky, professor emeritus of history at Queen's University in Kingston, has just produced his magnum opus in the form of a new 630-page book, Canada's Jews: A People's Journey, published by the University of Toronto Press in both hardcover and softcover.

Gerald Tulchinsky

"I wanted to describe and analyze the significance of the transitions that Jews in Canada have experienced over 240 years," Tulchinsky said in an interview, in explaining the ambitious sweep and range of his book. The product of decades of intense research, the book is an amalgamation and expansion of two previous works – Taking Root, which told the story of Canadian Jewry from the 1760s to the 1920s, and Branching Out, which continued the story into the 1990s.

As the title suggests, Canada's Jews: A People's Journey is what academics might call a "demotic" history because it focuses primarily on "the common people" rather than exclusively on the popular leaders or the nobility. Its pages abound with diverse cameos of ordinary folk, engaged in their everyday lives, whose individual activities and situations help to illustrate the larger tale. As for source material, Tulchinsky seems to have left few stones unturned, and is likely the first published writer in Canada to utilize some particularly rich archival resources, as described in this article. (Genealogists, take note.)

The story is told in four main sections. The first part begins in 1768 with the rise of the colonial era, outlines a century of "pedlars and settlers on the urban frontiers," then details the rise of a significant urban Jewish presence in Victorian Montreal and the push westward by immigrant Jews to Toronto, Winnipeg and other settlements.

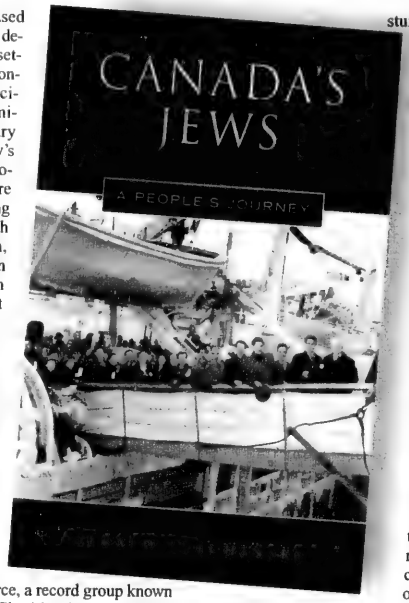
Numerous Jewish pedlars fanned out along the Upper Canadian frontier and provided "agencies of retail and wholesale commerce" to the wider populace, Tulchinsky writes. Many kept drifting until they prospered, but few established permanent roots, since their children or grandchildren typically moved back to the big cities in search of greater opportunities.

With few exceptions, Jews were not major players in the dynamic economic and industrial growth in mid-19th-century Canada. To fill in the business picture, Tulchinsky peered into Dun & Bradstreet records. This fascinating business-oriented material was previously accessible through Harvard University – "I made a special trip down to Harvard to look at it," he said – but has since been acquired on microfiche by Library and Archives Canada in Ottawa.

The laws of lashon hara prevent me from repeating the name of the Polish-Jewish merchant who opened a millinery and clothing shop in London, Ont., in the 1850s, about whom D&B circulated the scurrilous information that he was "not safe: not a man of principle, a Jew of a third-rate stamp… a rascally Israelite and not to be trusted on any acc[oun]t." Such was the treatment accorded to many Jewish merchants; Jews with good credit, however, sometimes managed to sidestep the company's habitual bigoted disdain.

Most Jewish merchants were "petty and transitory retailers or pedlars" in this era, Tulchinsky writes. "Butchers, bankers, agents, restaurateurs and auctioneers were also included among the peripatetic penny capitalists who drifted into Canada's cities and towns for a few years and then, blown over by a bad season or two, moved on to try their luck elsewhere – though never far from the scrutiny of R.G. Dun and Company's assiduous sleuths."

Part 2 – titled Emergence of a National Community (1890-1919) – describes an era of increased urbanization, detailing such diverse developments as Baron de Hirsch's settlement activities, the rise of new congregations and mutual benefit societies, and the unabashed anti-Semitism of Toronto's celebrated literary lion, Goldwin Smith. Tulchinsky's roving eye consistently ranges geographically from one Jewish centre to the next, as he presents a passing parade of statistics, stories and fresh topics: homegrown anti-Semitism, the Quebec school question, Jews in the garment trade and Canadian Zionism (significantly more potent than the American variety).



Part 3 focuses on the interwar period, 1919-1939; Part 4 on the The Second World War and Beyond (1940-2008). Into Battle, the chapter on how Canadian Jews responded to Hitler, offers surprising evidence that not all Canadian Jews understood or sought to mobilize against the Nazi menace in the late 1930s and the early war years.

This section relies extensively on another apparently wonderful and little-utilized archival resource, a record group known as the Canadian Jewish Congress Charities Committee National Archives. Housed at the Canadian Jewish Congress National Archives in Montreal, this material apparently contains a diverse assortment of letters exchanged among and between Canadian soldiers, their families, and the various Jewish chaplains stationed in Europe. It is deeply personal and moving stuff that offers a true flavour of the war as anxiously experienced by these various players.

Tulchinsky comes upon his broad nationalistic scope honestly. Born and raised in Brantford, Ont., where he got to experience the closeness and limited possibilities of small-town Jewish life, he studied briefly in Israel in 1952, then at major universities in Toronto and Montreal. He spent time in the Maritimes, the Prairies and "out West" before settling professionally in 1966 at Queen's University – where, 42 years later, he is still employed. He seems at home in each place he writes about, whether Montreal or Toronto or Edenbridge; his observations rarely seem forced.

It must be noted, however, that his prose does not always ring with the clarity of a well-considered thesis amply borne out by a clever array of facts and evidence. Tulchinsky is no Edward Gibbon or Howard Sachar, and he often seems more adept at uncovering bibliographic resources than turning a memorable phrase. Still, Canada's Jews: A People's Journey can only be regarded as a noteworthy achievement and an impressive work of scholarship.

Filmmaker raises awareness about social issues

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The CJN

When Deepa Mehta's Oscar-nominated film Water, which told of a young widow shunned by Indian society in 1938, raised questions about widowhood in India today, Mehta had to respond.

She and her collaborator Noemi Weis created The Forgotten Woman, a documentary about the plight of widows in India now.

"Deepa, her brother Dilip [Mehta] and David Hamilton, producer of Water decided to make a documentary, so when she approached me, I thought it was a fascinating topic," said filmmaker Noemi Weis on the phone from her home in Toronto.

The Forgotten Woman tells of millions of Indian women, some marrying as young as six months old, who become the property of their husband's family. Ancient religious customs dictate that when her husband dies, the widow is blamed. Rural women are cast aside with no means of food or shelter – leaving many to beg or pray at ashrams to atone for their "sins" for a bowl of rice or a rupee.

Widows become the property of their husband's family.

Middle-class women are more fortunate, although the stigma remains. One of the men interviewed offered this comparison: "Women are like flowers – once you have a flower you can't offer that flower again."

Support groups reach out to some. Weis interviewed Burlington-born activist and widow Ginny Shrivastava, who has lived in India for 36 years, runs a shelter for displaced widows and heads an association that empowers women through education and training, and Dr. Mohini Giri, an advocate of widows' rights and founder of Amar Bari's shelter, who came to Toronto for the film's world premiere at the Hot Docs festival in April.

Weis, an Argentine-Canadian has been in the production business for most of her life. Her international production company, Filmblanc, branched out four years ago to create documentaries that raise awareness.

The first, Gloriously Free, about gay immigrants living in Canada, was made for Omni Television.

"We've travelled the world with this film. It's now playing in Israel. A U.K. lawyer used it as a tool to defend a case in the U.S. That's the satisfaction I'm getting," Weis said.

Shortly after making Gloriously Free, Weis began working with Deepa Mehta. "Before Water got accepted into the Toronto International Film Festival, we produced Let's Talk About It," an award-winning film on domestic violence seen through the eyes of children. "After creating the concept and researching, I asked Deepa to direct it – she was the perfect ambassador for that film."

Late in 2005, Weis and Dilip Mehta, the director, cinematographer and editor of The Forgotten Woman, travelled to India. Dilip, a renowned photojournalist, shot his first cover for Time magazine at the age of 24. His work appears in National Geographic, Newsweek and the New York Times.

Noemi Weis

"Initially we planned to go with a full crew and Dilip was going to direct," Weis said. "On a research trip, I recommended taking a camera, because in documentaries, you never know what you'll find. He never used a video camera before. It was a different medium since he had been a photojournalist all his life, so we rented one. He took a crash course of half an hour in a basement in Delhi and off we went."

After the first day of filming, Weis was amazed at the sensitivity of Mehta's work. That evening, she suggested that he be the cinematographer, but he declined, since it was his directorial debut and didn't think he couldn't do both. But after seeing the outstanding footage, he finally agreed.

As Mehta captured the images, many women with little or no education proudly told their stories. "It was part of the healing process to have the opportunity. They are in a state of poverty, but they got up in the morning with a smile – their strength was incredible. It's a message to the west, to so many cultures: What is sufficient? What do we need to live happily? When one woman in the shelter sings, 'I am happiness,' that's an inspiration to us all," Weis said.

The Forgotten Women recently finished its run in Toronto. It is playing in Waterloo, Ont., and Regina this month, and in Montreal in July.

Hill 24 Doesn't Answer is a cinematic blast from the past

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Hill 24 Doesn't Answer, the first English-language movie ever to be filmed in Israel, has been released as a DVD by Ergo Media in the United States.

Since Israel is marking its 60th anniversary this year, this is a particularly auspicious occasion to see it.

Released in 1955, less than a decade after Israel's birth as an independent nation, it tells the story of four young Zionists, three men and a woman, who are assigned to protect a strategic hill near Jerusalem during the War of Independence.

Hill 24 Doesn't Answer, directed by Thorold Dickinson, is sometimes stilted, didactic and campy, but it is interesting from a historical point of view.

Featuring a credible cast of actors, it is intensely patriotic, a tone rarely evident in Israeli films today.

The chief characters are as different as night and day.

James Finnigan (Edward Mulhare) is an Irish police officer in Palestine, while Yehuda Berger (Arieh Lavi) is a Haganah commander. Howard Goodman (Michael Wagner) is an American Jewish volunteer and Miriam Mizrachi (Haya Harari, who would star opposite Charlton Heston in Ben-Hur) is a Yemenite Jewish fighter.

Their respective stories unfold through flashbacks and converge in a dramatic scene in which their unit is dispatched to Hill 24, which guards the dangerous road to Arab-besieged Jerusalem.

Hill 24 Doesn't Answer, written by Canadian Peter Frye and Israeli Zvi Kolitz, opens as a new batch of illegal Jewish immigrants land by boat in Haifa and are immediately caught by the British.

The scene then shifts to the British pursuit of Berger, a Holocaust survivor. In an attempt to apprehend him, Finnigan, the British detective, shadows his friend, Miriam, .

Improbably enough, and much to his boss' annoyance, Finnigan falls in love with Miriam. In a conversation with her, he pleads, "Can't we forget our differences and talk like human beings?"

Miriam has no illusions. "I'm a Jew and you're a British policeman, a Christian," she later counters in a Druze village. "I don't want to live without you," he says, his heart obviously aching.

Finnigan leaves Palestine, but returns after the proclamation of Israel's statehood to fight for the Jewish side.

The segment on Howard Goodman, a Jew from New York who takes part in an attack on the eastern half of Jerusalem, also stands out.

As street fighting rages, he is wounded. Resting in a makeshift clinic and complaining about his decision to join the Jewish army, he is comforted by a rabbi. Before he can regain his composure, the building is surrounded by Arab fighters.

Hill 24 Doesn't Answer* is intensely patriotic in tone.

The film winds down as a Jewish soldier captures a wounded Egyptian, who turns out to be an ex-SS man. He pins the German to the ground, but debates whether to kill him.

Hill 24 Doesn't Answer, a cinematic blast and a relic from the past, generally presents Israel and the brave men and women who fought for its survival in golden hues and in a heroic light.

In pumping up Israel's image, it portrays Israel as a hard, underdeveloped land teeming with selfless idealists who are ready to sacrifice their lives for a noble cause.

In this contemporary age of cynicism, an earnest and outspokenly Zionist film like Hill 24 Doesn't Answer might be curtly dismissed by some as an anachronism, but no one can deny that it is straightforward in its intentions, genuine in its ideology and sometimes moving in its emotions.

TV miniseries Holocaust released on DVD

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

In 1978, hot on the heels of the successful miniseries Roots, NBC broadcast Holocaust, a four-part saga that won Emmy Awards and earned a 50 per cent market share, something unheard of today.

To commemorate the 30th anniversary of its television debut, the 7½-hour series is now available on DVD for the first time on three discs. Holocaust follows the stories of two Berlin families caught in the saga of the Holocaust.

It begins with the marriage of Karl Weiss, a Jewish artist played by James Woods, to Inga Helms, a Catholic German played by the burgeoning Meryl Streep.

It also follows the rise of the fictitious Erik Dorf (Michael Moriarty), a Nazi civil servant who, guided by his wife's ambition, rises to be Reinhard Heydrich's second-in-command and a key player in the execution of the Final Solution.

Through Dorf, the story follows the evolution of the Holocaust from Kristallnacht and the Wannsee Conference (Heydrich was the chair of the conference) to the use of gas showers and crematoria at Auschwitz.

The members of the Weiss family, (Dr. Josef Weiss, his wife Berta, brother Moses and children Karl, Rudi and Anna) meanwhile suffer the full range of the Holocaust. Josef, Moses and Berta are sent to the Warsaw Ghetto, where Moses participates in the Ghetto Uprising after Josef and Berta are sent to Auschwitz. Karl is sent to the model camp in Theresienstadt and then to Auschwitz, Anna suffers a nervous breakdown after she is raped by Brownshirts and is sent to a treatment centre, where she is killed. Only Rudi (Joseph Bottoms) manages to escape Berlin and joins the resistance in Ukraine, where he witnesses – and narrowly escapes – the massacre at Babi Yar.

James Woods plays Karl Weiss, a Jewish artist.

Directed by Marvin Chomsky (who also did Roots), Holocaust was not without criticism. Author and human rights activist Elie Wiesel called it "untrue and offensive." Others criticized NBC for trivializing and making money from the tragedy.

The very nature of television probably did mute the harsh reality. Certainly, watching it now for the first time since I was 12, it does seem that the Warsaw Ghetto is rather clean and tidy, devoid of starving and dead bodies, unlike, say, the ghettos of Steven Spielberg's Schindler's List.

Even Auschwitz seems relatively sedate. The women in Holocaust all seem to have full heads of hair as they are led to the showers.

But that TV limitation aside (and it is brave enough to show the execution of naked men at Babi Yar, something networks would probably shy away from these days), Holocaust is very well done.

It takes its time building up the characters and then marches to its drastic conclusion. Dorf's transformation from kind lawyer to Holocaust henchman is believable.

It's certainly not as stark and foreboding as Schindler's List, but that's an unfair comparison.

In hindsight, for a 1978 miniseries, it's well ahead of its time. And, arguably, American network television has not run anything quite as powerful as Holocaust since.

ISRAEL'S MOSH BEN ARI COMING TO MOD CLUB FOR SDEROT BENEFIT

Israeli roots-soul-reggae star Mosh Ben Ari makes his North American debut in Toronto this Sunday in a benefit concert in aid of the community of Sderot, Israel. Lead singer of the famed group Sheva and composer of the hit song Salaam, Ben Ari and band are performing at a downtown venue on College just west of Bathurst.

Born in Israel in 1970, Ben Ari has become one of Israel's most popular creative musicians. Released in 2006, his third album Massa Umatan (Go Giving) has become one of the country's best-selling albums. Of Yemenite and Iraqi background, he has been influenced by traditional religious chants, as well as the music of India and North Africa.

Besides guitar, he plays the Indian sarod, Persian tar, Turkish jumbush and Moroccan ginberi. His music has been described as "a celebration of groove and spirit, seamlessly blending rock, soul, reggae and world music, all sung with his rich unique voice."

Toronto is the first stop in a three-week tour that also includes Montreal, Miami, Los Angeles, San Francisco and New York City. $25, $35 at the door, VIP tickets $65. The Mod Club, 722 College St., Sunday, June 15. Doors open 8 p.m. www.ticketweb.ca

Novelist Morley Torgov breaks new ground with murder mystery book

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Award-winning Canadian memoirist and novelist Morley Torgov has launched a murder mystery fiction series.

With Murder in A-Major (Napoleon and Company), Torgov has broken new ground in his second career as a writer.

Published last month in Toronto, Murder in A-Major is set in 1850s Germany, populated by real-life figures such as the musicians Robert and Clara Schumann and features Torgov's newest character, the Dusseldorf police inspector Hermann Preiss.

The dust jacket describes the plot as "a delightful historical mystery with a light touch" in which "the reader is led into the world of mid-19th century music, where classical composers were stars and their egos were just as monstrous as the rock stars of today."

In fleshing out the story, Torgov explores the rivalries, love affairs and infidelities of the period, throwing in blackmail and murder to spice things up.

"The reason I wrote this book is twofold," he explained last week. "Firstly, I have been hooked on classical music since I was a very young child. Secondly, I have long been intrigued by the fact that so many creative geniuses of that time were so entirely screwed up in their private lives."

The idea came to him some years ago, but he did not get down to work on it until his young adult novel, Stickler and Me, was published in 2005.

It was an arduous process. Torgov produced five drafts before he and his editor were completely satisfied with the manuscript.

A lawyer by day, specializing in corporate and commercial law, real estate, estate planning and trademark law, he admits he became a professional writer rather late in life.

Born in Sault Ste. Marie in 1927, he was always drawn to the written word.

At the age of 12, he wrote a Boy Scouts column for the local newspaper, and at 16, he became a reporter for the Sault Daily Star.

Yet he did not follow his dreams.

Nudged by his father to study medicine, Torgov resisted his entreaties.

"Law was a compromise," he said. "In retrospect, I have no regrets. I do believe that a career in law has the benefit of honing one's skills in the use of language and, to some extent, one's ability to see life through a sharper prism."

MorleyTorgov

Before entering Osgoode Hall Law School, Torgov finished a BA degree at the University of Toronto.

"I majored in gin rummy, canasta, the revelries of fraternity life and eating at the Crescent Grill, near the corner of Spadina and College," he recalled. "My other major source of enjoyment was attending classes in English literature."

"All the rest is forgettable," he added.

Looking back, Torgov says that his delay in becoming a writer of books was understandable.

"For the first 15 years after I graduated from law school in 1954, I was too occupied in building a law practice to devote much time to writing, although I did turn out several produced television plays and various print articles."

With the death of his father in 1965, he finally felt free to write "frankly and fully" about his youth in Sault Ste. Marie and its Jewish community.

Having been liberated from his inhibitions, he wrote his first book, A Good Place to Come From, which was published in 1974 and won the Leacock Medal for Humour.

The CBC subsequently transformed it into a mini TV series, while American playwright Israel Horovitz adapted it into three plays, which are still staged at regional theatres in North America.

Torgov's other novel, The Outside Chance of Maximillian Glick, which was eventually published in several languages, won the Leacock Medal as well and was made into a Canadian feature film and a 26-part CBC TV series.

Torpov has also written The Abramsky Variations, St. Farb's Day and The War to End All Wars.

These days, when he is well into a new project, Torgov writes for several hours every evening after dinner and on Saturday and Sunday mornings and during holidays at his cottage in Haliburton.

"I tend to be very self-disciplined about this process, so that even after a full days' work at my office, I manage to fulfill that evenings agenda at the typewriter."

An old-fashioned man, he eschews computers. "I work on an Olivetti manual typewriter purchased in 1957. Being a Luddite, I leave it to my longtime legal assistant and secretary, Joanne DeLio, to do the final draft on a computer."

Currently, Torgov is working on a sequel to Murder in A-Major. "This one will be centred around the brilliant and infamous composer Richard Wagner."

The tentative title is The Mastersinger from Minsk.

Students' films reflect their Jewish heritage

By REVA KAISER WEIN
Special to The CJN

More than 400 people recently packed the Sheppard Grande theatre to view three short films made by film students from the Ma'ale School of Television, Film and the Arts in Jerusalem.

Ma'ale trains filmmakers to produce work inspired by and linked to their Jewish heritage. The school aims to build bridges between Jewish tradition and social experience, as well as between the religious and secular worlds.

The sold-out June 2 event was hosted by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Jerusalem Foundation in honour of Yom Yerushalayim.

Ranging from 14 to 25 minutes in length, the films amazed the audience with their professionalism and poignancy.

The Orthodox Way

"It was inspiring," said Esty Edell, who attended the event with family members. "We're faced with issues like those [in the films] all the time – they took people's struggles and showed us how they dealt with them. And they focused on subjects that are relevant to all Jews and Israel."

Cohen's Wife, directed by Nava Nussan Heifetz, is an intense, fictional drama about a young, haredi married woman who is raped and then must await the rabbinical court's decision to find out whether she can remain married to her husband.

The Orthodox Way, directed by Ilan Eshkoli, is a comedy about a hilarious blind date with unexpected twists and misadventures.

A Jerusalem Tale, directed by Torontonian Tehila Wiesenberg, is a bittersweet story about a financially strained Breslever chassid whose philosophy that life must be lived completely in joy is challenged when he is faced with a difficult dilemma.

Films made by Ma'ale graduates have been screened at Israeli and international film festivals, earning praise and winning awards. What distinguishes the films produced by Ma'ale is that they are expressions of the students' Jewish values.

Although the films may feature modern-day controversial issues, they reflect the students' love and respect of their Jewish heritage and their deep connection to Israeli culture and society. Powerful and real, the films and their messages go straight to the hearts and souls of their audiences.

"The reach of these films is just amazing," said Katie Green, director of public relations and special projects for Ma'ale. "The films strike a chord with audiences of all ages and backgrounds… The students are fearless and address many of the burning issues facing all Jewish communities.

Cohen's Wife

"Through the films, they are saying, 'This is my life, these are my traditions, these are my dilemmas.' People feel the genuine emotions that lie behind the films. This is their great appeal."

Indeed, the films captivated and impressed the audience, some of whom were surprised at how well they could relate to the characters and the situations in the films.

"This was how I grew up," said Haim Riback, an Israeli expatriate. "I really identified with it."

Ian Leventhal, the Jerusalem Foundation's of Canada's executive director, said: "Ma'ale has a special, unique focus – to promote Jewish values. Being Diaspora Jews, we wanted to invest in something that promotes Israel in a positive light and is respectful of Jewish tradition."

Israeli Consul General Amir Gissin addressed the audience between films. He stressed how important it is to show the world another perspective of Israel – the talented arts and cultural side – and how the evening was a perfect example of that.

Rachel Corrie a one-sided but powerful look at intifadah

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

Review

At first glance, a play about Rachel Corrie could be seen as a defence of the Palestians during the second intifadah.

But My Name Is Rachel Corrie, being presented by Theatre Panik at the Tarragon Extra Space in Toronto, is more of a tale of courage and passion than a Middle East politics lesson. It doesn't matter what side of the argument you sit on; this one-woman show is a tour de force of emotional peaks and powerful sentiment.

Bethany Jillard

Rachel Corrie was crafted from diary entries and e-mails from Corrie, a 23-year-old American who was killed in March 2003 by an Israeli bulldozer while protesting the razing of a house in the Gaza Strip.

If there's ever been a play that's faced a bumpy ride to reach international stages, it's Rachel Corrie. Two theatre companies in Toronto and New York dropped the play last year, reportedly because of the controversy surrounding what detractors see as its one-sided critique of Israel.

Edited by British actor Alan Rickman and journalist Katharine Viner, the script is a collage of Corrie's diary, offering tidbits from her childhood and gradual growth. We learn how she noticed "a fire in the belly" and why she wanted "to fight monsters." The precocious youth is soon bombarded with activist options when she attends university. It's almost too much for her.

Corrie's character is fully fleshed out in the 100-minute show, thanks to the incredibly adept acting of Bethany Jillard. In a sparse set, Corrie talks about what motivates her to stand up against U.S. foreign policy. She learns about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict slowly, telling herself how it's necessary for her to fight global injustices. The audience senses the belly fire blazing higher with each diary entry, knowing all too well where she will inevitably end up.

In the first half of Rachel Corrie, the meandering spoken thoughts turn to teenage whims, personal mottos and idealistic opinions. The pacing may not be quick enough to hold everyone's attention, but the play is building up to a journey Corrie is practically itching to take. Jillard gives Corrie a playful, saucy attitude that slowly fades to wide-eyed fright when she travels to Israel as a member of the International Solidarity Movement.

The second half throws in some facts about the suffering faced by Palestinians, from the Palestinian point of view.

This is the story of one peace activist's passionate mission to right the wrongs as she sees them. She doesn't present both sides of the conflict, because her sympathies tend toward the Palestinians, whom she sees wallowing in poverty every day.

Jillard does a masterful job in showing us the arc in Corrie's life, from her fun-loving dancing-in-her-room days to the protester who admits how frightened she has become. The monologues, almost poetic in their descriptions of Palestinian landscapes, are only half the appeal. Jillard is able to use her expressions and body language to illustrate the fear, disgust and courage Corrie experiences in her final activist mission.

Corrie says at one point, "The Palestinians show dignity even in the constant presence of death." And Rachel Corrie – a play fraught with controversy from its inception – shows dignity in the face of backlash.

A different production of Rachel Corrie played in Montreal and Vancouver recently, and it has been staged in Britain and the United States, including off-Broadway, and at the Contemporary American Theatre Festival in West Virginia.

Family life infused with music and art

By RITA POLIAKOV
CJN Intern

Lena Karpinsky's paintings have taken over her house. Colours pop out from the upstairs hallway, petals peek out from the basement, and painted sunflowers dance from the walls. But the paintings that best represent her life are the ones filled with instruments.

"My whole life was spent around music," Karpinsky said in Russian. "I always had a relationship with [it.] My grandfather was a professor of the Moscow Conservatory of Music. My childhood was spent [playing] under the grand piano," she said.

Karpinsky, a Russian-born artist who sells her paintings through eBay, transformed her love of music into a love of painting. Cellos, saxophones and pianos appear throughout her art, with string instruments dominating the canvases.

"String instruments have a lot of beautiful colours and shapes," she said.

While Karpinsky no longer plays an instrument, her grandfather's talents have been inherited by her son, Eli.

At the age of three, while living in Israel, Eli stumbled upon a keyboard belonging to his father, who enjoys playing but is not a professional musician. By nine, Eli was asked to perform at the Moscow Conservatory of Music. Now 12 years old, he is studying with a Julliard teacher once a month in New York. He has also won several competitions, including a third place in the Canadian Music Competition.

"I used to come up to [the keyboard] and play some notes," he said of his first experience with the piano. "At some point, my dad played three notes and I played the exact notes back."

As Eli got older, it became obvious that he had a natural talent for music.

"When I first play a piece, I can just feel what the music's supposed to sound like," he said. "I have a musical family. I think that's where I got my talents from."

Her son began taking lessons in Toronto, and Karpinsky started painting.

"I painted in Russia, but my serious work was in Canada. When I came here, I saw all the beauty of Canada. It made me want to paint," she said.

It was her husband's idea to sell the paintings.

"He brought some friends over, they saw [the paintings] and thought they were really interesting. Then my husband thought of selling them on eBay," she said.

It took five years for her paintings to take off, but Karpinsky is now a recognized online artist who can paint some two to three pieces a day.

Like her work, Karpinsky's studio is an explosion of colours.

Bright reds burst from the walls, soft blues hide behind flecks of yellow, and splashes of orange jump out from the paintings that line her floor.

"It seems to me that the colours [I use] are very warm. It's nice to put that up on your wall. It's pleasant," she said.

"[When I start to paint], I look at the blank canvas and I think about what I want to see on it. I paint the colours first, and then the forms and shapes."

When painting, Karpinsky needs to be in a certain mood.

"I don't paint when I'm angry or upset," she said. "To paint, you need to give yourself up. If you think of something bad, it's reflected in the painting."

Often, when Karpinsky paints, Eli is upstairs playing the piano.

"It helps me when my son is playing. When I hear music, it's easier to work."

Both Karpinsky and her son enjoy Chopin's music.

"I enjoy playing practically everything of Chopin," Eli said. "I really like him because Chopin has a lot of pedal. It's smooth and romantic."

While Eli likes the piano, he doesn't necessarily like practising.

"I usually practise two to 2½ hours a day," he said. "It gets boring, you have to repeat the same thing over and over again."

As an incentive, Eli's parents pay him $10 for every time he plays in front of a new audience. So far, he has earned $30.

"He doesn't like to work, he's a kid," Karpinsky said of her son. "But he loves playing new pieces. [Music] is part of his life."

When not practising, Eli spends his time playing computer games, watching TV or painting.

"I don't have any talent [for painting], but sometimes my mom lets me and a friend paint," he said. "I paint stuff that comes to mind, like snow or space."

Although Eli and his mom excel in different disciplines, Karpinsky insists that their talents are connected.

"I think that painting and music are very close things. When you hear music, you feel good, and when you look at paintings, it makes you feel good. It's about emotions," she said.

John Miller wins fiction prize with second novel

Father and daughter co-authors Mayer Kirshenblatt and Barbara Kirshenblatt-Gimblett won the prize in biography and memoir for their gorgeous and glowingly received coffee-table book They Called Me Mayer July: Painted Memories of a Jewish Childhood in Poland Before the Holocaust (University of California Press). The book is filled with Kirshenblatt's naive folk art paintings of remembered scenes from his beloved Polish hometown before World War II, with a text his daughter assembled from many interviews with him.

Looking very much in the pink and still actively painting at 92 years of age, Kirshenblatt was perhaps this year's most senior award recipient.

Henia Reinhartz won the Yad Vashem Award in Holocaust Memoir and Literature for Bits and Pieces, a book published by the Azrieli Foundation that contains "bits and pieces" of her gruelling story of wartime survival in the Lodz Ghetto and other Nazi settings, as well as her life after the war. Reinhartz, a sister of novelist Chava Rosenfarb, told The CJN she hoped the award would draw readers to her book.

Rabbi Tina Grimberg won the prize for youth literature for Out of Line: Growing Up Soviet (Tundra Books), a poignant memoir of her childhood in Soviet Ukraine in the 1960s and '70s that is suitable for all ages. Rabbi Grimberg, spiritual leader of Reconstructionist Congregation Darchei Noam, has written what the jury described as "an eye-opening account of Jewish family life against the backdrop of a drab, often hypocritical and sometimes overtly anti-Semitic Communist society."

John Miller, winner of the award in fiction, together with the award sponsor, Beatrice Fischer.

The prize for poetry went to Ruth Panofsky for Laike and Nahum: A Poem in Two Voices (Inanna Publications), a long narrative poem that captures the voices of the author's grandparents, who were Russian-Jewish immigrants to Montreal in the early 1900s. Panofsky, who teaches at Ryerson University, is an authority on Canadian novelist Adele Wiseman and previous author of The Force of Vocation: The Literary Career of Adele Wiseman.

Continuing on the theme of immigration, author Marc Miller won the Yiddish literature prize for his English-language study Representing the Immigrant Experience: Morris Rosenfeld and the Emergence of Yiddish Literature in America (Syracuse University Press). Miller was unable to attend the awards ceremony in person.

The award for scholarship on a Jewish subject went to James A. Diamond for Converts, Heretics and Lepers: Maimonides and the Outsider (University of Notre Dame Press). The work focuses on Maimonides' appropriation of marginal figures who, in the great Jewish philosopher's hands, become a metaphor for larger, more substantive theological and philosophical issues.

Committee chair Edward Trapunski paid tribute to committee member Adam Fuerstenberg, a professor emeritus of English at Ryerson University, who has been a pivotal figure in the awards since their inception 20 years ago. "Jewish culture in Canada owes him an enormous debt," Trapunski said. "Without Adam Fuerstenberg, there would be no Jewish book awards."

Toronto author Michael Wex, who won an award in 2007 for his book Born to Kvetch but was in Europe at the time, made up for his previous absenteeism by delivering a short talk on the impossibility of conveying good news in Yiddish, a topic that elicited sustained howls of laughter.

Wex's specialty is understanding the psychology behind the Yiddish language, thought and expression. To "kvell" with pride, he explained, means to swell up or expand with pleasure, which a person does "because he's not letting it out where somebody can get hold of it and cast an evil eye on it." A person may kvell to the point of bursting, and then they "plotz," he explained.

A relative paid him a supreme compliment by telling him his book was so good he hoped his enemies would never experience the pleasure of reading it, Wex said.

"I'd like to tell all of tonight's winners, I want their enemies to read their books and to be jealous in spite of themselves," he quipped.

Canadian pastime an antidote to stressful Israeli life

By SHLOMO FELDMAN
Special to The CJN

METULLA, Israel — It's a distinctly Canadian picture – youngsters skating around an ice rink, slapshots reverberating through an arena, white powder flying off blades after a hard stop. Israel Spodek knows this, and even after he made aliyah nearly eight years ago, the spirit of this Canadian pastime is alive and well in the native Torontonian's heart.

As an antidote to the high-stress Israeli lifestyle and to give hockey-playing olim a taste of home, Spodek co-founded the Israel Recreational Hockey Association (IRHA) in 2005. Located at the Canada Centre in Metulla, the league is comprised primarily of other ex-Torontonians, as well as players from Montreal, Winnipeg and Ottawa, with a handful of Americans. The league meets twice a month for a friendly game of non-contact pickup hockey. The result: the tension of a modern-day, hectic schedule melts away, if only for a few hours.

Spodek admits it can be quite a commute for players who drive out to the northern tip of the country for a hockey game, but it's well worth the extra couple of hours to enjoy the experience.

"There's not a lot of downtime here," he said from his home near Haifa. "Life is pretty intense. There are no weekends like in Canada. The Thursday night game is basically an escape from reality for everyone. You take eight hours out of their month and it's like you're back to Canada. You completely forget about the fact you're in Israel when you're playing hockey."

Not that it was always like this, of course. When the Israel Ice Hockey Federation (IIHF) was created in the late 1980s, the only hockey played was three-on-three. By the mid '90s, the members were predominantly Russian olim with hockey backgrounds. In addition to being comprised of seasoned veterans of the sport, the IIHF met only once a week on Fridays, making it difficult for shomer Shabbat individuals to have access to the ice.

When Spodek made aliyah in 2000, he made it his goal to find a venue that would cater to his vision – a hockey league for people who want to pick up and play. By 2005, he had secured the Canada Centre rink and began recruiting via e-mail and word-of-mouth.

Spodek's persistence paid off, and today the IRHA has had more than 300 players participate in at least one event, with an average of 25 players per game. All are between the ages of 18 and 65 (the average is 45), and participants are welcome regardless of skill level or gender. The atmosphere is reminiscent of the games Spodek remembers from back home: fast-paced and competitive, but in a relaxed and supportive social environment.

"We get beers after the game" he said. "We sit around in the Jacuzzi, we go out for shawarmas.

"A lot of people have come over and thanked me, not just for organizing all this, but for allowing them to cope with the stresses of living in Israel.

In late January, the IRHA played a two-day, four-game tournament against Israel's national league, with three games going into overtime and the league team coming out on top. It was the IRHA's second annual tournament and the turnouts for the games have remained strong, with the players' on-ice skills vastly improving. Although it is a strictly recreational league, the IRHA is already meeting more often than Israel's national league and Spodek believes that, if it weren't for the commute, they would probably have four or five teams skating twice a week. His long-term goal is to have a game going every week, something he sees as possibly happening a couple of years down the road when the sport finally breaks through into mainstream Israeli culture.

"I think it's a sport that's very attractive to Israelis if they ever really sat and watched it," he said. "It's physical and aggressive [and speedy]. Roller hockey has become pretty popular. I see kids playing roller hockey all over the country, it's really caught on.".

For now, though, Spodek's goal "is to have our group and keep going. I want to be playing hockey when I'm 60 years old, so if I could keep playing once a week, that would be amazing."

Tryouts on tap for Jewish Under-18 team

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Playing hockey in Israel with a big maple leaf on your chest holds plenty of allure for today's Canadian youngsters.

That no doubt explains why there are no places left for the junior team tryouts for next summer's World Jewish Junior Hockey Championship in Metulla, Israel.

All 60 spots have been assigned and the overall quality of the players is quite remarkable, said Alex Voihanski, a member of hockey operations of the Israel Ice Hockey Federation (IIHF), the tournament and tryout organizers. The tryouts are scheduled to run June 22 to 24 at the Pavilion Arena in Thornhill (130 Racco Parkway), and spectators are welcome to take in the competition.

Most skaters hail from Toronto and are of AAA and AA calibre, with futures in U.S. college and Canadian junior ranks, Voihanski said. A good number will be making the trip from other Canadian communities. Eight are expected from Montreal, six from Ottawa, five from Winnipeg and a couple from Vancouver.

They're paying their own way for the chance to compete in next year's event, which is a follow-up to the 2007 World Jewish Hockey Championships that was won by the United States. That tournament was aimed at adult players from Canada, Israel, the United States and France, but interest was so high that organizers decided to expand it to include a junior component. The under-18 event, which will run from July 5 to 17, 2009, is geared to youngsters born between 1992 to 1994. The tournament will coincide with the Maccabiah Games, which get under way on July 12, but are not part of that event, Voihanski said.

Most skaters are attracted by the opportunity to play in Israel and to represent their country doing so. In recruiting players, many were giddy with the prospect of playing summer hockey in the Holy Land, he said.

The tryouts will also give IIHF organizers the opportunity to scout potential players for the Israeli national junior team. That squad relies for the bulk of its hockey talent on skaters playing in Canada who are eligible for the Israeli team.

Sidney Greenberg, head of the IIHF, said, "I want the Jewish community in Canada to see the quality and talent level of the young Jewish hockey players in this country.

"In the process of getting players to try out, we were fortunate enough to find elite level players with Israeli passports who will hopefully one day play for Israel's national teams."

IIHF execs expect the airlifted players will strengthen the Israeli team at International Ice Hockey Federation tournaments while the the Israeli body develops sabra players in Israel.

Doing so is a lengthy process whose first step is to put in place programs to train Israel-based coaches.

Sherry Bassin, the owner of the OHL's Erie Otters who also runs the IIHF's hockey operations, will spearhead that effort.

With trained coaches on hand, the task of developing Israeli players through quarterly training camps and by recruiting players from Israel's popular roller hockey league will continue. In the end, that grassroots initiative is the best way to create a foundation for future Israeli hockey teams, Voihanski said.

Bassin will also organize the Pavilion training camp and will model it on OHL camps. Players can expect OHL and NHL-level coaching.

Finding my inner Carrie Bradshaw

Sandie Benitah
20Something

We've been talking about it for months and the moment has finally arrived. Sex and the City is here, and it doesn't matter how old you are. This is a momentous occasion.

Like a wise older sister, the TV show has given me some sound advice and has led me through some challenging times in my twenties.

It doesn't matter that the girls were in their thirties and forties. Their tales of elusive men, hard-fought career victories and fabulous friendships never lost their relevance for my friends and me.

But it's much more than girl power that makes this show special. It's probably the only movie that my mom and I are equally excited to see. In fact, I know one girl who is going to the movie with a bunch of her friends, her mom and her mom's friends.

I never thought I'd see the day when we could enjoy sex and our mothers in the same room!

Someone asked me recently what it was about the movie that I was most looking forward to. Was it the commitment between Carrie and Mr. Big? Was it the baby that Charlotte is finally carrying?

It's none of that, I answered. In truth, I don't even care about the plot.

To me, the show has always been about becoming a lady with grace. These women – witty Carrie, independent Miranda, vampy Samantha and demure Charlotte – have handled every challenge thrown their way with such honesty and such incredible senses of self.

There were no apologies for their neurotic behaviours, no excuses for their mistakes, no regrets about their decisions.

I think about how many times I've gone over the things I've done and wished that I'd done them differently, about how many moments I've spent agonizing over things without trusting my instincts.

That's what becoming a fabulous woman is all about. It's about getting to know yourself and, more importantly, trusting yourself.

Growing up, my parents have always encouraged me to take responsibility for my actions. But it wasn't until I was in my twenties that I learned that I had no choice but to own each decision that I make.

They haven't all been right – not by a long shot – but watching these older, wiser women move on from their experiences has made me realize that mine were all decisions worth making.

I've come a long way since I first started watching the show.

SATC's fab four are like the Spice Girls for adults. As a kid, I would always play Baby Spice. As an adult, not much had changed, it seemed, as my friends nicknamed me Charlotte for my prudish ways.

But lately, my friends have said I've graduated to a Carrie.

In an article I once read, Carrie was described as the woman who views the world with her eyes wide open, never shutting them no matter how scary it gets. She's a woman who seeks honesty and truth in each moment of life.

In fact, there's one quote of hers that I have always felt described me exactly: "I will never be the woman with the perfect hair, who can wear white and not spill on it," she said once on the show.

It is what it is, but what a great thing that is.

Being a Carrie is something great to aspire to.

But watching the show, and now the movie, has inspired me to appreciate and accept exactly what it means to be a Sandie.

ROASTED BROCCOLI WITH RAISIN VINAIGRETTE

- 1 1/2 lbs. broccoli, stems removed, tops cut into large florets
- 2 tblsp sherry wine vinegar
- 6 tblsp olive oil, divided
- 1/2 tsp ground cumin
- 1/2 c raisins
- 1 tblsp water

Preheat oven to 400°F. Place broccoli on large rimmed baking sheet. Drizzle with 3 tblsps olive oil; sprinkle with salt and pepper; toss to coat. Roast broccoli until tender, about 25 min.
In the meantime, combine 3 tblsp oil, vinegar, raisins, 1 tblsp water and cumin in processor. Blend until raisins are finely chopped, about 30 seconds. Season vinaigrette to taste with salt and pepper.
Transfer broccoli to large bowl. Add vinaigrette and toss to coat. Serve warm or at room temperature.

About Life

Dear Ella,

I am back in the dating world after finishing exams for the last time. A couple of months ago, my friend set me up with a great gal. She's not only gorgeous, but she has brains, too. I would venture to say that this might even go past my usual three-month stint, but only if she stays away from my things!

Let's just say I am very territorial. We have gotten fairly comfortable with each other, and she now feels free to eat food off my plate, sometimes using her fingers instead of a utensil. She stays over at my place, and in the morning showers and puts on my robe. She checks her e-mail on my computer just as I am about to do the same. I have kept my mouth shut, but I am seething inside every time she invades my stuff. We have to fix this before I boot her out the door. It would be too bad, because this one could really be a keeper. Any suggestions?

What's Mine is Mine

Dear What's Mine is Mine,

Relationships require communication and work. You need to know how to share and how to set boundaries. I understand that you are protecting your territory and feel like she is all over your things, but if you want the relationship to grow, you have to grow, too. Not everything of yours needs to be hers as well, but you need to relax a little.

Perhaps one of the boundaries you set will be for her to ask if it's OK before she touches something that is clearly yours.

What you need to remember, though, is that you are cultivating a relationship, and one of the fundamentals is trust. Trust happens when you both open yourselves up to each other; when you find that you want to make your partner happy by giving and sacrificing; and when you crave the feeling of being as one. Then you know you are in a loving, growing relationship.

You aren't there yet.

Granted, this can be done slowly, but in the long run, if you really want this to work, you are going to have to lighten up. Examine what it is that makes you so territorial and see if you can work through it.

In the end, it's about communication. If you can't get past this, then at least give her a fighting chance. Let her know how you feel. Maybe she will care enough to respect the time you need to adjust to being a couple.

Strengthening our integrity

LIFE COACH CORNER
By JUDY SIBLIN-LIBRACH

Impeccable integrity is something I have witnessed from the time I was a little girl. My father is a man of great integrity. He taught us all the reasons to act and live with integrity in all that we do.

Living an ethical and compassionate life, with integrity, is a way to teach a beautiful lesson your children, and indeed trust and integrity are the cornerstones of all healthy relationships.

So what do you do when you encounter people who don't live with that kind integrity, who want to undermine you or betray your trust and your confidence?

Narcissism, according to Barbara Killinger in her book Integrity: Doing the Right Thing for the Right Reason, is the antithesis of integrity. There are people who have lost integrity, and there are many reasons for this.

"Often the need to belong and be accepted is unfulfilled and so it is difficult for us to develop trust and self-respect and to gain competence. When children are constantly criticized and rarely praised, they are left with "a legacy of self-doubt and seriously impaired social skills, Killinger says. "Their alienation becomes a breeding ground for future resentment and distrust."

We need to safeguard this value and help improve our level of integrity, personally, professionally, within the community and the world that we live in.

So how do we do it?

"We can strengthen our integrity by making a conscious decision to follow an understanding path rather than a judgmental one," Killinger says. "Integrity should be integrated into our character, beyond choice. This means honouring our highest values and resisting temptation, striving for a more balanced psyche and being more appreciative of what we already have.

"Integrity is a personal choice, an uncompromising and predictably consistent commitment to honour moral, ethical, spiritual and artistic values and principles."

The elements of integrity always include honesty, empathy, compassion, sympathy, fairness and co-operation, just to name a few. How do we foster it?

One way is to teach our children respect for rules and traditions, laws and regulations. Also, ask yourself what words would help you to be more gracious or diplomatic in a difficult situation. Try to listen more carefully and to put love in your heart in all of your dealings with people in your life. Notice who lives with integrity in your life and use them as a role model, and a reminder of how you want to live. Ask yourself if you are compassionate and trustworthy, and if you make the people you know feel important and accepted.

"There is no pillow so soft as a clear conscience," as the proverb goes. The good news is that integrity can be taught to anyone.

In Hal Urban's book, The Ten Commandments of Common Sense, he writes that integrity brings peace of mind, builds character, cements relationships, makes people complete, promotes good health and helps us to be authentic. "Integrity is an inside job. It begins by being real, genuine, authentic, sincere. When we're true to ourselves, we'll be true to others, too."

As Martin Luther King, Jr. once said, "the time is always right to do what is right."

When I see my dad walking jauntily toward me, with a jovial smile on his face, I feel a sense of peace because I know that he is the embodiment of a man of integrity – a great role model who is ethical, honourable, trusted and respected in all that he does. And I know that his integrity is the light that guides his way and all those who are fortunate to have him in their lives.

Ethiopian children, whose roots trace back to Judaism, look out of a window at Beta Israel school while awaiting immigration to Israel in Gondar last year. While more than 17,000 Ethiopian immigrants have come to Israel since 2003, the mass aliyah appears to finally be at its end. [RNS/Reuters photo]

NEW YORK — With the final planeload of Ethiopian immigrants scheduled to land in Israel early next month, advocates of Falash Mora aliyah are hoping a last-ditch intervention by Israel's prime minister will extend immigration rights to thousands more.

Former Israeli Supreme Court justice Meir Shamgar held a closed-door meeting with Ehud Olmert in late May in a bid to convince the prime minister to order the immediate screening of an additional 8,500 to 8,700 Ethiopians for immigration eligibility.

Also, a coalition of advocates is petitioning Israeli Knesset members, rallying American Jews and filing lawsuits to force Israel to take in thousands more Ethiopian immigrants.

"Experience teaches us that when the Israeli government says no, when we, the members of the community, do not give up, we prevail," said Avraham Neguise, an Ethiopian aliyah advocate and director of South Wing to Zion, an Ethiopian-Israeli group. "There are 8,700 Jews left behind. I hope that the prime minister will check this situation and make the right decisions, and not make another mistake."

The campaign, launched several months ago, has taken on renewed urgency following several court rulings rejecting the advocates' petitions, the termination of United Jewish Communities (UJC) funding of aid activities in Ethiopia and the imminence of the planned end of mass Ethiopian aliyah.

With more than 17,000 Ethiopian immigrants having come to Israel since former prime minister Ariel Sharon's government decided to expand mass aliyah from the country in 2003, the aliyah appears to finally be at its end.

Israel's Interior Ministry, which was responsible for determining who was eligible for immigration, several months ago finished going

Soldiers may be freed soon

JERUSALEM — The father of abducted Israel Defence Forces soldier Eldad Regev said Monday that his family and that of Ehud Goldwasser, the other soldier kidnapped by Hezbollah, have been informed that a deal for the abductees' return to Israel has been finalized.

"Ofer Dekel told us, speaking generally, that there is going to be a deal – and that's it," Zvi Regev told Israel Radio. Dekel is Israel's chief negotiator for securing the release of abducted IDF soldiers.

Hezbollah guerrillas kidnapped Goldwasser and Regev in a 2006 cross-border raid that sparked the month-long Second Lebanon War.

Zvi Regev also told Israel Radio that the medical condition of his son and of Goldwasser is still unknown.

"Actually, no one knows. If they received treatment [after their abduction], they survived. If they didn't – then we just hope they did, and it appears that Udi [Ehud] and Eldad are returning… We are aware of the worst [possibilities], but we hope for good tidings in any event," Regev said.

The IDF soldiers were believed to have been badly wounded during their abduction, and Hezbollah, the Lebanon-based militant group, has offered no proof that they are alive.

The News In Brief

CANADA

Apology Praised

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress lauded Prime Minister Stephen Harper for his apology last week to Canada's Aboriginal Peoples for the "national shame" of residential schools. "Prime Minister Harper announced in last year's Throne Speech that an official apology for this dark period of Canadian history was forthcoming to Canada's First Nations, Métis and Inuit peoples and he has made good on this pledge. We commend his inspired leadership in fulfilling this promise," CJC co-president Rabbi Reuven Bulka said.

Rubin Back In Mtl.

MONTREAL — Benjamin Rubin will play hockey in his hometown next season. Rubin, 19, has been acquired by the new Montreal Juniors club of the Quebec Major Junior Hockey League (QMJHL). A graduate of Hebrew Academy, Rubin broke into the QMJHL with the Quebec City Remparts in 2006. An observant Jew, he couldn't play or travel on Shabbat or Yom Tovs, which limited his ice time, since the league plays most Friday nights. Last season, the forward was traded to Gatineau, with the proviso he play full time, except on High Holy Days, but he spent the end of the year with the triple-A St. Jérôme Panthères. The QMJHL returns to Montreal after a five-year absence with the purchase and relocation of the Fog Devils of St. John's, Nfld., by local businessman Farrel Miller.

T.O. Students Win

TORONTO — A Toronto student placed first out of 160 North American students in a Yeshiva University Talmud contest, and his sister won the Diaspora portion of this year's International Bible Contest. Yisrael Mordechai Witty, in Grade 12 at Yeshivat Or Chaim, won YU's Bekiut contest, in which participants study Gemara for the sake of learning. Rivka Witty, in Grade 10 at Ulpanat Orot, placed first in the Diaspora in the Chumash quiz, held in Israel.

WORLD

Books Endangered?

NEW YORK — An Egyptian Jewish group has asked the United Nations to help recover the community's historic archives. The Historical Society of Jews from Egypt says Egypt won't release the documents for fear of restitution claims, the Jerusalem Post reported. The society has written to UNESCO asking it to intervene. The letter was prompted by comments from Egyptian Culture Minister Farouk Hosni, who said last month that he "would burn Israeli books myself if found in Egyptian libraries."

Ruling Upheld

PITTSBURGH — A U.S. appeals court revoked the citizenship of a man who was an SS guard at Nazi concentration camps. The June 10 ruling affirmed one by the U.S. District Court in Pittsburgh revoking the citizenship of Anton Geiser of Sharon, Penn., who admitted that during most of 1943, he was an SS guard at Sachsenhausen near Berlin. He also admitted to being a guard at Buchenwald. While he was at Sachsenhausen, more than 3,000 prisoners were murdered or died from brutal treatment. Geiser, 81, came to the United States from Austria in 1956 and became a U.S. citizen in 1962. Efforts to denaturalize him began in 2004.

Envoy Slams British Anti-Israel Bias

Ron Prosor

LONDON — Israel's ambassador to London came out against what he called widespread British bias against the Jewish state.

"Britain has become a hotbed for radical anti-Israeli views and a haven for disingenuous calls for a one-state solution, a euphemistic name for a movement advocating Israel's destruction," Ron Prosor wrote in a June 10 Daily Telegraph opinion piece.

"Israel faces an intensified campaign of delegitimization, demonization and double standards," he added, noting that British traditions of fair-mindedness apparently no longer apply when it comes to Zionism.

Prosor, who took office in November pledging to promote Israel and confront pro-Palestinian apologists, aimed special criticism at British academics who want their Israeli counterparts boycotted, and at British media coverage of the Middle East.

The article was published as British Foreign Secretary David Milliband wrapped up a visit to Israel.

Jews second most targeted for hate crimes

Highest rates in Calgary, Kingston, Ottawa

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A survey of police-reported hate crimes released recently by Statistics Canada showed that in 2006, Jews were Canada's most targeted group by religion and second only to blacks as the most victimized group overall.

Of 220 hate crimes motivated by the victim's religion, 137 were aimed at Jews, or almost 63 per cent. Muslims were the next most affected religious group, with 46 incidents (21 per cent) reported, followed by Catholics, who experienced 13 incidents (six per cent).

Overall, blacks were the most targeted group, whether considered on racial, ethnic, gender or religious bases. Some 238 hate events were reported involving blacks out of a total of 892 incidents. Blacks were victims in 27 per cent of all occurrences, Jews in 15 per cent.

The data were obtained from the Hate Crime Supplemental Survey, a study of hate crimes reported by police departments across Canada that cover 87 per cent of Canada's population. Statistics Canada reported that the number of hate crimes "accounted for less than one per cent of all criminal incidents reported to police."

The study showed that half of all hate-motivated crime concerned property offences, while one-third involved violence. The highest rates of police-reported hate crime were in Calgary (9.1 per 100,000 residents), Kingston (8.5), Ottawa (6.6), London (5.9) and Toronto (5.5). "Hate crimes were most likely to involve young people, both as victims and accused persons," the report stated.

"Most violent hate crimes are committed by strangers rather than persons known to victims. In 2006, 77 per cent of victims of police-reported hate crime did not know their perpetrators, compared to 33 per cent of victims of other violent crimes."

The national hate-motivated crimes statistics parallel findings by the hate crimes unit of the Toronto Police Service. In its 2006 report, the unit found that Jews were the second most victimized group, behind blacks.

Jews continue to be subjected to anti-Semitic vandalism.

Twenty-eight of 162 incidents were aimed at Jews (17 per cent), while 15 incidents (nine per cent) targeted Muslims. Blacks were singled out in 30 per cent of occurrences.

Const. Wendy Drummond, a spokesperson for the Toronto Police, said the most recent data for 2007 again showed that Jews were the second most targeted group, behind blacks. Altogether, Jews were affected in 29 per cent of incidents, while blacks were targeted in 33 per cent of events. Gays were next at 13 per cent, followed by Muslims and Pakistanis at nine per cent each.

Police also recorded a "multi-bias" category – where the motivation involved more than one type of animus, such as a black and gay – in which Jews were the second-most-targeted group, she said.

Wendy Lampert, national director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, said the findings are consistent with long-standing patterns.

"Historically, we have been targeted," she said. "We really have to remain vigilant as a community and take appropriate measures to secure our facilities going forward."

The museum soars

From the editor's desk

It is a sorrowful tranquillity, but a tranquillity nonetheless that one finds at Yad Vashem on the Mount of Remembrance in the western slopes of Jerusalem.

Like Mount Herzl, which it abuts, where many of Israel's founding generation are buried, the Mount of Remembrance is a large pine-filled, rolling peak with vast green vistas toward the valleys to the north and the south.

One arrives at Yad Vashem, as we did last Friday morning, by leaving the noise and the turmoil of the city's congested, busy roads, curling westward on a narrow winding road around Mount Herzl into the sheltered, sylvan space of the Mount of Remembrance.

Past the visitors' reception centre is the new museum designed by Moshe Safdie. It is a long, horizontal three-cornered slice of concrete and glass that is literally wedged from south to north into the mountain. The modesty and humility of its shape gives it an immediate credibility. Its esthetic impact is, refreshingly, a statement about the building's purpose, not about its designer.

It is made entirely of smooth-faced concrete and glass. The grey concrete is effectively a spike into the mountain, an affront of sorts to its integrity.

The glass is the portal of light into the museum. It is also, we were told, a very deliberate reminder of the fact that there were indeed many windows onto the deranged world of the Holocaust. But most men and women refused to peer in.

Those who did, and those who acted because of what they saw, were righteous. And thus, the Avenue of the Righteous Among the Nations is the very first path of the entire museum complex. To date, more than 21,000 individuals have been officially acknowledged and honoured by Yad Vashem as righteous among the nations.

To get to the museum from the visitors' centre, one walks across a wooden bridge suspended in the air by wires and steel braces. The feel of the bridge underfoot is somewhat shaky, as the planners and architects intended.

The entry to the museum is near its southern end, which the visitor immediately notices is windowless, thus foreclosing the possibility of any view from there to the outside world.

The museum itself comprises nine galleries, each leading one to the other in chronological step through the 1930s and '40s. The displays in the galleries include personal artifacts, photographs, original artwork and survivor testimonies.

In 2007, more than one million people visited Yad Vashem. We were told it is the most visited museum in Israel.

Yad Vashem's mission is to vividly recall, if not "bring back," the civilization that the Nazis and their collaborators tried to destroy. Thus, over the past decade, Yad Vashem has evolved into an institution that is far more than a museum. Its mission rests on four pillars: commemoration, documentation, research and education.

As a result of its reinterpreted, expanded mission, some seven million visits from 215 countries were recorded on Yad Vashem's website last year, an increase of 54 per cent from the previous year. The institution also introduced an online mini-site in Farsi in January 2007, which received about 90,000 hits during the year, including more than 22,500 from Iran.

The last of the galleries in the museum is the Hall of Names, a high, wide-diameter, conical ceiling of faces and names and testimonies that surround the visitor, about to leave the museum, entirely from above.

At the entrance to the hall is the following plea: "Remember only that I was innocent/ And just like you, mortal on that day,/ I, too, had a face marked by rage,/ By pity and joy,/ Quite simply, a human face." (My emphasis)

The passage was written by Benjamin Fondane, a passenger on the Exodus, who was killed at Auschwitz.

After more than two hours in the museum, drained by the constant tear of emotion, exhausted by rage and hollowed out by overwhelming sadness, the poignancy of the poem penetrates. The words of our guide, Edna Wilchfort, return to the mind with newer meaning.

"One of the key purposes of Yad Vashem," Wilchfort said, "is to give names to nameless victims – to restore the identities to the people whose identities were stolen from them. Yad Vashem has documentation that gives identities to human faces. These faces belonged to people who existed and who were human beings, too."

The photo, inset, shows the exit of the Holocaust History Museum as it bursts out of the Mountain of Remembrance. The openness on both ends creates a winged effect, which in turn suggests a soaring toward personal resolve and perhaps, as well, national redemption.

Every visit to Israel should include a visit to Yad Vashem.

Fisch, Ciccolini honoured by Beth Chabad

By RITA POLIAKOV
CJN Intern

Two people who have helped the Israeli community in Toronto were recognized at Beth Chabad's fifth annual Spirit of Community Dinner.

Attended by about 800 guests, the June 4 event, hosted by the Beth Chabad Israeli Community Centre, honoured York Region chairman and CEO Bill Fisch and entrepreneur and philanthropist Sam Ciccolini.

"[These individuals] ask not what everyone else can do for them, but what they can do for [their] fellow people," said guest speaker Rabbi Yossi Jacobson.

Fisch started off as the ward councillor for the town of Markham and is now in his fourth term as chairman and CEO of York Region. He received the community service award for his role in developing the communities of York Region, an area with a large Israeli population. Fisch played an important role in creating York Region's Viva Rapid Transit bus system and helped to plan two future subway expansions into York Region.

"Bill has established himself as a person who gets things done," said Markham mayor Frank Scarpitti. "He is an admired and respected community leader [and he] represents the long journey of creating one of the best regions in the country."

Fisch, who was born in a displaced persons' camp in Germany, spoke about York Region's diverse community.

"I take great pride that I, personally, played a small part in making our community such a great place to live in. Twenty years ago, I'm not even sure I knew where the region was, now it's Ontario's rising star. It has a vibrant economy, [it's] multicultural and ethnically diverse and its population is growing," he said.

Ciccolini, the co-owner of Masters Insurance Limited and a recipient of the Order of Ontario and the Order of Canada, was given the community spirit award for philanthropy. Ciccolini has supported Beth Chabad, as well as the Ben-Gurion University of the Negev, the Hospital for Sick Children and Youth Bocce Canada, which helps athletes with disabilities in the Greater Toronto Area and York Region.

"Sam is a highly regarded, successful entrepreneur, but with his busy day he still makes time to support [the community]," said Ciccolini's friend Bonnie Silver.

At the dinner, Beth Chabad raised about $250,000 for its community centre, which serves the Israeli and Hebrew-speaking population in Toronto and York Region.

After dinner, Rabbi Jacobson spoke about the importance of supporting the Jewish community.

"The human being wasn't created only for herself or himself, but for [others]," he said. "There's a mission statement behind each soul. Every individual is [here] to make a difference."

A weary anniversary

A year ago this week, Hamas violently wrested control of the Gaza Strip from the Fatah-led Palestinian Authority of President Mahmoud Abbas. The fighting between the two Palestinian factions was vicious, furious and fast. In the end, the better-trained and probably more highly motivated Hamas forces of Ismail Haniyeh and Khaled Meshal carried the blood-soaked day.

Abbas called the Hamas takeover a "bloody coup." He referred to his Hamas brethren in highly unflattering terms. The inter-factional, intra-Palestinian hatred remains to this day. Since the coup last June, human rights groups report that some 118 Palestinians have been killed in inter-factional fighting in Gaza. Hundreds of Fatah members rot in Gaza jails, and arrests of Fatah supporters are carried out almost every day.

The public call last week by Abbas to pursue a dialogue of reconciliation with Hamas leaders fooled no one. He is vying for pre-eminence in the Palestinian "street." The appearance of bravely wanting to coexist with Hamas, affirming Palestinian solidarity despite the opposition of the United States and especially of Israel, is the emotional asphalt that paves that predictably unpredictable street with adulation and praise.

But Abbas also knew that apart from disappointing the Americans and the Israelis, which is a constant byproduct of his faux-posturing, he was risking very little with his gesture of equanimity to his Hamas enemies. For the main result of Hamas rule in Gaza these past 12 months has been the overwhelming poverty of the people who live there. Abbas' fellow Palestinians are drearily fatigued by it. About 50 per cent of Gazans have no work. Two-thirds live below the poverty line and need international aid to survive. Close to 90 per cent of factories are closed. There is hardly any new construction. And food staples are very expensive.

To be sure, the economic condition in Gaza is also a result of the economic blockade imposed by Israel and the financial blockade imposed by western countries. But that, too, is the plain and direct result of Hamas leaders choosing always and only the way of violence and hatred. They refuse to give up the goal of destroying Israel. They refuse to abjure violence. They refuse to honour former agreements between Israel and the Palestinians.

Under the circumstances, Israel's blockade is reasonable and necessary. Any other country facing the same situation would do no less – and very likely a great deal more.

Hamas' rule in Gaza has been decidedly bad for Israel. Rockets fall on Israelis who live near Gaza virtually every day. Gilad Schalit has been a captive for nearly two years.

But the real harm of Hamas' rule has fallen upon the Palestinians. Until and unless Hamas decides that Jews, too, have a right to live sovereign in the Middle East, the Palestinian people will be doomed to their wearying poverty and to more anniversaries of unfulfilled national aspirations.

25 years ago in The CJN

Jordan's King Hussein imposed new restrictions on Palestinians from the West Bank and Gaza. They could only enter Jordan via the Allenby and Damiya bridges, and the number of West Bank students attending Jordanian universities was limited. The king was said to be afraid that too large a Palestinian presence would destabilize his country.

Rachel Corrie is a blood libel

I expected to read positive reviews of My Name Is Rachel Corrie by gullible reviewers in the mainstream Canadian press. I did not expect the same from The CJN ("Rachel Corrie a one-sided but powerful look at intifadah," June 12). However "masterful" the production, this propaganda piece is nothing more than a blood libel, falling squarely within the time-honoured tradition that Jews kill non-Jewish children for sinister purposes. It is no accident that this play ends with an epiphany of Rachel's fifth-grade child-hunger speech, nor that the Toronto production closes with young Rachel on a swing.

Medieval Jews were accused of kidnapping the boy William of Norwich, draining his blood and mixing it into matzah. This play accuses the Israel Defence Forces of murdering Rachel. Medieval tradition sanctified the dead child as "St. William." Today's dead child is transfigured as a secular angel.

The blood libel has been useful to the Arabs in modern times, with accusations by King Faisal of Saudi Arabia in 1972 ("They have a certain day on which they mix the blood of non-Jews into their bread and eat it"). The most recent is the false accusation that the Palestinian boy Mohammed al-Dura was shot by Israeli gunfire. The success of Rachel Corrie is simply one more example of the utility of this slander.

Bullying at day schools

I believe bullying is one of the biggest problems facing our Jewish day schools ("The bullied day school student," CJN, June 5). The challenge, as always, is not only to deal with this issue, but to get our school administrators to admit there is a problem. All too often, principals and guidance counsellors blame the victim. This has made it impossible for bullied children and their parents to speak out.

Last year, I co-authored a book with Rachael Turkienicz titled My Worst Best Sleepover Party, which dealt with school bullying. The responses that have come in, including from Jewish day schools, have astounded us. Much needs to be done in our Jewish community schools and elsewhere to address these issues. The first step is, however, to shine a light on the problem and admit that it exists.

I read with interest the editorial "Shocked and wary" (CJN, May 29), which is subtly, if not explicitly, critical of the Israeli government's peace talks with Syria, on the basis of returning the Golan Heights. The Israeli peace camp, security establishment and most of the international community – but not the United States – back this move. Whether or not it is a distraction from Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's legal difficulties, it may well bring tangible gains toward a stable region.

This diplomatic activity is happening quite against the will of the United States. In fact, many analysts have pointed out that U.S. President George W. Bush's recent chutzpadik words about appeasement while speaking before the Knesset were not simply aimed at U.S. Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama, but at Israeli policy. It is puzzling, and ironic then, that the same folks who label criticism of Israel's hawkish policies as irresponsible, if not anti-Semitic, or "self-hating," are glad to be critical of a move that may well deprive the region of a significant source of tension. Perhaps the Golan is more important than a regional entente to this crowd. To boot, Olmert has the support of much of the Israeli security establishment, according to Ha'aretz, and if he doesn't have the support of the majority of the population, neither do many leaders who make tough decisions.

As a longtime critic of Israel, I am surprised I am defending Israeli policy from allegedly "pro-Israel" voices.

CIC reflects diversity of opinion

While we agree that Peace Now has played an important role in the public policy debate in Israel – and within the pro-Israel community here in Canada – the Canada-Israel Committee takes exception to Sheldon Gordon's misleading assertions regarding Peace Now's inclusion within the CIC or its Quebec affiliate, the Quebec-Israel Committee ("Peace Now made the 'unthinkable thinkable,'" CJN, June 12).The appointments to both boards are ad persona and no organization is represented as such. That said, the CIC has always succeeded in ensuring that the widest possible range of perspectives are given a voice around the table, including those that reflect the positions advocated by Peace Now. The pro-Israel community benefits greatly from the diversity of opinion that is found within the CIC board – Jewish and non-Jewish, right wing and left, and young and old – as well as geographic and gender balance.

Will Obama be good for Israel?

By LESLIE SUSSER
JTA

Although Israeli officialdom is not commenting on the possibility of Barack Obama being the next U.S. president, in private some officials in Jerusalem are expressing mixed feelings about the prospect.

Some in government quarters are concerned that Obama, the Democratic nominee, might be soft on Iran, pressure Israel to make concessions on the Palestinian track and even change the tenor of the strategic relationship between Israel and the United States.

Yet Israeli Foreign Ministry experts on U.S. foreign policy say no American president, Obama included, would adopt an overtly anti-Israeli posture.

Israel's left wing hopes that an Obama administration will be more hands-on in Israeli-Palestinian peacemaking, perhaps even pressing the parties into a mutually beneficial deal. By the same token, the right wing fears that an Obama administration and the Israeli government could be on a collision course, especially if Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu wins the next Israeli election.

Obama's powerfully expressed commitment to Israel at the annual American Israel Public Affairs Committee policy conference June 4 in Washington went a long way toward assuaging Israeli fears.

Israeli officials noted Obama's readiness to use force against Iran if necessary, his promise to maintain the Israel Defense Forces' qualitative edge, his support for isolating Hamas and his commitment to Israel's Jewish character, with Jerusalem as its undivided capital.

But the officials also offered two caveats.

Although Obama, an Illinois senator, is saying all the right things, there is no way of knowing what he would actually do in office. Unlike his Republican opponent, Arizona Senator John McCain, Obama cannot boast a long, unwavering record of support for Israel.

Second, some pundits argued that his commitment to a united Jerusalem was so obviously over the top that it cast doubt on the rest of what he had to say on June 4.

Following harsh Palestinian reaction to his comments on Jerusalem, Obama clarified his remarks the next day, telling CNN that the fate of the city would be up to Israel and the Palestinians to discuss.

The main worry in Israel is over Obama's readiness to talk to Iran. Israeli officials and pundits are concerned that the Iranians will play the Americans for suckers, building nuclear weapons under the cloak of ongoing negotiations.

In late May, the Foreign Ministry's research department convened a meeting of ministry and outside experts to discuss "American foreign policy after Bush," including the possible implications of an Obama presidency. The conclusion: Israel has no reason to worry, regardless of who wins the White House.

The consensus was that because support for Israel is so strong in both Congress and American public opinion, no president would take a radically different tack.

Pressure on Israel is unlikely, the experts said, since the main focus in the Middle East for the new U.S. president will be Iraq and Iran, not Israel and the Palestinians.

Says Jerusalem's status is up to Israel, Palestinians

On Iran, any U.S. administration will try diplomacy before using force, the experts agreed, including McCain. They also saw merit in Obama's argument that if the United States negotiates with Iran in good faith and fails, it then would have far more moral justification if it resorts to force to destroy Iranian nuclear installations.

"I don't think diplomacy and even direct negotiations are necessarily a sign of being soft," one of the experts, Alon Pinkas, a former Israeli consul general in New York, told JTA. "I think it's an avenue that if successful could be beneficial to Israel, especially since he's not taking the military option off the table.

"I am not sure that Rambo – let's bomb them back into the Stone Age – is necessarily a better policy."

Pinkas noted two more reasons why Israel has nothing to fear from Obama. One, after the staunchly pro-Israel Clinton and Bush administrations, the classic conflict between pro-Israeli and more "even-handed" American policy is a thing of the past, he said. Two, Obama almost certainly will appoint an overwhelmingly pro-Israel cabinet.

"I just cannot see Obama deviating from that general pro-Israeli position," Pinkas said.

Where Pinkas does see a possible change in U.S. policy under Obama is on the Israel-Syria peace track. He thinks an Obama administration might make the Syrians an offer they can't refuse, coaxing them to leave the Iranian axis and join the moderate pro-western Arab coalition.

"If this is part of a grand U.S. strategy to isolate Iran, then it could be very much in Israel's interest," he said.

On the Israeli right, however, suspicion of Obama remains strong. Likud hawks are still seething over remarks Obama made to a group of Jewish leaders in Cleveland.

"I think there is a strain within the pro-Israel community that says unless you adopt an unwavering pro-Likud approach to Israel, then you're anti-Israel, and that can't be the measure of our friendship with Israel," Obama said in March.

Likudniks recall the severe strains in relations between Israel and the Clinton administration when (then Israeli prime minister) Benjamin Netanyahu refused to make concessions to the Palestinians. They fear Netanyahu and Obama could be on the same kind of collision course, but with worse consequences, especially if it turns out that Obama doesn't share Clinton's profound commitment to Israel.

Pinkas points out that the Clinton-Netanyahu tension resulted from Netanyahu's allying with Newt Gingrich, the Republican speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives, against the administration. Netanyahu has not made the same mistake this time, having taken pains to establish good relations with Obama.

Perhaps more than anything else, the question of how the next U.S. president will relate to Israel may rest on another as-yet-unknowable factor: who will be Israel's next prime minister.

He would benefit Jews, candidate's half-brother says

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The half-brother of U.S. Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama, Malik Obama, told Israel Army Radio last week that Obama would make a good president for Jews.

Malik Obama, a Muslim who resides in a small village in western Kenya, also requested to send a special blessing to the Jewish people around the world from the Obama family in Kenya.

The Obama brothers' father, a senior economist for the Kenyan government who studied at Harvard University, died in car crash in 1982. He left six sons and a daughter. All of his children, except Malik, live in Britain or the United States.

Barack Obama grew up in Hawaii with his American mother after his parents divorced and did not meet his brother Malik until 1985.

Opinions

Happiness is being content

Last month, I briefly discussed the notion of the tension between a forward-looking perspective versus a focus on the present. I would like to add to that with a further reflection on an appreciation of the present moment.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

We are perhaps by nature forced to look to the future – to plan for our next move, to think about what will happen soon and what we will do about it, to try to improve.

Evolutionary theory reinforces the notion of constant change: survival requires that we attend to the changing world with a positive disposition to the future. We try to progress.

Additionally, as Jews, we have learned not to take the future for granted and to work hard for its treasures. But we can't ignore the present. There is a well-known statement from Pirkei Avot that says, "Who is wealthy? One who is happy with their lot." That sentiment speaks directly to the point I am developing.

The personal perspective is essential. Any appreciation of the current moment must also involve, or rest on, our ability to be satisfied with our own existence. The word "lot" can refer to wealth, destiny or character, so the phrase is rich in potential meanings.

I believe our sages were trying to turn us away from prioritizing material wealth. Being rich and having many physical goods does not make one happy. In fact, wanting more material goods, the basis of consumerism, is seen as a negative attribute. But the value of contentment is satisfaction with one's own allotment in life.

That element speaks more to one's natural attributes and one's heritage – genetic, familial and communal. The intent of the statement, it seems to me, is to warn us to be personally gratified with who we are. It's about our destiny in some ways, but more importantly, it's about our character, and the values and qualities we live by.

It's not about over-confidence, nor a signal for arrogance, to be sure.

These sentiments were brought home to me at my grandson's bar mitzvah. The rabbi used this aphorism to explain to Avi that he should understand and appreciate his rich birthright and his wonderful character. It was an ego boost of the best sort – an attempt to give confidence to a young Jew at precisely the right instant, for precisely the right reasons.

It was also a wonderful praise for the present moment. Live for now. Be content. That is happiness. Don't look to others' riches. Learn to appreciate your own – those of your own personality, your family, your community and your people.

With that kind of view, we can see how very rich – read: blessed – we truly are.

Jews should stand with First Nations

Our family's recent visit to newly renovated Quadra Island First Nations' Nuyumbalees Cultural Centre reminded us that, in the living memory of many, the cultural genocide practised on them resonates harshly today.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Beginning in the 19th century and continuing well into the 20th, federal Indian agents and Christian missionaries despoiled the physical and cultural legacies of Canada's First Nations. There were specific ways in which this was accomplished.

First, missionaries decided to recreate the "pagan Indian" in their own white and Christian image. They did this by various means, but the one that struck us most forcefully was the creation of communities like Metlakatla, near Prince Rupert, where the indigenous people were taught to forsake their hunting and fishing ways – and, not incidentally, to shed their attachment to feasts, potlatches and story-telling through mask dances, all the trappings of an un-Christian life. Then they would be turned into proper farmers and seamstresses.

One photograph shows a row of native women sitting primly behind sewing machines, forlorn and lost souls. By taking them away from their villages, the missions prepared their charges for a new and civilized way of life. By moving them away, they destroyed vital links to a past and a culture,

The second blow was a concerted and sweeping effort by Indian agents to confiscate regalia of the ceremonial dances that anchored each family and clan in a total worldview, giving them a past and a place in the culture. Thus they were robbed of ways to tell their foundation stories. That precious regalia as begun to return to the bands, as museums and private collectors around the world find their consciences and return the masks, rattles, screens and story poles to their rightful owners.

The most well-known way in which this cultural – and at times physical – disfigurement was accomplished was the practice of forcing children into residential schools, where they were beaten, raped and deprived of any meaningful family life. We see the results of this horror on our streets daily, as a new generation struggles to recover their equilibrium.

I must also mention one other factor that strikes a chord within our own community. First Nations, at least here on the West Coast, were matrilineal. When the British came, they mandated in law that "Indian status" was to be determined by patrilineal descent – based on their own perception of the way things should be. With the stroke of a pen, they rearranged an entire cultural base.

Over the centuries, we, too, have been often despoiled of our most precious objects and forced from our homes. Talmuds were burned in the fires of the Inquisition, along with their scholars. Entire populations faced conversion or death. Most recently, our European experience turned to smoke. Matrilineal descent has been central to our identity for 2,000 years. How would we feel if we were forced by the state to abandon it?

How would we feel if we could no longer read our foundational stories from our printed texts, or if we could no longer celebrate our festivals – most notably Pesach – with the Haggadah and the ceremony of the seder? Or if we had our children taken from us (shades of the czar's conscription gangs)?

Yet let's not kid ourselves. Today First Nations' image of Jews and Israel may not be so favourable. It's easier to relate to the Palestinian image of a displaced and persecuted people than it is to understand the complex set of circumstances that created Israel, and the convoluted battles between Palestinians and Israelis.

Being guided through the Quadra museum by a First Nations young woman (who is studying criminology at university), I meditated on the shared experiences of our peoples struggling to preserve our most precious legacies, and how difficult it is for us to understand and speak to each other's stories of destruction and redemption.

Had there been no North American democracies to receive Jewish refugees in the past century, we would have lost many millions more people.

We benefited from a safe haven, while the First Nations have suffered from the destruction of their cultures.

We owe it to Canada's First Nations to stand with them as they reclaim their heritage.

Courts, tribunals will advance 'reasonable accommodation'

The phrase "reasonable accommodation" has been in the news lately. "Reasonable accommodation" is a legal concept designed to eliminate discrimination and achieve equality by respecting and taking into account the sensitivities of various minorities, including religious and cultural groups.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

The issue recently came to the fore in the province of Quebec as a result of various minority assertions, including some from members of Montreal's chassidic community.

Over the past 25 years, the concept of accommodation has arisen in a number of cases. In the Multani case, the Supreme Court of Canada recognized, in 2006, that school board officials in Quebec must permit Sikhs to wear their kirpans (ceremonial daggers) to school as part of their religious obligations.

This decision ignited the debate on reasonable accommodation in Quebec. The debate was exacerbated by the attitudes of certain politicians, including Action Democratique leader Mario Dumont, and was strongly fuelled by the press. Reasonable accommodation dominated Quebec's public discourse for months.

In response, the government of Quebec created the Bouchard-Taylor Commission, formally known as the Consultation Commission on Accommodation Practices related to Cultural Differences. This commission was mandated to study and make recommendations concerning the application of reasonable accommodation in addressing minority issues.

The Bouchard-Taylor Commission held public hearings, reviewed more than 900 briefs and conducted four province-wide forums. The various town hall meetings provided venues for the occasional rant by individuals who expressed intolerant, prejudicial attitudes. The issues were also debated on phone-in radio shows and other forums, at which people expressed less-than-accepting attitudes toward minorities. In addition, the town of Herouxville and its biased code of conduct for newcomers – that included banning the covering of faces – attracted considerable national and international attention.

The commission issued its report in May. It contains a series of rather benign and generally acceptable recommendations, some of which attracted immediate public attention. For example, the report recommended the removal of the crucifix in the Quebec legislature, a recommendation already rejected by the Quebec government.

The Bouchard-Taylor report recognized that Quebec, a multicultural mosaic, is not a racist society and acknowledged that respect and accommodation of minorities is the norm to be incorporated into Quebec life and society. However, there is a growing view that Quebec ought not to embody traditional multiculturalism as we know it, but rather should opt for the notion of "interculturalism," in which the various diverse components of Quebec society would establish a special bond and relationship with the mainstream French reality that defines Quebec life.

In a sense, interculturalism is a rejection of traditional multiculturalism in favour of a duality consisting of mainstream French Quebec together with the diversity that defines modern Quebec demographically. Interculturalism encourages the use of French "as the common language of intercultural relations" and "cultivates a pluralistic orientation." It encourages the notions of both interaction and integration.

Interestingly, the report included a small section on anti-Semitism and the Jewish community in Quebec. The commission's work was commended in a press release issued by the Quebec region of Canadian Jewish Congress. It was also generally applauded in newspaper editorials and commentaries.

What is the significance of the Bouchard-Taylor report? What benefits will flow from the $3.7 million report?

For the most part, the Bouchard-Taylor report will be minimal in its impact and its work will likely fade from the public eye. Predictably, the recommendations will be placed on the back burner of Quebec politics. Rather, it is likely that our courts and anti-discrimination tribunals will continue to render decisions that will advance the notion of reasonable accommodation in order to protect the needs and aspirations of the diverse minority segments of society. In that way, the march toward a truly multicultural society – whether it is described as traditional "multiculturalism" or as Quebec "interculturalism" – will continue to be fostered, if not by governments, then likely by the courts.

Reasonable accommodation, as a legal and moral norm, will continue to re-define Quebec and Canadian society, reflecting the demographics of modern diversity. It is a norm that will predictably benefit Jewish and other minorities and will lead to a less insular and more accepting Canada.

The Kirshner File

Palestinian factions struggle for dominance

Exactly a year ago, following months of intense bickering, armed clashes and a string of broken ceasefires, the Palestinian national movement splintered into two bitter rival factions as Hamas, an Islamic fundamentalist organization backed by Iran, seized control of the Gaza Strip from Fatah, a secular group supported by Israel and the United States. Coming just 18 months after Hamas trounced Fatah in Palestinian parliamentary elections and only four months after Fatah and Hamas formed a national unity government in the wake of a summit in Mecca, Saudi Arabia, the fighting reached its climax when Hamas captured the last bastion of Fatah's authority in Gaza, the headquarters of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Responding to Hamas' swift military victory and coup, which resulted in the deaths of more than 100 fighters and civilians, Abbas declared a state of emergency and disbanded the government, firing Ismail Haniyeh, the Hamas prime minister, and replacing him with Salam Fayyad, an economist. Fatah also raided Hamas institutions in the West Bank, which remains under Fatah's control.

Observers were less than surprised that their power-sharing arrangement dissolved in an orgy of bloodshed. Fatah, once the kingmaker in Palestinian politics, could not adjust to its diminished role as junior partner in a government in which Hamas held most cabinet seats. And Fatah was angered by Hamas' refusal to accept Israeli and international conditions to end the boycott of the unity government: recognition of Israel, renouncement of terrorism and acceptance of previous accords signed by Israel and the Palestinian authority.

Omar Suleiman

One year on, with Hamas and Fatah still at loggerheads over these fundamental issues, the prospect of a rapprochement appears dim.

But as far as Israel is concerned, the status quo is just fine. Israel's position, as enunciated by Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, is that Hamas should be left out in the cold. In line with this view, Israel has branded the Hamas regime in Gaza "an enemy entity" and has continued to blockade it.

At the moment, there is only a slim chance that Hamas and Fatah will hug and make up, judging by the lingering tensions and an ongoing war of words. Indeed, the two sides are at knife's edge, having clashed in Gaza since last June.

Abbas, having branded Hamas' takeover of Gaza as "a grave crime," has urged Palestinians to "topple this gang." He has insisted that Hamas must relinquish its grip on Gaza and agree to fresh elections before reconciliation talks can take place. But last week, in a startling reversal of policy due to his pessimism regarding the state of current peace negotiations with Israel, he called for a renewal of dialogue with Hamas.

Abbas has also called on Israel to lift economic restrictions on Gaza and allow the flow of food, gas, electricity and medical supplies into that impoverished enclave. Tacitly, however, he has co-operated with Israel and the United States in efforts to isolate Hamas and close off Gaza.

Prior to Abbas' latest conciliatory statement, Fatah and Hamas conducted preliminary discussions to heal their rift, but these sporadic talks have failed to ease mutual animosities. Last November, after Haniyeh hinted he might be ready to cede Gaza to Fatah, Abbas met a group of Hamas leaders in the West Bank town of Ramallah. The meeting was described by Fatah as an effort to wean so-called Hamas moderates away from radicals. It was followed by two Fatah-Hamas "fraternal dialogues," the first in Sanaa, Yemen, and the second in Dakar, Senegal. Both were aimed at ironing out "divergences" and "reconciling the Palestinian family."

Mahmoud Abbas

In practical terms, these summits have changed nothing on the ground. Hamas has tightened its hold on Gaza and conditions there have deteriorated alarmingly.

By one estimate, the unemployment rate hovers around the 50 per cent mark, with 80 per cent of Gaza's residents being dependent on food aid.

School buses have stopped running, water and sewage systems are close to collapsing, hospitals suffer from power cuts of up to 12 hours a day, and illnesses such as diarrhea are on the increase.

Yet the suffering that ordinary Palestinians endure has not dented Hamas' popularity in Gaza. According to a survey released by Arab World for Research and Development, Haniyeh would defeat Abbas if an election were held today.

Although the Palestinians are fed up with Israel's siege, which enables the Israeli armed forces to control Gaza's border, air space and coastline, they feel that the Palestinian Authority has not been sufficiently tough in current peace talks with Israel.

As well, many Palestinians believe that Fatah has not cured itself of corrupt practices, examples of which abound. The former speaker of the Palestinian Legislative Council and Abbas' adviser, Rouhi Fattouh, has come under suspicion for having smuggled thousands of cellphones into the West Bank from Jordan. In addition, the former Palestinian prime minister, Ahmed Qurei, has been accused of depositing $3 million (US) in PLO funds into his private bank account.

The appalling humanitarian situation in Gaza and the lack of progress in Israel's peace talks with the Palestinians has damaged the prospects of a two-state solution, says United Nations Middle East envoy Robert Serry.

Tzipi Livni

Nevertheless, the majority of Palestinians still support peace negotiations, even though the chances of an agreement have receded since last year's conference in Annapolis, Maryland. Two weeks ago, Qurei, the head of the Palestinian negotiating team, said that no "tangible" results have been achieved, and that an agreement will not be reached this year.

In all likelihood, Israel and the Palestinians will make no further progress unless Hamas becomes part of the process. But the issue that most concerns Israel now is not a formal peace agreement with the Palestinian Authority but an informal ceasefire with Hamas.

Hamas, through the good offices of Egyptian mediator Omar Suleiman, has offered Israel a truce to end cross-border fighting.

Since 2001, and particularly since Israel's unilateral withdrawal from Gaza in 2005, Palestinian militants from Islamic Jihad, Hamas, the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade and the Popular Resistance Committees have fired nearly 8,000 Qassam missiles, mortars and Grad rockets at Israeli kibbutzim and towns, killing more than a dozen Israelis and wounding hundreds more.

By way of retaliation, Israel has launched air raids and armoured forays into Gaza, but to no avail. Israeli reprisals, which have caused unintended civilian casualties, have only emboldened Palestinian radicals. Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, who is caught up in a major corruption scandal that may unseat him sooner rather than later, has threatened to invade Gaza. But he has held back, not being certain that an invasion could achieve the same striking results as Operation Defensive Shield, which was launched in the West Bank in the spring of 2002.

As Olmert contemplates the possibility of of an invasion of Gaza, he continues to make calibrated gestures and concessions to Abbas in a bid to strengthen him. Israel has handed over security responsibilities to the Palestinian Authority in Nablus and Jenin, removed roadblocks, released prisoners, transferred tax revenues, allowed the construction of industrial zones and permitted some Palestinian farmers to export crops. In the meantime, 87 donor nations, led by the United States, have pledged $7.4 billion in aid to Palestinians affiliated with the Palestinian Authority. Yet, as Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak warned recently, the day may yet come when Hamas will try to seize the West Bank – which Israel occupies – from Fatah.

That would spell disaster for Abbas and embroil Israel in new fighting with Hamas.

Northland-B'nai Brith hosts first at-camp reunion

Traditional burning of the NBB to end gathering

By RITA POLIAKOV
CJN Intern

For the first time in its history, Camp Northland-B'nai Brith is holding an at-camp reunion.

Northland has been located on Haliburton's Moose Lake for some 68 years. This year, as the Jewish Camp Council approaches its 100th anniversary, the camp has decided that meeting in Toronto isn't enough for its alumni.

"The reunion is all about memories," said David Berger, the president of the board of directors of the Jewish Camp Council of Toronto. "It's more nostalgic. People can say, 'This is where it was, look at what's changed.' They can reminisce."

The reunion will be held Sept. 7, on the camp's 750 acres. While it's a one-day event, guests can choose to come the night before and sleep over.

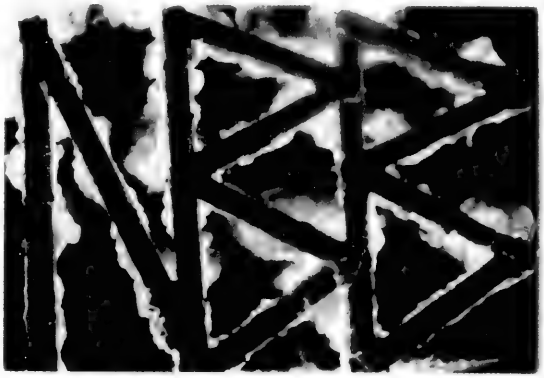
The reunion committee has been planning the event since last fall.

"The response has been good. There's a lot of interest and excitement," said Frank Tizel, chair of the reunion committee.

Ellen Nash, the executive director of the Jewish Camp Council of Toronto and the camp director, is expecting former campers and staff from the 1950s.

"A lot of people say they really want to come back," she said. "Anybody who was ever [at Northland] can come."

This year will be Nash's last as camp director, which is one of the reasons the camp isn't waiting until 2010 to hold the reunion.



The burning of the NBB is a tradition performed the last night of camp each session at Camp Northland-B'nai Brith.

"We had to do it now," Berger said. "Ellen's leaving, and we've had requests."

Like many alumni, former camper Mark Alexander, 37, hasn't seen the camp in years.

"I was 13 to15 [when I went to camp.] I really just want to see the place. I want to see the lake, go out on the dock. [Camp] is a whole other world," he said.

The last two reunions, one in 1990 the other in 2000, were held in Toronto. While Berger is anticipating a successful event, he realizes that fewer people may come.

"In 1990, we had a big event at the Sheridan with well over 1,000 people. The next [reunion] was a Sunday lunch. It was [also] a huge success. This one is different logistically. The community is in the GTA and the camp is 2½ hours north of here," Berger said.

Still, as the Jewish Camp Council prepares to celebrate its centennial in 2009, Berger is hopeful.

"We have a rich history of people attending. This year, [we're doing] something different," he said. "I think the most important thing is to reconnect. We want to continue to reach out to the community through another 100 years."

Since Northland is a sleepover camp, many campers forge lifelong relationships.

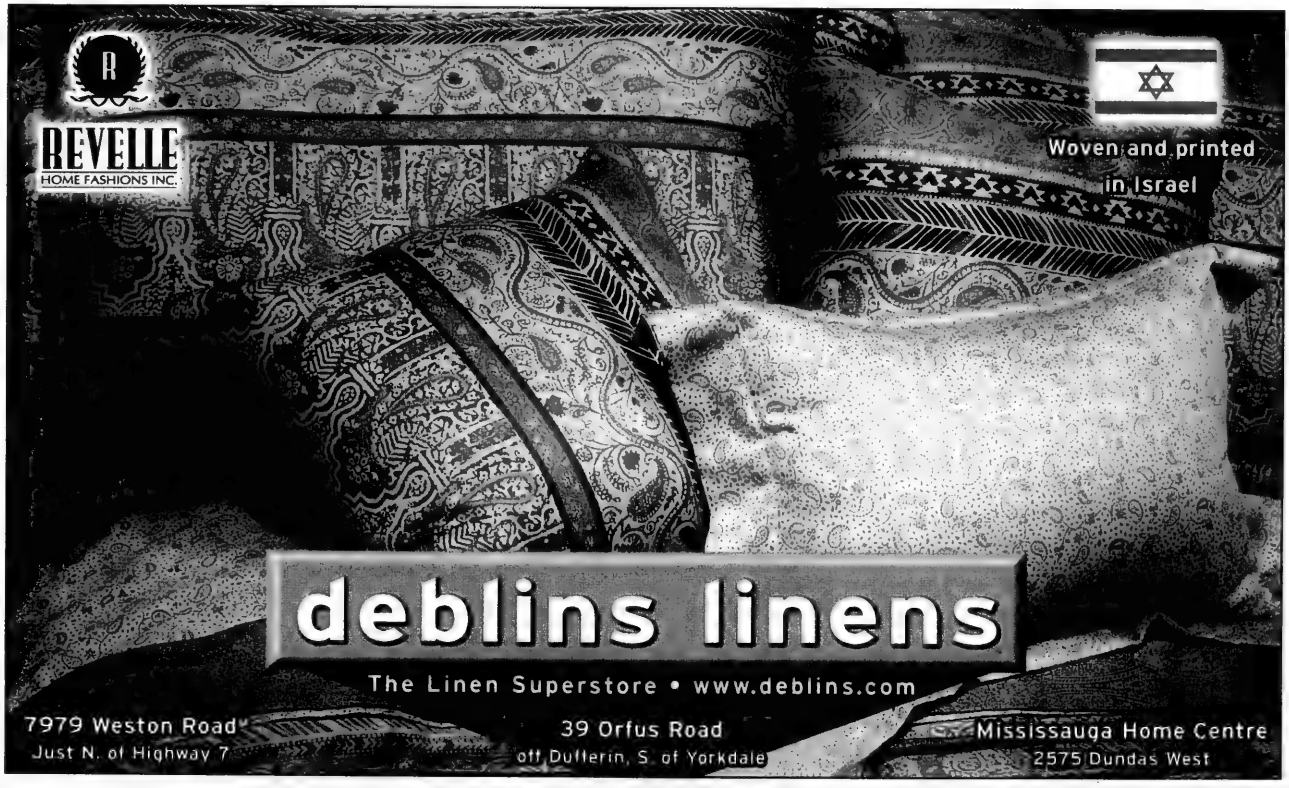
"My wife and I met at camp," Berger said. "I live on a street that's a block long and there are three longtime marriages from Camp Northland. It's an intense environment. Much deeper friendships [form] at camp."

While the upcoming reunion will have programs such as canoeing and swimming, its main purpose will be to allow alumni to see each other again.

"Programming is less important," Berger said. "When we first started [having reunions], we thought we needed programming, but some people never even left the lobby. They saw people they knew – they were too busy talking to pay attention," he said.

The reunion will end with the traditional burning of a wooden Northland-B'nai Brith sculpture.

"It's quite touching," Tizel said.



Holocaust Education Centre gets $10M donation

Holocaust survivor Michael (Chaim) Neuberger has donated $10 million to UJA Federation of Greater Toronto to build a new Holocaust centre.

The new centre will be part of the Sherman campus, the community services development currently under construction on Bathurst Street north of Sheppard Avenue on the site of the current Bathurst Jewish Community Centre.

Neuberger was honoured at a groundbreaking ceremony at the Lipa Green Building on June 16.

Neuberger's entire family – his parents, four brothers and one sister – were killed in the Holocaust. The 78-year-old builder made the commitment a few days after hearing about the plans to include the Holocaust Centre in the planned National Centre for Jewish Heritage on the Sherman campus.

To be renamed the Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre, it will continue to have an impact on the 60,000 people, many of them students, who visit the centre or attend its programs every year. The new centre will accommodate thousands more visitors a year.

"Educating people of all faiths about the Holocaust is so important to me" Neuberger said. "We want to build this centre so that all people, of all ages and all nationalities, will learn the truth, and learn from the lessons of the past."

Holocaust survivor Michael Neuberger gives gift

In addition to expanding its current programs to include interactive, high-tech exhibits and a multimedia learning centre, the centre will provide outreach and anti-racism training programs for community organizations and redevelop its museum.

"Mr. Neuberger's gift is a true inspiration. His personal journey from the horrific experiences of the Holocaust to a man who gives so generously to ensure that the past is never repeated will stand as a shining example for generations to come," said UJA Federation chair David Koschitzky.

Holocaust Centre of Toronto chair Lorraine Sandler said, "The generous, visionary leadership displayed by Mr. Neuberger is nothing short of phenomenal. Not only will the Jewish community in Toronto and around the world benefit from what will be an unprecedented centre of learning, engagement and culture, but so, too, will the community at large."

Established in 1985, UJA Federation's Holocaust Centre is committed to preserving the memories of the victims, honouring the legacies of those who survived and educating the community so that the Holocaust will serve as a warning to future generations about the dangers of anti-Semitism, racism, intolerance and indifference.

As part of its mandate, the centre reaches out to people from across Ontario every year – many of them non-Jews. Students who participate in field trips to the centre or in programs offered by the centre at schools across Ontario learn the lessons of the Holocaust and meet with survivors.

Among its programs, the centre is responsible for the annual Holocaust Education Week and the community's Holocaust Remembrance Day commemoration. It also offers consulting services on Holocaust education programs in the public, private and Jewish school systems, as well as training for educators.

With an anticipated completion date of fall 2011, the Sherman campus will be home to Jewish organizations and agencies dedicated to building community through cultural, educational, athletic and recreational activities.

The campus is an initiative of the Tomorrow Campaign, sponsored by UJA Federation, which is building three community services complexes in the GTA.

The campus is being redeveloped by internationally renowned architects Sol Wassermuhl and Mansoor Kazerouni of Page+Steele Architects. The facilities will be fully integrated and linked with each other by open exhibition areas and gallery walkways, and are being developed as an extension of the lush environment of the ravine where the campus is located.

Jewish prayer to be part of Queen's Park rituals

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Jewish prayer is coming to Queen's Park.

After months of debate, a legislative committee looking into what Premier Dalton McGuinty calls "a more inclusive approach" to the daily opening ceremonies in the legislature decided last week not to do away with the Lord's Prayer.

Instead, the Ontario legislature will continue to commence each session with the Christian ritual. But starting this week, it will also be followed by a second activity that will include a rotation of different prayers from various faith communities in the province, including aboriginal, Buddhist, Hindu, Muslim, Jewish, Baha'i and Sikh. Other options could be a special recitation or a moment of silence.

MPPs must ask Speaker Steve Peters to have other prayers added to the list, but Peters said last week that he will put that decision in the hands of an committee of elected politicians from all three parties, Canadian Press reported.

The legislature passed the motion supporting the move in a 58-0 vote.

In February, McGuinty sent a letter to the other provincial party leaders asking them to review the daily practice of reciting the Lord's Prayer at Queen's Park.

He also sought input from the province's Jewish and other faith communities.

At the time, the request sparked some outrage from Christian groups and the provincial Conservatives.

In response to McGuinty's letter, provincial Conservative leader John Tory – who unsuccessfully ran his 2007 election campaign on a platform of incorporating faith-based schools into the public school system – said the Tories would partake in the all-party committee, but not at the expense of the prayer.

In a statement last Thursday on the Liberal website, McGuinty thanked the all-party committee for its work.

"Ontarians have shown once again that with a spirit of co-operation and goodwill, we can resolve anything. And that's what has been done today," he said.

McGuinty added: "The legislature belongs to all of us, and now its practices will reflect a modern Ontario that is home to many faiths and creeds, and anticipates a future every bit as open, and compassionate and respectful as the Ontario we have built, together."

Canadian Jewish Congress praised the announcement.

"I think this is a very positive outcome," said Frank Bialystok, chair of Congress' Ontario region. "It is entirely appropriate that this diversity take its rightful place, along with the traditional reading of the Lord's Prayer, at Queen's Park."

The Jewish prayer to be used comes from Psalms 145 and Numbers 6: 24-26, combining parts of Ashrei and the Kohanic blessings.

Spokesperson Wendy Lampert said CJC was consulted by the committee on the issue, but said she didn't know how the prayers were chosen.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Were they that bad after all?

Rabbinic Reflections

"Why did you just do that?

"Why did I just do what?

Most often, if we were to question people about what they are doing, they would not even realize that there is anything to question. This is due in no small part to the fact that our routines become so much a part of our lives that meaning and reflection are difficult to come by. But the results of having such automatic routines can be devastating.

Rashi and the midrash point out that in Bamidbar, the Book of Numbers, the incident where Miriam speaks inappropriately about Moses immediately precedes the story of the miraglim, the spies who are sent to scout out the Promised Land.

For speaking against her brother, Miriam is stricken with a form of leprosy that lasts for seven days. When the miraglim return with a negative report about the Promised Land, all but two of them saying that it is too strong for the Israelites, the punishment is that their generation will die in the desert and only the next generation will get to enter the Promised Land.

The juxtaposition of the two stories, Rashi and the midrash explain, comes because the blatant example of HaShem's ability to reward and punish, as seen in Miriam's case, was intended to be taken to heart by all, but unfortunately, the spies failed to do this only a short time thereafter.

The obvious question is how could the miraglim possibly lose sight of God's ability to reward and punish justly? The midrash tells us that these were men of the highest order, those for whom Moses received HaShem's approbation of their worthiness to be tribal princes. If they didn't know of HaShem's justice, how could they have been so illustrious? And granting the possibility that they did not know, what would the example of Miriam have initiated in their minds? How could paying heed to that example have changed anything?

The conclusion we must draw is that the more deeply we focus upon the happenings around us, the more attuned we are to our goals in life. To stop and think about what is going on in the world and why these things happen is to avail ourselves of the wake-up call HaShem is constantly sending us.

The miraglim's mistake lay in their slight laziness of thought. Had they reflected upon the incident of Miriam and its meaning to the Jewish people, they might indeed not have perpetrated their own misdeed.

It is important to realize that most of our mistakes are born out of simple ignorance, not bothering to contemplate what would be to our own benefit. Let us prepare to clearly know the answer to the question, "Why did you just do that?" answering proudly, "Because I know it was the right thing to do!"

Missionaries on Ben Yehuda

IDEAS ON IDENTITY

By Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

I've had just about every experience possible in Israel. But on my most recent trip, I had a brand new one that I wasn't quite prepared for: Christian missionaries trying to convert me. Not just once, but twice. The first time was in the Galilee, and the second, of all places, was on the Ben Yehuda pedestrian mall in Jerusalem on a lively Saturday night.

My family likes to joke that if missionaries approach me, they better be prepared to be converted to Judaism by the time I'm done with them. I ask them if they can go verse on verse with me in the original Hebrew, and if not, to come back when they can.

When I got back on the bus from the first "good news" experience, I asked the members of my tour what they would have done or said. We Canadians are so polite. Most of them agreed that they would not have wanted to be "rude" and would have politely said, "No thank you," and moved on.

Not be rude? No thank you? Isn't the person who is interrupting your day, violating your privacy, monopolizing your time, disrupting your train of thought or conversation, and trying to get you to change your life without even knowing you the one being rude?

Those trying to convert you are not afraid of confrontation. They are afraid of knowledge, commitment and strength. They are looking for vulnerability and ignorance, for confusion, insecurity and "polite listening."

They are shocked when they meet a religious conviction as strong as their own.

I was sad to be proselytized in Israel, because missionaries find fertile ground there among sincere seekers as much as among the lost and lonely. Those seeking spiritual passion will often go looking for it in another faith before they start searching for it in their own, and until they do, they are moving targets.

I shared my answer to the missionaries with my tour group, and they asked me to reprint it here. I give you full permission to quote or edit it to however you would feel most confident saying it: "You have it all wrong my friend. I am so passionate, so strong, so clear in my Jewish faith that you can actually be inspired and influenced by me. You see, I've been given a great gift— the Torah. I continually unwrap that gift and use it, enjoy it and grow from it. I'd be happy to share it with you, but if you'd rather not, then you stay focused on what you believe your gift is, and I will stay focused on what I am sure my gift is, and we can live in harmony and use our different gifts to make this world a better place."

Because I felt particularly stunned to be proselytized in a place that I feel secure in as a Jew, I added this: "On top of that, you have chosen to come into my own living room to try and get me to move houses. This whole country is my living room. Israel is my home as a Jew and the only place I can be fully who I am without apology. Aren't you ashamed to come into my own house to convince me to change my house?"

By the way, I didn't end with "Thank you."

Jewish Life

Agriprocessors raises ethical issues

Money Matters

By Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

The kashrut industry is about more than just food. In an industry in which sales reach into the billions of dollars, many of the continent's largest food companies have sought and received kosher certification, seeing it as a way to increase profits. With the ongoing U.S. federal investigations into the Agriprocessors meat processing plant in Postville, Iowa, we need to examine whether or not kashrut certification is also about more than keeping kosher.

Agriprocessors, the largest kosher meatpacking plant in North America (although the majority of the meat that it sells is actually not kosher) has been accused of a myriad of legal violations – ranging from unfair labour practices to safety issues and immigration fraud – and was recently raided by the U.S. government.

These accusations, if they're proven to be true, would represent the antithesis of anything "kosher," and they raise the crucial question of whether a kosher supervising agency should be supervising anything other than the actual kashrut of the food produced.

Jewish law demands absolute fidelity to all applicable local laws, not to mention the moral obligation to sanctify the name of God. However, whether enforcing such moral imperatives should come under the purview of rabbis, who may have very little training in these matters, is much less clear.

Such a question is really one of public policy and not one of pure Jewish law. Whether or not the food is kosher is a question of fact, unrelated to any other issues, serious though they may be. Kashrut supervision is only needed for those whose kashrut can't be trusted. One may rely on the kashrut of those who personally keep kosher. However, the complexity of the food industry, coupled with man's insatiable appetite for money and the need for sound social policy, have produced a situation in which the supervision of all commercial enterprises is needed.

Ironically, the difficulty of fully monitoring the goings-on in food production has led to a situation in which certain kashrut organizations will only grant supervision to ritually observant Jews – a tacit admission that such agencies are incapable of supervising all that goes on in the production of food. We thus, on some level, revert back to a system of trust, limiting such trust to those who take kashrut seriously.

Tragically, there is little correlation between kashrut observance and business ethics, and it's not uncommon to see people with ethics that are extremely wanting who nonetheless are meticulous observers of kashrut. While one can make a legitimate argument that no kashrut certification should be given to anyone unless all of a person's business practices are also certified "kosher," such an approach may be simplistic and counter-productive. While ethical business practices are, in the hierarchy of Jewish values, more important than kashrut, is taking away kashrut supervision the best way to ensure honesty among producers of kosher products? This would require careful analysis, recognizing that such action may cause people – especially those who are not meticulously observant – to opt to buy non-kosher meat.

And where would we draw the line? What if an owner smokes or gossips frequently? Might we add in a layer of social enforcement – say not granting supervision to a company whose environmental record is questionable? Should food that's high in fat content not be certified kosher?

If the goal is to increase the availability of kosher products at affordable prices, perhaps it's best to leave these issues to other agencies. Yet at the same time, we must be concerned with public perception – of being an accessory to wrongdoing, and of promoting the terrible misconception that kashrut is more important then ethics.

While there are no easy answers, it's important that that we continue to ask the questions, thereby sensitizing our ethical antennas.

Summer camp nostalgia, Pt. 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last week we began our look at the mystique of summer camp by quoting from Allan Sherman's classic song Camp Granada, in which he pleads for freedom but then decides to give camp a second chance – and stay a second day. [tinyurl.com/49az2d]

Sherman has nothing on Rabbi Joshua Hammerman. Recently, he pulled out some of his camp letters from when he was 10. Here's one: "Dear folks, I really am sad now. I need more food because I haven't had anything to eat. My swimming teacher is making me jump into the water, but I don't want to. I'm scared of putting my clothes into the laundry because I'll lose them and they'll come back different colours. Send earplugs."

But then Rabbi Hammerman continues, "What's funny is that I actually loved camp – even that first year – because I discovered there what children have been discovering about summer camp for decades, and what Jews have known for millennia – when you leave home, you can reinvent yourself." He then draws the parallel of how Abraham had to leave his home in order to found a new faith. And later, when Jews were sent into exile in Babylon, they were forced to examine themselves and create new national institutions. [tinyurl.com/5x8wbx]

Those are big shoes for a summer camp to fill. But what Jewish activity has the greatest impact on campers? After interviewing more than 100 professional and lay leaders involved in Jewish camping, researchers Gary Tobin and Meryle Weinstein think they found the answer: Shabbat. Brian Greene of Camp Ramah in California agrees. "Beginning Friday afternoon, the camp is cleaned, and campers prepare themselves to put on their best. Our campers prepare 'Shabbat-o-grams,'" wishing one another a good Shabbat. "Our children are inspired by that and look for ways to take it home." [tinyurl.com/6x7fbh]

If you've ever spent a summer at camp and want to relive those long ago joys – and traumas – then don't miss The Girls of Summer by Geraldine Sherman. Sherman was a camper at Camp Kawagama in the 1950s in northern Ontario. Her story begins as she and her childhood friends attend the funeral of their beloved camp director. With the help of the girls of Cabin 22, she looks at how the time they spent at a summer camp almost half a century ago moulded who they are today. Even the picture on the website of Sherman and the Kawagamite girls in their plaid shirts, with broad grins on their faces, will bring smiles and a touch of melancholy to anyone who's been there and done that. [tinyurl.com/2dbgav]

What is it about Camp Kawagama that exercises this lifelong hold (or at least turns out some great journalists)? Sam Levene spent six summers there long ago, and after he grew up and became a producer at CBC Radio, he decided to try to understand the magic. You can listen in on his trek back to Kawagama Island (and other camps, too). [tinyurl.com/4ueqdy]

For Rebecca Ets-Hokin, memories of summer camp include a not-so-delicious recollection of summer camp meals. "My dining hall memories include rubbery scrambled eggs, warm Kool-Aid and unappetizing stews." Although food has improved considerably since then, its seems Ets-Hokin feels no generation should be deprived of the classics. So she collected recipes for campers' favourites such as Max's Meat Loaf, Tomato Sauce, Garlic Mashed Potatoes and Deborah Newburn's Fruit Crisp. You can rest easy if you don't have 400 mouths to feed in your dining hall. She's adapted the recipes to feed eight. [tiny url.com/2ay2hj]

How to wash all that down? "Bug juice," of course. Phyllis Wilson's recipe for the classic summertime beverage calls for flavoured drink mix, sugar and "red food colouring if you feel a little sadistic," but no bugs. "Serve over ice if you want it cold. Serve with fleishig sandwiches, either on a picnic table under a shelter [day camp] or at long wooden tables with benches in a room with a screen door leading to a flag circle [overnight camp]." [tinyurl.com/2aflw3]

To all campers – and former campers – have a marvellous and safe summer!

Harper cancels first trip to Israel

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Prime Minister Stephen Harper was supposed to make his first visit to Israel this week. Instead, he cancelled his trip on June 6.

Harper's four-day visit was to have run June 16 to 19, and would have brought him to Israel, Jordan and the Palestinian Authority to meet with regional leaders.

Reports out of Israel said Harper decided to nix the excursion to keep a distance from embattled Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's ongoing corruption scandal, which has thrown the country's government into a state of flux.

Olmert is suspected of having illegally received hundreds of thousands of dollars from Jewish American businessman Morris Talansky. Talansky told a preliminary hearing at Jerusalem Magistrates Court that he gave Olmert $150,000 over a period of 15 years.

Harper's staff never confirms a trip until shortly before the PM leaves, so the change was not characterized as a cancellation, but the trip had been talked about publicly.

Calls to the Prime Minister's Office were not returned by The CJN 's deadline.

The Conservative party is considered very friendly toward Israel. In the recent past, both prime ministers have spoken to each other by phone – Olmert called Harper last December from the Annapolis peace summit to personally ask for Canada's help in the Middle East peace process – and, as reported by The CJN in March, the two countries signed a declaration of intent to co-operate further on security matters of mutual concern.

PM Stephen Harper

But the current political climate in Israel seems to have given Harper pause.

Norman Spector, a former Canadian ambassador to Israel and a chief of staff to former Conservative prime minister Brian Mulroney, said: "The domestic situation in Israel, quite frankly, is scandalous… Harper has no business being there when his counterpart is two steps away from the gallows."

Moshe Ronen, chair of the Canada-Israel Committee, told The CJN his organization was informed by the Prime Minister's Office that Harper had contacted Olmert in advance to advise and "discuss" the cancellation.

He said the committee has since been in talks with the PMO to reschedule the visit for this fall.

"While we're disappointed that [Harper's] not going… we know that the trip had not been confirmed for a variety of reasons, some of which had to do with the PM's concern that he would land in a politically hectic and charged Israel," Ronen said.

He added: "That's the judgement call they made. But considering both the domestic reasons and some of the political considerations [for not going], that's a fair position. In our view, Stephen Harper does not have to defend his credentials on Israel. This is not a cancellation, it's a postponement. The PM very much wants to go to Israel."

Why Israel is a better bet than Iran

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Thomas L. Friedman's column "People vs. dinosaurs" (New York Times, June 9, reprinted in the National Post, June 10) is a must-read.

It's one of those rare, important articles that helps put things in perspective by focusing on the big picture, rather than looking through a narrow lens that too many journalists use.

So what's Friedman's big picture and why is it important?

Friedman's column poses the following rhetorical question: why, when Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad repeatedly threatens to destroy Israel is foreign investment flowing into the Jewish state?

As an example, Friedman cited famed American investor Warren Buffet's 2006 purchase of an 80 per cent stake in Israeli precision tool company Iscar, headquartered near the Lebanon border. Significantly, Buffet's investment, worth $4 billion (US), was his first overseas venture.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad

Friedman explained that the deal closed just before Hezbollah "attacked Israel in July 2006, triggering a month-long war."

Friedman asked Iscar chairman Eitan Wertheimer about Buffet's reaction to finding out he had bought a company that was coming under Hezbollah rocket fire.

"Buffett just brushed it off with a wave, recalled Wertheimer: He said, 'I'm not interested in the next quarter. I'm interested in the next 20 years.'"

Despite Israel's political problems, Buffet's strong confidence in the country's long-term future, explained Friedman, is based on Israel's having "a strong civil society. The economy is exploding from the bottom up. Israel's currency, the shekel, has appreciated nearly 30 per cent against the dollar since the start of 2007."

We rarely see this side of Israel. Most daily news reports focus on conflict-driven stories involving threats from Iran, from Iranian- and Syrian-backed Hezbollah in the north, and from Hamas in the south. This, undeniably, is part of the picture, but is not the whole, newsworthy story of Israel in all its complexity.

In broadening the scope of the story, Friedman wrote that Israel's knowledge-based, high-tech economy draws on a population "from 100 different countries, speaking 100 different languages, with a business culture that strongly encourages individual imagination and adaptation, and where being a non-conformist is the norm."

He added that Israel, with a population of seven million people, attracted almost as much venture capital in the first quarter of this year ($572 million US) as did China with a population of 1.3 billion ($719 million).

By contrast, Iran, according to Friedman, "maintains a welfare state, with more than 10 per cent unemployment."

Iran's economy is suffering, even though, as a major crude-exporting nation, it's currently reaping nearly $140 per barrel for its oil. But Iran uses much of that money to import technology – much of it with military applications – from abroad.

Friedman summed up the disparity between the two countries: "Iran's economic and military clout today is largely dependent on extracting oil from the ground. Israel's economic and military power today is entirely dependent on extracting intelligence from its people. Israel's economic power is endlessly renewable. Iran's is a dwindling resource based on fossil fuels made from dead dinosaurs."

So while Ahmadinejad threatens to "wipe Israel off the map," Friedman concluded that he's siding with Buffet's faith in Israel's long-term future: "I'll bet on the people who bet on their people – not the people who bet on dead dinosaurs."

And, in writing about Israel's remarkable economy, Friedman points the way to a larger picture of Israel that other journalists may want to explore.

Speaking about the bigger picture, in "Family brewery keeps head up despite political, religious obstacles" (Toronto Star, June 9), Oakland Ross reported from Taybeh, in the West Bank, about a little-explored corner of the Palestinian economy. "Starting up a brewery in a part of the world that's 98 per cent Muslim definitely seemed like a risky idea at the time," Ross wrote.

He profiled the Khoury family who, for the past 14 years, have run the Taybeh Brewing Company from this small Christian town of about 2,300 residents. As Christians, they are part of a "small and dwindling religious minority in the Palestinian territories," which are dominated by Muslims, for whom alcohol is prohibited. Yet their family business has been a rare success story, though far more successful during the optimistic days of the Oslo process until Palestinian violence erupted in 2000, resulting in a severe downturn in the overall economy.

HEALTHY NEVER TASTED SO GOOD

Israeli youth mentoring group seeks Canadian support

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Yedidim might be little known outside of Israel, but Yvonne Margo hopes to change that.

Margo, a longtime staffer at the Israel Aliyah Centre here, said Montreal is in the preliminary stages of establishing a Canadian friends of Yedidim branch. Yedidim is an award-winning, non-profit organization in Israel that, among other things, provides peer mentorship programs for immigrant and marginalized children, youths and young adults in need of one-on-one support in the effort to deal with some of the social problems they face in the poorer areas where they live.

The peer mentors, all volunteers, are trained and supervised by Yedidim professionals to serve as essential role models and friends for those at risk.

Created in 1991, Yedidim, which means "friends," has won several prizes, including the President's Award for Excellence and Jerusalem's Distinguished Service Award. The Yedidim website states that 6,000 individuals in 46 Israeli communities currently benefit from Yedidim programs, with the help of 2,000 volunteers and 120 professionally trained co-ordinators.

"There are other programs in Israel for immigrant children at risk, but Yedidim allows them to stay at home with their families, which is very important," Margo said. "They can live at home despite whatever problems [there are]."

Margo, who is 58, describes Yedidim as one of Israel's "best-kept secrets," known and greatly valued in Israel but in need of public awareness elsewhere.

Although there is an American Friends of Yedidim support group based in California and chaired by Jewish entertainer Mike Burstyn, there is nothing similar based in Canada or any other country.

Margo has been to Israel several times, including last January, in connection with her own personal involvement in Yedidim, where her focus has been on helping immigrant Ethiopian teens complete their high school matriculation – bagrut, in Hebrew – as a step toward developing into well-adjusted and integrated members of Israeli society.

"Completing school means everything," Margo said.

She has close and endearing ties to Montreal's Ethiopian-Jewish community dating back to the late 1980s and early 1990s, when she performed yeoman's work in reuniting local Ethiopian young people with family members in Israel.

It was that connection that prompted Margo, along with Ruth Saragosti, a former Montrealer who worked in the Jewish community and then at Yedidim in Israel, to co-design a tutorial program in 2004, called Sayeret, specifically geared to allowing high-school-aged Ethiopian boys at risk of dropping out to use mentor tutors to complete their education.

Margo said that accomplishment remains key to young immigrant integration and responsible citizenship. Without it, she said, the road often leads to alcohol and drug abuse, crime and violence.

Sayeret began and continues in Be'er Sheva, which for years has been twinned with the Montreal Jewish community through FEDERATION CJA. Initially, Sayeret received support from the federation's Israel overseas program, Margo said.

Children seized after swastika drawn on girl, 7

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — A two-year old boy and a seven-year-old girl have been removed from their home by Winnipeg Child and Family Services (CFS) after the girl went to school with a swastika and other white supremacist markings on her body.

CFS is seeking permanent guardianship of the children because of the fear that their father, an alleged neo-Nazi, has been brainwashing them with his beliefs, endangering their well-being, and that the mother has gone along with this. The man is the boy's father and girl's stepfather.

"The children may be at risk due to the parents' behaviour and associates. The parents might endanger the emotional well-being of the children," CFS said in a court affidavit.

"There are also concerns about parental drug and alcohol use in the home," the agency wrote.

Winnipeg Police spokesperson Const. Pat Chabidon said police became involved after school officials were alarmed to see the little girl with markings on her body reportedly made with permanent marker.

Chabidon added that the father "was a subject of interest in a hate crime-type investigation in 2005," but no charges were laid.

The children's mother, who by law can't be identified, has received advice and support from Paul Fromm, a disgraced former teacher in Ontario who was fired from his job in Peel Region in 1997 for links to neo-Nazi groups.

Fromm told The CJN he met the parents in Winnipeg last December at a group meeting focusing on Fromm's involvement in court cases in Alberta and B.C. about hate speech.

According to Fromm, "The children were kidnapped at the end of March [by the CFS] and it took almost three months before the first court hearing [this month]... I understand that the children are living at a relative's home and the mother is able to visit. I don't know if the father can visit... I advised the mother to get a lawyer."

Mother calls herself a 'white nationalist'

Fromm added: "I can see a school not wanting a child to be a political billboard. But that shouldn't be enough of a reason to take the kids away... There are many people who have views that other people think are crazy. A lot of people think Christianity or Islam is odd... But you shouldn't fear that you are going to lose your children because your beliefs are different than the mainstream."

Fromm added that this was not a case involving allegations of physical or sexual abuse. "The state should take away kids in only the most serious of cases. If the father made these markings on the little girl, it was unwise, but to say that the price of this lack of wisdom is to lose your child is horrible."

A CFS spokesperson said that a parent's beliefs may be harmful to a child when the belief includes taking actions that result in endangerment or abuse. The definition of abuse under the CFS Act includes acts or omissions that result in "emotional disability of a permanent nature in the child or [are] likely to result in such a disability."

The case, which is being heard in child protection court, has been adjourned to June 23 to give the children's mother time to retain her own lawyer, rather than be represented by the same counsel as her husband, court documents said.

She told The CJN that she is working out a deal with CFS to get the children back, and she's trying to get legal counsel.

She also said she kicked her husband out of the family home three days after seeing court documents outlining the Crown's case.

The mother said that she is "a white nationalist... but not a neo-Nazi skinhead."

She wears a necklace with a small etching of a swastika, but she told The CJN that for her, the symbol doesn't represent Nazism. "For me it represents my heritage and my belief and everything that is good about man."

She also identified her spiritual belief as "Odinism," which followers describe as a pagan religion that celebrates Norse and German mythology. Critics say Odinism is followed by some members of white supremacist groups, which use it to justify claims to power.

The mother said her husband is "a flamboyant bigot." He told the Winnipeg Free Press that "I have dedicated my entire life to being a skinhead."

The Free Press also reported that CFS is prepared to return the children to their mother and drop its bid for permanent custody in a deal that would involve sending the children home on weekends.

A CFS spokesperson wouldn't comment on the existence or non-existence of a deal.

Negev Dinner honours Hamilton's Shalom Village

By HOLLY GINSLER
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — Hamilton's Negev dinner this year honoured Shalom Village, a non-profit organization that provides services for older adults.

The Jewish National Fund annually honours those who have made a difference in their community while it raises funds for worthy projects locally and in Israel. Although the honorees are most often individuals, Shalom Village is a worthy recipient of this recognition for the difference it makes in people's lives.

Pat Morden, CEO of Shalom Village

The event, which took place at the Hamilton Convention Centre June 15, was hosted by comic actor and director Eugene Levy, a longtime friend and supporter of Shalom Village, and Rick Mercer, host of The Rick Mercer Report on CBC television.

Funds raised went to the expansion and improvement of a senior citizens park promenade in Kiryat Eliezer, a neighbourhood of Haifa. The existing promenade is popular but inadequate for the local seniors and will be upgraded, landscaped and equipped with park benches and picnic tables.

The funds will also go to the Shalom Village Possibilities Fund, to provide the resources and staff to help people get on with their lives when they move to the residence.

Shalom Village was created by people who really wanted to be sure that as their mothers and fathers aged, they could still be actively part of the community and get the support they needed to get on with their lives, chief executive officer, Pat Morden, said.

"We do everything we can to bring the community here and for us to go to the community," she said. "Our mission is also to help people feel at home here."

Shalom Village is an upbeat, busy home to more than 200 people and a home away from home to many more. Its services include 124 long-term care suites and 81 assisted living apartments; Goldie's Place, a day program for people with cognitive and physical impairments; and a health club, a well-equipped fitness centre for people over 70.

"Our health club is great for people who don't want to be in the day program but want to have a connection to Shalom Village," Morden said. "They come, work out and stay for lunch at Bubbi Bessie's Café."

In addition, the organization's convalescent care includes the Shalom2Home, which helps prepare people to return home after a stay in the hospital.

Shalom Village is affiliated with the McMaster University faculty of health sciences, and Morden said it is seen as a top provider of long-term care services in Hamilton. Its services also include palliative care, a movie theatre, a corner store, a hair salon and a woodshop where many residents have learned new skills and created beautiful objects.

It also reaches out in other ways. "We have the only kosher fine dining in Hamilton because we want people to see Shalom Village as a place they can come as part of the community," Morden said. "Our mission is to help people feel at home here, and for Shalom Village to be a part of the larger community."

Shalom Village asked Jewish groups in Hamilton if they would sponsor services in its synagogue. Once a month, with the help of volunteers, they set up for a Saturday kiddush. The sponsors help bring the residents and their families to the services, which are always packed. Children who are preparing for a bar or bat mitzvah have a chance to practise, and many get the opportunity to participate in services with their grandparents.

The 280 staff members at Shalom Village come from different backgrounds – only three are Jewish – but they are aware that they work in a Jewish organization.

"Each week we start our management meeting with a parshah," Morden said. "One person is responsible for discussing that week's parshah and its implications for their leadership."

The staff can consult with the organization's Rabbi Aaron Selevan to help prepare their parshah.

There is also a pastoral care committee for Christian residents, and church services run by a group of volunteers. Rabbi Selevan co-ordinates these services because he is in charge of all spiritual activities.

Shalom Village's health club

"When our Christian residents are sick and dying, or even if a resident just needs to talk, they often look to Rabbi Selevan for spiritual guidance," Morden said.

For the Possibilities Fund that benefits from this year's Negev dinner, there are wheelbarrows sprinkled throughout the courtyards and balconies of Shalom Village, filled with flowers planted by the residents. The centre thus brings the garden to the residents when they can't go to the garden, as a symbol of the possibilities that can be realized.

RIDING FOR A CAUSE: Some 200 members and friends of Yidden on Wheels (YOW), the Toronto chapter of the international Jewish Motorcycle Alliance, gathered at Earl Bales Park last Thursday for their 2008 Pebble Ride. The riders then headed to Trenton, Ont., in support of the Goodwin Learning Centre's Holocaust studies program. The private school aims to collect six million pebbles to honour the Jewish victims of the Holocaust. Each rider brought along 100 pebbles to contribute to the project and helped raise more than $25,000 for the cause, YOW spokesperson, Sid Rochberg, said. [Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf photo]

UK to host conference on anti-Semitism

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Lawmakers from around the world will gather in London, England, next February to discuss the global growth of anti-Semitism.

The gathering, which is expected to serve as a "precursor" to the Durban II review conference, will be hosted by the Inter-Parliamentary Coalition for Combating Antisemitism (ICCA) and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office of the United Kingdom, the country's foreign affairs ministry.

Liberal MP Irwin Cotler, co-founder of the ICCA, said the London conference will give parliamentarians the opportunity to consider several overarching themes connected to the modern rise of anti-Semitism. Among them are the emergence of "state-sanctioned genocide" advocated by Iran, the singling out of Israel for condemnation at the United Nations and the call for a boycott of Israeli products and people.

Cotler said 10 or more task forces will be set up to investigate these and other issues and report to the conference.

The reports will serve as a jumping-off point for parliamentarians' discussions, he said. The result will be sharing of knowledge, experiences, best practices and recommendations in ways to counter the anti-Semitic resurgence.

"This initiative's raison d'etre is the evolving, escalating, sophisticated and even virulent anti-Semitism, that's almost without parallel since the end of the Second World War," Cotler said. "That inspired the coalition to combat this radical evil. Silence is not an option."

Cotler, who has served as Canada's justice minister and attorney general, said anti-Semitism has evolved over the years. "The new anti-Semitism is singling out Israel and the Jewish people for discriminatory treatment in the international arena."

We are seeing "the emergence of Israel as the collective Jew among the nations," he said.

The genocidal manifestations of the new anti-Semitism are apparent in the anti-Semitic terror of groups such as Hamas, Iran's threats of genocide, fatwas issued by Islamic radicals aimed at Jews and the tarnishing of Israel with Nazi-era imagery, he added.

"Parliamentarians have a unique role and responsibility in combating this hatred, and the United Kingdom is to be congratulated on this historic initiative," Cotler stated.

British Labour MP John Mann, chair of his country's All-Party Parliamentary Group against Antisemitism and co-founder of the ICCA, said: "I am confident that this event will mark a new era of parliamentarians taking the lead in the fight against anti-Semitism."

Britain's minister for Europe, Jim Murphy, said in a statement that the conference "is a chance to discuss our work in fighting anti-Semitism with an international audience. The conference will involve parliamentarians from around the world. Parliamentarians have a unique role to play in persuading their governments to address anti-Semitism.

"The conference will be an opportunity not only to share our experience with international partners and learn from others, but also to add political impetus to the ongoing fight against anti-Semitism."

Leading members of the ICCA include German parliamentarian Gert Weisskirchen, U.S. Congressman Chris Smith and Israeli MK Isaac Herzog.

WALKING FOR A CURE:

Noah Ross, 11, left, and Jamie Ross, eight, joined their parents, Suzanne and Larry, and 4,000 other participants at the Telus Walk to Cure Diabetes, June 8 on the CNE grounds. The event raised more than $800,000 for the Juvenile Diabetes Research Foundation. The Rosses were one of the Top 5 fundraising families in Canada, collecting more than $32,000.

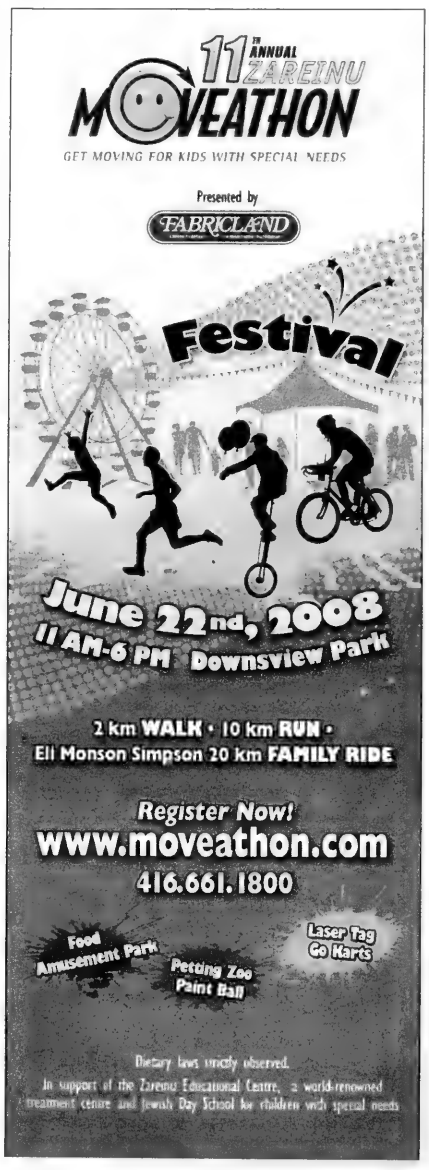
Court orders earlier trial in life support case

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The trial in the case of an elderly Orthodox Jewish man whom doctors have wanted to remove from life support since last fall is being moved forward at the request of the hospital where he is being treated.



Chief Justice Marc Monnin of the Court of Queen's Bench has granted a motion by Grace Hospital to move the trial in the case of Sam Golubchuk, 84, ahead to Sept. 15 from Nov. 24 – which would have been almost one year after his family initially obtained an injunction against removing Golubchuk from life support.

The hospital had asked the court for an earlier trial because one of its intensive care specialists, Dr. Anand Kumar, quit rather than continue to treat Golubchuk.

The hospital must treat him in accordance with a second court order issued last February that prevents doctors from removing his life support against his family's wishes and religious beliefs. His family is seeking a permanent injunction to keep him on life support.

In an affidavit, Kumar said he withdrew his services because it is "in violation of my medical ethics to continue [treating Golubchuk]." He also said he believes that the "services administered in accordance with the order are not of any medical benefit" and that "continued support of the patient is tantamount to torture."

Dr. Elizabeth Cowden, the hospital's chief medical officer, said in an affidavit that if other physicians withdraw services as Kumar has done, the facility's intensive care unit "may be forced to close."

Earlier this month, the hospital's lawyers said in court that Golubchuk is "barely above a vegetative state," and that nurses are also experiencing a great deal of stress in providing care that they believe is harmful to a patient's dignity.

In granting the hospital's motion for an earlier trial date, Monnin said that Golubchuk's "prognosis is not good… The medical evidence is strong that it is highly unlikely that he will ever be able to leave the ICU."

The lawyer for Golubchuk's family, Neil Kravetsky, has argued before Monnin that he is a sole practitioner who has another trial scheduled in September that would conflict with setting an earlier trial date in this case. Additionally, Kravetsky argued that although Kumar has quit, five intensive care specialists at the hospital are still prepared to treat Golubchuk. He also said that the complex case will involve bringing in out-of-town medical experts, and that he can't properly prepare for a trial on the earlier date.

In ordering that the trial date be moved, Monnin said that the "obvious solution to me would be for plaintiff's counsel [Kravetsky] to have the other trial [that he has scheduled in September] adjourned to the November dates which were previously set for this trial. Of course, this could only be done after obtaining the approval of his client and co-operation from opposing counsel or motions to adjourn if necessary. The court would be ready to assist in making those arrangements if counsel wish to do so."

Monnin ordered that the trial take place from Sept. 15 to Oct. 10, noting that the court would not "sit on those days which are viewed as religious holidays." The judge said the trial ought to be expedited "in the interests of justice."

Kravetsky said that Monnin's decision "is a terrible one. The family is an Orthodox Jewish family, and all of the witnesses we will be calling are Orthodox Jews. The medical evidence we will adduce is going to come from doctors who are out of town. It is going to be difficult for me to get Orthodox Jewish doctors to travel to Winnipeg, when it is around the time of Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur."

Kravetsky said he may appeal the ruling.

Vancouver group promotes Jewish leadership

By LAUREN KRAMER
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — In mid-June, a group of 120 Jews congregated in Jerusalem for the third annual Return on Investment Summit. Among them were 80 Jewish entrepreneurs from Israel, Canada, the United States and 40 young Jewish entrepreneurs from other parts of the world.

They were selected by the Center for Leadership Initiatives (CLI), a Vancouver-based foundation founded in 2006 through the initial support of U.S. philanthropist Lynn Schusterman. It describes itself as being dedicated to developing Jewish leaders and promoting managerial excellence in the Jewish community.

Among others, CLI has partnered with such organizations as the Forest Foundation, the Foundation for Jewish Camping, and Birthright Israel.

"We don't see the next generation as disappointing," said CLI director Yoni Gordis. "We see a huge wave of identification and celebration happening."

The people selected for the summit, aged 22 to 34, are all involved in some kind of innovative Jewish initiative, such as volunteer programs, websites, multimedia, education or environmentalism. The summit brings them together so they can network and share information about each other's projects. But there's also an instructional component.

"They go through organizational and technological skills training," Gordis said. "We teach them how to build business plans so they can get better traction out there in the world. These young people are desperate to know each other and to collaborate. Our job is to help them meet, improve their skills so their individual projects will be more effective, and where possible, get them to collaborate."

This year, Daniel Roth, a Jewish educator and non-profit director, and Daniel Rattner, 25, a filmmaker, are the sole Canadians taking part in the Return on Investment Summit (ROI).

Rattner, a Halifax native and graduate student at York University's Schulich School of Business, just finished working on a television show that aired last month for Israel's 60th birthday. Titled Ralph Benmergui: My Israel, the five-part series explored the present, past and future of Israel. Rattner is now working on a documentary called Revival, about the Hebrew language.

"I participated in last year's ROI summit and because it was such a positive experience, when I was invited back this year I was eager to go," he said. "It's a great experience because it brings people together from different parts of the world and gives them a chance to network and share ideas on the different projects they're working on. There's a strong Jewish connection, and I continue to stay in touch and collaborate with some of the people I met last year."

Julie Schneiderman, a 32-year-old Vancouverite, attended the first ROI summit in 2006. She was nominated for her work at the Canadian HIV Trials Network.

"There were people there from every corner of the world and they were very excited about finding projects and ways to connect," she recalled.

While she did not have a specific project in mind when she attended the conference, she left with the germ of an idea that she has continued in Canada. It involved bringing Israeli AIDS researchers to Vancouver in October 2007, and travelling to Ethiopia two months later with the same team to discuss the possibility of a partnership among Israel, Canada and Ethiopia.

"Adult male circumcision is one of the issues we want to look at, because research has found that circumcision in males can significantly reduce their chances of getting HIV, and there's an interesting link with it being a Jewish tradition," she said.

Today, Schneiderman is working toward a second Ethiopian visit in late 2008 to plan a strategy, do a needs assessment and get work underway.

"The biggest value of the Return on Investment Summit was being able to sit down face to face with people, build a relationship and create something," she said. "I saw so many young Jewish people at that summit interested in international work, human and social development issues, economic issues, and a real commitment to social justice. It's exciting to be with a group of young people who really want to see change."

Yedidim seeks support

but Yedidim has since taken it over and the program was subsequently expanded to include Sela, a similar program for Ethiopian girls at risk.

During Margo's last trip to Israel in January, discussions focused on how to increase financial support and raise the group's profile in other countries.

"We have to start to do something," Margo said. Few realize, she added, that Yedidim projects can get underway for as little as $20,000 or $30,000, but "it can make a huge difference."

The secret of the Yedidim program, one if its documents says, "lies in the peer-to-peer encounter model, which provides us with the unique ability to act as a safety net, essentially catching these youths before they reach the 'point of no return.'

"At the present time, potential program participants far outnumber our ability to include them in our programs."

Yedidim can be reached through its website, www.yedidim-israel.org, or locally by e-mailing Margo at ymargo@sympatico.ca.

McGill student sparkles as an entrepreneur

By AMY SOBERANO
Special to The CJN

"Everything is doable, people just don't do it," says 20-year-old entrepreneur Daniel Shiner.

"The secret is that everything is easy – not easy in the sense that it doesn't take work but easy in the sense that the steps can be learned and the task can be accomplished."

With this simple motto to guide him, Shiner has skilfully navigated the labyrinth of the business world.

"It's definitely not about the money," he says of his passion for business. "Around Grade 9 or 10, I was starting to get bored of doing the same things every weekend. Simply, business looked fun."

Currently a management student at McGill University, Shiner is the founder and president of SoulShine Digital, a digital media consulting and development agency specializing in web and logo design.

Since its establishment in 2004, the company has experienced burgeoning success. In recognition of his accomplishments, Shiner was named the provincial entrepreneur of the year in the Advancing Canadian Entrepreneurship's Student Entrepreneur Competition.

As a young high school student at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, Shiner scoured the city for job opportunities, but he found nothing that appealed to him.

"I already wanted to be the manager. I was 16, and I looked like I was 13. The only jobs I could get were flipping burgers and bussing tables," he says.

Finally, at the beginning of his Grade 11 year, Shiner's aunt contacted him on behalf of an associate in search of a web designer. It was then that Shiner realized that the computer field could provide him with the opportunity he had been searching for.

"I told her that I was familiar with web design. I really had no clue about it," Shiner confesses. "But I did see an opportunity. Adults don't trust kids with anything but computers. They believe in whiz kids."

Shiner agreed to meet with the person who became SoulShine Digital's first client and immersed himself in learning the tools required to complete the project – which he pulled off without a hitch.

"At 16, this guy probably wouldn't have hired me to work at his cash register, but he was willing to give me the enormous responsibility of designing and managing a website," Shiner says.

"I was careful not to be irresponsible. His business was depending on me, so if I really thought I couldn't have done it, I wouldn't have taken it on, but I knew I had the skills to be able to learn whatever I needed to learn."

He identifies the experience as a pivotal one in his rapidly progressing business career.

"That first jump gave me confidence in my own competence," he says. "Every challenge I take on requires pressure, but it taught me that I actually enjoy that pressure. The client ended up with a great product and I learned a lot."

Shiner spent the rest of his time in high school developing SoulShine Digital, establishing contacts and testing the waters of the business world. He augmented his personal endeavours with his role as the co-president of the TannenbaumCHAT business club, a student group that undertakes business ventures and directs all profits to charity.

"One of the first things I learned was the power of asking someone a question," Shiner says. "People are such great assets, and we don't realize how many teachers we have out there."

In light of Shiner's initial success with little formal education, he was somewhat skeptical of its importance. Although he is naturally gifted with business skills, Shiner came to realize the value of education.

"While I don't think anyone can teach you how to be an entrepreneur, they can teach you how to structure your ideas and to make sure you're doing things responsibly, which is critical," he said.

Addowall.com, an online interactive wall for an artist community, is his most recent project.

"Any artist can get a piece of the wall, called an addo, to put up any type of art they wish. The position of every artist's square is based on its popularity. Every person that comes to the wall has a voice," Shiner says.

Along with his partner Raphael Law, a graduate of McGill Computer Science, Shiner has invested nearly two years into the development of Addowall. Addowall is unique in that the best art rises to the top of the wall, while the worst falls to the bottom, according to artists' votes.

"Artist communities are out there because artists are excited about the potential to connect all over the world. The problem is that it's so hard to sift through the art to find the good stuff," Shiner says.

The idea for Addowall was born in the wake of initial failure. After realizing the flaws of a previous concept, Shiner parked himself at a library desk, determined not to return home until he thought of something better. After hours of contemplation, he went to the bathroom and noted how much graffiti was scattered across the stall and, moreover, across the city.

"People have a need to express themselves, to be remembered and to be heard," Shiner thought. "What if there was a wall the entire world could write on? It's a magical concept and the computer makes it possible."

Addowall is a direct manifestation of Shiner's desire to create something that appeals to people's needs and to truly enjoy himself while doing it.

"Will it make me a millionaire? I doubt it. But I knew that all along," he says. "I'll just be happy to see people from all over the world connect to one another using something that I helped create."

Although he's certain he'll pursue a career in business after graduation, he won't speculate on what form that it will take.

"What I love the most is to create, to create a project, a product or an idea that could actually change the way people live," Shiner says.

"Create something – I realize that sounds a little vague – but it's what I've got to do. Have any ideas?"

Dan Shiner, a student and business man, has been driven to suceed since his early teens.

JF&C LOUNGE AND RESOURCE CENTRE CELEBRATED: Miles Nadal and Kelly Grier were honoured recently for their generous support of the Jerome D. Diamond Adolescent Centre, a program of Jewish Family & Child. Through the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, the couple funded the recent renovation of the facility's beautiful student lounge and resource centre. Students and staff at the day treatment and school program for youths with emotional and/or behavioural problems attended the celebration.

CANADIANS AND ISRAELIS CREATE STATE OF THE ART HIGH SCHOOL: Netanya's educational system was given a boost in early June at the groundbreaking ceremony for the expansion of ORT Netanya's high school. The expanded campus will include an ecological bubble for environmental studies, new classrooms, laboratories, sports hall and a new, state-of-the-art library and convention centre, named in honor of Bluma Appel. The Netanya municipality is contributing a new, multifunctional sports hall with matching funding from Mifal Hapayis, Israel's national lottery. Attending the event were Minister for Social Affairs and Services Isaac Herzog; Canadian Ambassador John Allen; a delegation of the ORT Canada leadership headed by ORT Canada president Arthur Silber; Netanya Mayor Miriam Fierberg-Ikar and hundreds of guests. From left: Allen; Zvi Peleg, ORT Israel director general; Silber; Dr. Uzi Tsuk, chair of ORT Israel; and Bracha Rager, president of ORT Israel.

University grad writes about life after high school

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Inspired by the major changes he experienced when he ventured into post-secondary education seven years ago, Robert Shapiro, 25, decided to write a novel that would tackle some of the issues facing students today, and perhaps ease the transition from high school to university.

Shapiro, a Thornhill-native who began his academic career in 2001 at Fanshawe College in London, Ont., before moving on to York University, where he obtained a degree in history, most recently graduated from Seneca College's corporate communications graduate program. He has spent enough time on college and university campuses to understand the culture.

In his first year of college at Fanshawe, Shapiro said he began to notice that the friends he grew up with were changing, sometimes, for the worse.

"There were people I went to elementary school and high school with. Just a couple months into being away at college, [they became] completely different people. You go to their house and there are drugs laid out, they're not going to classes, and these are people you grew up playing street hockey with," Shapiro said.

"Reading all the campus newspapers, every story was about how this person was date raped out of this frat house and this protest was happening on campus and it was such a weird culture that was going on that it was just begging for a story."

He added that making the transition from high school to university is a big adjustment, and anyone who says they weren't affected by it is in denial.

"Everyone around you changes and you grow into being just a number and you go through all these things. I was noticing all this happening around me and so I started jotting some notes on a Post-it and from there I started flushing out a story."

Having written a novel is a feat in itself, but having done so while a full-time student is even more impressive.

"The process was really gruelling. There were enough times when I wanted to throw my computer out of the window… I was writing this book at all hours of the night. I'd go to school all day, go to a job all night, and then sit and write until the sun came up."

About five years later, in 2006, Shapiro had finished writing his novel, Five Past Twelve, which he self-published through AuthorHouse in April.

The novel is about Jack Geary, a student at a Boston college who has just entered his sophomore year. Feeling disengaged from his peers, growing tired of the college experience in general, and after witnessing the rape of a friend, Jack turns to drugs and quickly loses control.

Despite alienating himself from his peers, Jack develops two important relationships – one, a love affair with a female student, and another, a friendship with the campus priest who challenges Jack to face his demons.

Shapiro said that although the novel is not autobiographical, he did draw from his emotions and from the experiences of those around him.

"All the thoughts and feelings, to an extent, are mine. Some of them are exaggerated to convey a point, but a lot of the actual experiences – you know, I never succumbed to a drug addiction, but some people did, and it is people you never thought would," he said.

"Why I didn't succumb to it, I have no idea."

He said that one of the messages in his book is that he feels the post-secondary system is flawed.

"You just become this cog in the machine and I think everyone goes through the process of trying to find your identity because no matter what you built yourself to be in high school, you're going to be reconstructed or rebuilt when you enter college," Shapiro said.

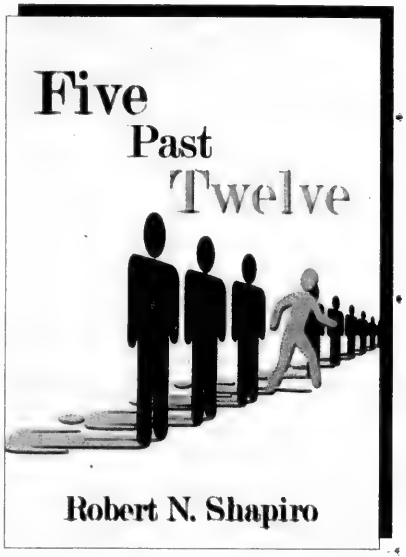
"I don't think university fosters creativity. In a lot of ways, it kind of drains it. You have to work in a very strict system, with a lot of strict guidelines and bureaucracy. It just became this huge bureaucratic machine, where even education is put on the back burner."

In the novel, during a conversation Jack has with the priest, he expresses his frustration with the post-secondary education system.

"Peace and order, order and peace. That's what makes the world go round. If someone breaks the harmony, they are a menace to society. These menaces can be writers, painters, sculptors, teachers, or anyone who ever looked around and didn't see some man-made utopia. Why do we have to fall in line? Can't we see the world for what it is, without being a cynic?"

Through the novel, Shapiro also portrayed university as a place where students resemble sheep that are part of a herd.

"The students marched as if traveling through an invisible burning tunnel. They were battle scarred, weary, and ultimately drained. Girl followed boy who trailed a succession of other boys and girls. It was monotonous and never-ending, yet no one would succumb to the tiresome routine. From dorm room to coffee shop to class and so on and so forth."



Raised by his mother, a single mom who made a point of fostering Jewish values in their family, Shapiro said that there is no doubt that aspects of his Jewish background made it into his writing.

"I definitely think it played a part when I was writing this in the values that come through in the character, whether he is Jewish or not," Shapiro said.

Food producers in China increasingly seek kosher certification

By PHYLLIS KOEGEL

"Do you want to go to China?" That's what my colleague at OU Kosher asked me two months before an important ingredients show in which the Orthodox Union participates annually.

China, well, how could I say no! Having travelled there last summer for vacation, I knew from experience just how long and tiring a trip it was, but I was on an organized tour then and everything was taken care of for us as a group. This would be different. I would be travelling by myself and meeting my colleagues who handle the Southeast Asia region for OU Kosher in Shanghai.

The OU's China and Far East team of Rabbi Mordechai Grunberg, Rabbi Donneal Epstein and Zhu Yanan handle the OU's rapid growth in China. China, now the second-largest exporter in the world, is becoming the fastest growing supplier of food ingredients to international food corporations. It has been estimated that close to $1.25 billion of kosher certified ingredients are exported annually worldwide. Enter the OU, the world's largest respected kosher certification agency, now certifying more than 300 plants in China. As the export industry grows in China, OU Kosher certifications are growing along with it.

I left New York on a Sunday morning and arrived at my hotel in Shanghai, a very long 24 hours later. The time zone change is exactly 12 hours ahead in China, so as you can well imagine, I was quite disoriented and sleep deprived. I travelled via Korean Airlines, which was simply a wonderful experience, and I connected in Seoul for a two-hour flight to Shanghai. I dozed off at the gate in Seoul, only to awaken abruptly and realize most of the passengers had already boarded, and I almost missed my connecting flight.

The hospitality of the Asian people is beyond measure, and the flight attendants were especially sensitive to my kosher dietary needs. Kosher travellers are accustomed to packing our own food just in case the meals served are not edible, or as has sometimes happened, not available. My meals were delicious, and the head flight attendant kept checking on me to make sure I was satisfied with the food. I was lucky that the seat next to me was empty, and I was able to stretch out a bit.

Fast forward 24 hours, and I am in a taxi racing through the streets of Shanghai. It is 10 p.m. and the skyline is magnificent, but the drivers seem to think of themselves as participants in the Indy 500. My taxi driver makes a left turn from the right lane of a four-lane highway as I hold on for dear life.

Somehow I arrive safely at my hotel, where my colleague, Zhu Yanan, the OU's man in China, greets me and helps me check in. He offers to have someone drive me around the next day so that I can sightsee, as the show we will be attending does not begin for another day. The Chinese people are very courteous and proper, with an obvious curiosity about westerners. As China becomes more westernized, the people embrace anything and everything American. College students are eager to practise English, which they study in university.

Show time in Shanghai: the Food Ingredients China Show opens on Wednesday morning and we meet many manufacturers who are eager to obtain OU Kosher certification for their products, as their customers are demanding kosher certification for export to the United States and Israel. The days pass quickly with the exhibition attracting well over 10,000 visitors from all over the world.

What are my visitation rights?

Family Matters

by

John Syrtash

B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Counsel
Garfin Zeidenberg LLP
Family Lawyer & Mediator for 26 years

Question. My ex common-law wife lives in Vancouver. I pay her proper support every month. But I rarely see my kids, except when it's convenient for her to have me split the airfare to fly the kids in to Toronto to see them when she feels like visiting her relatives and taking in a show. This has been going on for years. I miss my kids. What are my rights because I'm tired of being shoved around.

Answer. You have the right to continue to be a schlemiel and be abused. Or, you can bring an application in a British Columbia Family Court for regularly scheduled rights of access. Have your lawyer offer to settle in writing so that she may have to pay all your costs if you win. The longer you wait, the harder it gets.

Question. I've been married to my husband for a long time. Several years ago I found out he had an affair with a younger woman and we separated for a while. Both of our families urged us to reconcile, which we did for the sake of our three children, all under the age of 15. But after many years I found out he was seeing that woman again. I want a divorce. If he's making $120,000 gross yearly, how much in support can I receive?

Answer. Under the Federal Child Support Guidelines, if you become the primary parent then your husband would be obliged to pay you $1,881 (non-taxable) for three children if you lived in Ontario. In addition, depending on how much you earn for work outside the home, if any, he would have to pay his proportionate share of the costs of certain extras, such as orthodontics, any other non-OHIP dental or other uninsured medical expenses, daycare/nanny expenses, private school, summer camp, post-secondary and possibly extra-curricular expenses.

Measure what you earn against what he earns, and comparing your gross incomes, he pays his percentage of the expenses. If you are entirely a homemaker then he pays all of the expenses. Without knowing your income I cannot comment on how much, if any, spousal support you would receive. There is not as yet any new law for "Spousal Support Guidelines," only recommendations for such guidelines that have been circulated among many lawyers and Judges. However, at the income level you referenced, a primary parent with three children who is not working would receive 55 to 59 percent of her husband's income for child and spousal support.

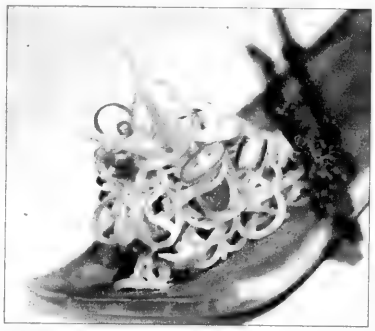
The OU's reputation as the most influential kosher certification symbol in the world is reinforced as visitors from all over the globe stop at our booth to discuss their kosher needs. This reflects the media coverage the OU has recently received nationwide in publications including USA Today, the Los Angeles Times, the Washington Post, Financial Times, Newsday, the Miami Herald and Business Week, all positioning the OU as the leader in its category.

Many Chinese ingredient manufacturers request OU Kosher certification applications, and our Chinese representative, Zhu, will oversee their completion by companies eager to have their products become OU certified.

As the new business development and marketing associate, I have an opportunity to network with many ingredient brokers and importers who require their ingredient sources to be OU certified. Many emphasize their company's requirements that all ingredients meet certain specifications, including kosher certification.



Their certification of choice is OU, as one food ingredients manager told me, "We insist on OU certification because of its universal acceptance and undisputed global kosher standard."

OU Kosher has more than doubled its China kosher certification growth in the last two years. The OU expects to grow its China certification business quickly over the next five years. Its seal-of-approval can assure Chinese manufacturers that the millions of consumers who buy kosher and trust the supervision behind the OU symbol welcome their products.

The ingredient and food production markets today constitute 90 per cent of the marketplace in China, with the remaining 10 per cent being "finished products" such as candy, frozen and canned fish and baked goods. This 10 per cent includes consumer retail packages and industrial food service items. The OU forecasts a gradual reversal of these percentages beginning in 2008 – at the minimum rate of 10 per cent a year – until "finished goods" comprise the 90 per cent.

It's a matter of record that multinational companies with the OU kosher seal of approval have created a surefire way to gain increased market share for a relatively modest investment.

As I travel the world attending a multitude of domestic and international food and ingredient trade shows, I have the privilege of branding the OU as the leader in the kosher certification industry while maintaining no compromise in the highest standards of certification. I do my best to "demystify" the certification process in a way that makes it easy for a corporation to do business with us. We strive to make certification an easy, open and transparent process, with top quality customer service as one of our most important assets.

As the show ends on Friday afternoon, we have to stay in Shanghai for Shabbat. We change hotels to be closer to the Shanghai Chabad and I look forward to experiencing the day of rest in the beautiful city of Shanghai.

We light candles at the shul and I marvel at the 150 Jewish guests from all over the world who gather together to usher in the Shabbat. Davening is beautiful and everyone is smiling and mingling – Israelis, Americans, South Americans, Canadians and Chinese Jews – united by Yiddishkeit as the common bond.

Dinner is delicious, the rabbi and rebbetzin warm and welcoming, and the people fascinating. I marvel at people I meet who have chosen to live in China for personal as well as professional reasons. They cherish the Chabad, as it welcomes everyone who enters its doors as a safe Jewish haven and home away from home. We get to know one another, and I even make a few new friends with whom I promise to stay in touch after my return home. I truly am sorry when Shabbat ends.

I arrive home Sunday night, exactly one week since my journey began, happily exhausted and disoriented again, but this time laden with mementos and wonderful memories. But the part I will remember most is the spiritual and magical Shabbat in Shanghai, a period of delightful rest and renewal following a work week in which I travelled thousands of miles through a dozen time zones to bring the message of kashrut to the growing commercial colossus that is China.

Phyllis Koegel is the Orthodox Union's new business development and marketing associate.

Mazel Tov!

Grandmother, 90, does it her own way

By IRENA KARSHENBAUM
Special to The CJN

CALGARY — Riva Wolf seems to instinctively know the secrets of staying young and was eager to share them with me.

She is 90, turning 91 this September, and walks, talks and dresses like a person at least 30 years younger. She bargains with God a lot, asking him to let her live to her one grandson's bar mitzvah, then another grandson's bar mitzvah. She bargains for her children's health, and God seems to give Wolf what she's asking for. It helps that she's got a positive attitude and a lust for life that keeps her grateful every evening for the day that's passed and excited each morning for the day ahead.

She never drank after one unpleasant experience with alcohol but smoked for 15 years. She didn't know that smoking cigarettes can cause lung cancer until her children, armed with that fairly recent knowledge, insisted she quit.

Her youthfulness may have genetic origins. Her father ran the Pleasant Confectionary store in Calgary's inner city until he was 83. After retirement, he refused to hang out with "old" people. He died when he was 92. Wolf's mother, however, suffered from poor health her whole life, never fully recovering from the accidental drowning of her first child. She died at 59.

What is certain is that Wolf is unconventional and has lived her life the way she's wanted to.

"I wasn't a very nice girl that way," she says, recalling her single days. "I played the field. I was one of a kind. Very few Jewish girls would have done what I did."

Certainly few would have had the chutzpah to take a job reading tea leaves at age 17, just out of high school. "I convinced the woman to hire me, telling her I had ESP and then told all my friends' mothers to come see me while I was on my probationary period," Wolf says. "They all paid a quarter and told the owner what a great job I did. I stayed in that job almost two years."

Treating life as an adventure, she moved to Vancouver on her own. She found a job as a Russian translator, although she didn't speak the language. Wolf figured that "the people who are looking for a Russian translator probably don't speak any Russian, so they'd have no way of knowing I don't speak Russian." She bought a Russian language book and learned enough words and phrases to get by in her job, where she'd stayed more than a year.

Eventually, marriage caught up with her, but not until there was a broken heart – her fiancé's – and a returned engagement ring. She married Fred Wolf in 1944, a marriage that lasted 60 years, until he died five years ago.The couple had three sons.

Marriage, however, didn't kill her independent spirit. In 1969, along with two of her sons, she opened up a men's retail store, Lord Wolf, in downtown Calgary, because she was "inspired by the Beatles." she says, "I was called the weird mother of three boys, and I made hippie clothes." Wolf and her husband ran the business until 1988.

At 70, retirement was not on the horizon for her. Despite the difficulties of finding work at that age, she landed a job as a telemarketer, a position she speaks of fondly, in her characteristic positive style. "It was a wonderful job," she says.

Has Wolf ever felt stress and sadness? Yes, she says, when her husband was sick. It took her a year after his death to "get back on my feet. I figured he wouldn't want me that way and I couldn't be that way."

Wolf's resiliency stems from her happy nature. She can't ever recall feeling depressed in her youth. "I had no reason to feel sad or unhappy. I had the most loving parents. Everything came my way," she says.

In September 2007, a new job came her way. With the help of one of her grandsons, Wolf now works at Baby Gap two days a week.

What does the future hold for Wolf? "As long as I can, I want to live alive," she says. "Life has been very good to me. I have a lot of wonderful young friends. I am accepted by young people and that makes me feel good."

Thousands of Falash Mora still in Gondar

By RON CSILLAG
JTA

GONDAR, Ethiopia — The sight of a mother trying to coax one more spoonful of mushy cereal into her child's mouth is a far cry from the horrifying famine that engulfed Ethiopia in 1984.

Today, the hundreds of young mothers and wide-eyed infants crowded into the Gondar Beta Israel Association's feeding centre face another problem: seemingly endless waiting. They are among several thousand Ethiopians in Gondar hoping for permission to immigrate to Israel.

"They really have no choice but to be here," says Getu Zemene, chairman of the association, which runs an aid compound that provides food, schooling and some employment assistance to Ethiopians here who say they are part of the Beta Israel community of Ethiopian Jews.

These Ethiopians were practising Christians until recently, and claim links to Jewish progenitors who converted to Christianity several generations ago to escape economic and social pressures. They are known as Falash Mora.

"Israel made them a promise and they have come to Gondar," Zemene said. "Here they wait."

Over the last five years, more than 17,000 Falash Mora have been taken to Israel from Ethiopia, most of them from the Gondar area. Now, however, the Israeli government says it has finished screening potential Ethiopian immigrants. The list of Falash Mora that Israel committed to bringing in a February 2003 government decision has been exhausted, and except for a few hundred who will be leaving Ethiopia over the next few weeks, the vast majority of those waiting in Gondar will not be part of this mass aliyah.

Over 17,000 have come to Israel from Ethiopia in last five years

Zemene says there are 12,000 Falash Mora living in desperate poverty in Gondar. "I'm disappointed in Israel," Zemene says. "Look, these people have fathers and mothers" in Israel.

Since the exodus to Israel of Ethiopian Jewry – known as Beta Israel – in Operations Moses and Solomon in 1984 and 1991, respectively, Israel has taken in tens of thousands of Falash Mora. Due to the difficulty Falash Mora have of proving their links to Jewish progeny, Israel has relied on an informal 1999 census to identify potentially eligible immigrants. Israel requires that petitioners demonstrate that they have close relatives in the Jewish state and that they embrace Judaism as a condition of aliyah.

Zemene says the 12,000 people in Gondar – including people whose petitions for aliyah were rejected and some 8,500 or so who migrated to Gondar over the last five years but whom the Israeli government has declined to screen – will be stranded should Israel end its Ethiopian operation.

Zemene himself was rejected for aliyah seven years ago. When asked why, he says, "Still nobody has told me anything."

American Jewish aid groups involved in Ethiopian aliyah have promised to provide domestic resettlement aid and humanitarian assistance for Ethiopians who waited in Gondar for years but whose petitions for aliyah were rejected.

As thousands of Ethiopians in Gondar await word of their fate, they continue to flock to aid compounds in the city that are funded by the North American Conference on Ethiopian Jewry. The American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee also runs health clinics here.

At the feeding centre, nearly 1,000 children up to age six come with their mothers twice daily for meals of cereals, eggs, bread, vegetables and fruit. Children ages six to 18 receive one daily meal consisting of a small pile of white beans, two eggs, an orange, a bread roll and a banana.

"The food here is not adequate," Zemene says. No one is starving, he explains, but there is widespread hunger.

Over at another one of the compounds, hundreds of children study for up to four hours per day at the School for Hebrew, Jewish Culture and Religion. Zemene estimates that 85 per cent of children in the classes have never attended a regular school.

Around the corner, a nurse examines the younger children. The nurse, who does not want to be identified, says the children's growth rates are acceptable.

Inspiration comes at the synagogue, adjacent to the feeding centre and a mikvah. It's an open space partially enclosed with plastic sheeting and corrugated metal.

During a recent afternoon service, three older boys led the congregation in a mix of Amharic and Hebrew. Men and women, clad in traditional white robes, sat separately, many with heads bowed. They responded dutifully, with many of the younger ones following along in donated prayer books.

At the Gondar Beta Israel Association's main office, 120 men can sit in small stalls for vocational training in traditional weaving, spinning and metalwork.

If Israel shuts down its emigration operation here, "we will continue as before," Zemene pledges, without elaborating.

Aliyah funds exhausted

through a list of potential Ethiopian immigrants dating back to 1999. That list is now closed, according to ministry spokesperson Sabine Hadad.

The UJC announced recently it had exhausted the $71 million it had raised and was ceasing its funding in Ethiopia. The national arm of the North American network of local Jewish federations had pledged $100 million to Ethiopian immigration and absorption as part of Operation Promise. The Jewish Agency for Israel, which co-ordinates the Ethiopians' immigration and absorption in Israel, anticipates the final flight of Ethiopian immigrants will arrive in Israel in early July.

"The Jewish Agency is winding down its activity based on the decision of the government to cease the current immigration of the Falash Mora at the end of June," agency spokesperson Michael Jankelowitz told JTA.

But the coalition of activists pressing for additional Falash Mora aliyah say another 8,500 or so Ethiopians should be screened by the government for eligibility. The activists say they are people who are on the 1999 list but remained in their rural villages rather than leaving for the Ethiopian cities of Gondar and Addis Ababa. Most petitioners congregated in the cities while Israel reviewed their cases and during that time received Jewish aid.

Israeli courts have rejected this argument, ruling that the government fulfilled its commitments dating back to the 2003 government decision and that the 8,500 Ethiopians represent a new group. Nevertheless, the coalition of activists is pressing on with its campaign, which began last December.

"I know people have concerns that there's no end to this, that this is an indefinite extension, that they're not really Jews," said Irwin Cotler, a former Canadian justice minister and longtime advocate for Ethiopian aliyah.

"Our entire position rests on two points – one, that there's a finite, definite group of 8,500. Two, we're not saying the 8,500 should be brought. We're saying the 8,500 have a right to have their eligibility determined according to law."

At the heart of the controversy over Ethiopian immigration is the fear that mass Ethiopian aliyah will continue without end. Ethiopian aliyah was declared over by Israeli officials on several previous occasions, only to begin anew following public campaigns for its extension.

Unlike the Ethiopian immigrants who came to Israel in Operations Moses and Solomon in 1984 and 1991, respectively, the Falash Mora were not practising Jews until very recently. That has made it difficult to ascertain their claims of links – either by heritage or marriage – to Ethiopians of Jewish ancestry whose progenitors converted to Christianity more than a century ago to escape economic and social discrimination. Rather than immigrating under the Law of Return, the Ethiopians qualify under a family-reunification statute, the Law of Entry.

Some observers, including veteran Ethiopian immigrants, have warned that Ethiopians with dubious claims to Jewish ancestry are exploiting the system to escape Africa's desperate poverty for a better life in Israel. But advocates of the Falash Mora say that except for a few isolated cases, those coming to Israel have legitimate Jewish links.

In their current campaign, activists have developed a four-pronged approach focusing on Israel's three branches of government and the media. Advocates are filing additional lawsuits and appeals; lobbying Knesset members for legislation expanding Ethiopian aliyah; urging the prime minister to issue a new order on Ethiopian aliyah; and campaigning for public support.

Meanwhile, Jewish-aid funding to Ethiopia is drying up. The North American Conference on Ethiopian Jewry (NACOEJ), which funds Jewish aid and education in Ethiopia, says it will stay the course, but its sponsors are pulling out.

"The truth is, we just don't have the money," said Jim Lodge, the vice-president of the Israel and Overseas division at UJC, one of NACOEJ's main sponsors. "It's not out of any kind of policy decision or initiative on our own, but simply out of budget considerations."

Extensive security the norm in Jordan

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Special to the CJN

Extensive security measures are in place in Jordan to ensure that terrorist groups don't cause instability or infiltrate the border with Israel.

In Umm Qais in northern Jordan, which borders on Israel and the Golan Heights, it is impossible to enter or leave the village without passing through Jordanian army checkpoints with armed soldiers and tanks. In the village, where most men attend prayers daily at the central mosque, there are many Jordanians of Palestinian origin.

"Security is especially tight here because the Jordanian government is worried about Islamic extremists getting to the border with Israel and conducting terrorist attacks or undermining King Abdullah's [Hashemite] regime," said Anna, a middle-aged German volunteer at the Umm Qais archeological site, who did not want to give her last name.

"Northern Jordan traditionally has been the centre of Palestinian extremism," she said. "There is a big Palestinian refugee camp in the city of Irbid, less than an hour's drive from here. In Black September in 1974, Irbid was considered the stronghold of Yasser Arafat and Palestinian nationalists [who challenged the Hashemite regime]."

Catherina, another German volunteer at the site who wished to remain anonymous, added: "I was in Irbid the other day, and a soldier got on the city bus to look at everyone's passport. He wasn't interested in women's passports but in the men's. The regime is fearful of Muslim extremists who want to carry out terrorist attacks... There are concerns that there are Al Qaeda cells around here."

Israeli security officials have reportedly been concerned that Al Qaeda might try to kidnap an Israeli farmer or soldier near the Jordan Valley.

Al Qaeda's presence in northern Jordan is not new. An Al Qaeda group is believed to be behind an attack last year on a Jordanian resort not far from Umm Qais, near Israel's Kibbutz Ein Gev on the Sea of Galilee. Additionally, an Al Qaeda group is believed to have been responsible for the firing of a Katyusha rocket from Jordan into Eilat.

Numerous police are located at tourist sites throughout Jordan since the triple suicide bombing in November 2005 of three western-owned hotels in Amman (the Renaissance, the Hyatt Regency and Days Inn), carried out by the Iraqi branch of Al Qaeda led by the Jordanian militant Abu Musab Zarqawi. The blast killed 60 people.

Many Israelis are wary of travelling to Amman since a deranged gunman attacked western tourists in broad daylight in the city's downtown Roman Theatre in 2006, claiming to have acted in response to the fighting in the Second Lebanon War.

An American institution in Amman currently does not display an American flag or any other identifier. And people are nervous about working in locations that are obviously American.

"I thought about playing piano and singing regularly at the Holiday Inn Hotel in Amman, but decided not to because it is too high profile," said Danny, an American singer who has been living in Amman for a few years.

Hotels frequented by tourists have extensive security, far more than their counterparts in Jerusalem, Tel Aviv or Netanya. In the parking lot of the Marriot Hotel in Amman, guards check both the underside and inside of vehicles entering the hotel complex. Anyone entering the hotel must go through airport-style security procedures, including luggage scanning as well as walk-through detectors. A sign in the hotel elevator reads: "This elevator is under electronic surveillance."

This year, Jordanian authorities banned all events marking the Naqba, or "Catastrophe," a term used by Palestinians to refer to the creation of the State of Israel 60 years ago. A number of pro-Palestinian groups and Jordanian opposition parties had been planning to hold a rally in Amman. This event and other "illegal" public gatherings were disallowed.

"[Most] people in this country are interested in living in peace," said Jutta Haesner, director of the German Protestant Institute of Archeology in Amman. "[Jordanians] don't want Iran or Syria to get them into trouble. They see the refugees from Iraq coming here and what kind of trouble there is in Iraq, and they don't want to be part of it."

However, as Israel turns 60, King Abdullah is reportedly concerned about the ongoing crisis in Gaza and fearful that the instability there could lead to a Hamas takeover of the West Bank, which would have negative implications for Jordan.

Large billboards of King Abdullah and his late father, King Hussein, are located throughout the kingdom, a reminder to all of who is in charge of the country.

Hamas releases letter from Schalit

JERUSALEM — Hamas released a letter from its Israeli captive, abducted soldier Gilad Schalit.

Making good on its promise to former U.S. president Jimmy Carter, the Palestinian Islamist faction on June 9 delivered a letter from Schalit, an Israeli soldier who was abducted and taken to the Gaza Strip almost two years ago.

Gilad Schalit

Schalit's parents said the letter, which was handled by the Carter Center, was addressed to them and signaled distress on the part of the captive, who has been held almost entirely incommunicado.

"He pleads for his life," Schalit's father, Noam, told Yediot Achronot on June 10. "We have no doubt that this is Gilad's handwriting. The letter is recent, even though it is not dated."

In the letter, which was considered a proof of life, the young soldier wrote that his "health is deteriorating," and that he dreams of the day he will "come back home." He also asked the Israeli government not to "abandon" him.

"The government has to do every effort to put an end to this case and release him. The letter is nothing for us," Schalit's father said.

The gesture by Hamas came as Israeli leaders prepared to discuss the possibility of a major military sweep of Gaza to crush cross-border rocket fire.

Analysts said Hamas may be trying to signal its willingness to continue negotiations on releasing Schalit in exchange for jailed Palestinian terrorists. Israel has so far rejected many of the names on the Hamas release roster.

Prisoner exchange deal reported

Regev's comments came after the Lebanese newspaper As-Safir reported earlier Monday that military sources in Lebanon expect Hezbollah to return his son, Eldad, and Goldwasser to Israel next week, as part of an exchange deal.

According to the report, the deal will take place between June 20 and 25.

At the same time as the As-Safir report was published, United Nations sources told the Lebanese daily Al-Akhbar that an exchange for the kidnapped IDF soldiers is likely to be carried out at the end of next week.

The sources did not relay any other details about the swap except that it had been agreed upon after negotiations between Israel and Hezbollah were expedited through German mediation.

The Saudi-owned paper Al-Sharq Al-Awsat also reported that the family of jailed Lebanese terrorist Samir Kuntar has begun to prepare for his imminent return to Lebanon. Kuntar's return to Lebanon is believed to be part of Israel's commitments in the deal.

The various Arab media reports came while Dekel was in Europe for talks with the German mediator. A meeting between the two is expected to centre on advancing the deal, in return for the release of Kuntar and a number of Hezbollah operatives.

Kuntar is serving multiple life sentences for killing four Israelis in a 1979 infiltration of an apartment building in northern Israel. Among the victims were a 28-year-old man and his four-year-old daughter, whose head Kuntar repeatedly smashed against a rock before crushing her skull with a rifle butt.

On Sunday, the attorney representing Kuntar told Ha'aretz that his client has not received any information regarding his imminent release, despite reports to the contrary circulating in recent weeks.

El Salvador seeks recognition for little-known Nazi-era rescue

By LARRY LUXNER
JTA

WASHINGTON — El Salvador is home to only 120 Jews, but this small Central American nation of seven million has long portrayed itself as a solid friend of Israel and the Jewish people.

For years, the Salvadoran government has condemned anti-Zionist resolutions at the United Nations, and until August 2006, it was one of only two countries – the other was Costa Rica – that maintained an embassy in Jerusalem.

Now, with the help of the American Jewish Committee and a Los Angeles filmmaker, El Salvador is trying to win global recognition for an obscure diplomat whose actions during World War II helped rescue at least 25,000 European Jews from deportation to Nazi death camps.

From 1942 to 1945, Col. Jose Arturo Castellanos, El Salvador's consul general in Geneva, issued official papers to thousands of Hungarian, Polish, French, German and Czech Jewish families certifying that they were bona fide citizens of El Salvador.

The scheme – at first disavowed but later approved by his superiors back home – was carried out in secret by Castellanos' deputy and friend, a Romanian Jewish businessman named George Mandel-Mantello.

On June 11, both men were remembered posthumously at an event hosted by the Embassy of El Salvador in Washington. Among those on hand were Rene Leon, the country's longtime ambassador to the United States; Claudio Kahn, past president of El Salvador's Jewish community; and a number of other U.S. and Latin American dignitaries.

"We are here to present the story of a great man who conducted an operation from Switzerland that saved thousands of innocent Jewish people who would have otherwise died at the hands of the criminal Nazis," said Ricardo Moran Ferracuti, the co-ordinator for historical research at El Salvador's Ministry of Foreign Affairs. "This is the story of Col. Castellanos, a man with great courage who stood up against the system."

Moran has tried for three years to persuade Israel's Yad Vashem Holocaust memorial museum to recognize Castellanos as Righteous Among the Nations, but he says the museum's authorities are very strict.

"The requirements are that the person was not Jewish, that he or she didn't make any profit, and that he risked his life and his job," he explained. "Unfortunately we cannot obtain this recognition for Mr. Mantello because he was a Jew. But without Mantello, Castellanos couldn't have done anything. It was a team operation."

Irena Steinfeldt, director of Yad Vashem's Righteous Among the Nations Department, in an e-mail to JTA said Yad Vashem has asked the Foreign Ministry of El Salvador to search its archives for documents showing that Castellanos acted against his superiors' orders.

"Should we receive such documents, we will submit the case to the Commission for the Designation of the Righteous, which will then have to evaluate Castellanos' role in the rescue operation and the risks he took," Steinfeldt wrote.

Obscure diplomat's actions during World War II helped rescue at least 25,000 European Jews from deportation to Nazi death camps

In 1938, Castellanos was sent to Germany to open El Salvador's consulate in Hamburg. Four years later Mandel, Mandel-Mantello's original name, visited Castellanos in Geneva, where the diplomat had been reassigned for his safety. Mandel asked for help in evading the Nazis in Romania.

Castellanos appointed Mandel as first secretary of El Salvador's consulate in Geneva.

Immediately upon receiving his Salvadoran passport, the wealthy Romanian added "Mantello" to his name in order to sound Latin. Inspired by other rescue efforts, Mantello suggested that Salvadoran passports be issued to rescue Jews.

Castellanos declined, citing the increased scrutiny of foreign passports. Instead he suggested issuing certificates of Salvadoran citizenship.

In 1944, Mandel-Mantello and Castellanos asked the Swiss government to represent its interests in Hungary. Specifically they sought protection of all the new "citizens" of El Salvador.

Following a series of bureaucratic delays, Switzerland finally agreed thanks to the intervention of Carl Lutz, the vice consul at the Swiss Legation in Budapest, which already represented 12 other countries, including the United States and Great Britain.

None of the Jews who received the official-looking, notarized documents ever immigrated to El Salvador, but the bogus papers gave them protection in Hungary, Poland and other countries where they resided.

By word of mouth, the not-so-secret operation eventually grew so large that Lutz moved it to a glass factory in Budapest, which became known locally as "the glass house."

Between the Swiss Legation and Mandel-Mantello's efforts, some 10,000 certificates were handed out. Each one saved the lives of individuals and entire families.

The little-known story inspired California filmmaker Brad Marlowe and his Salvadoran wife, Leonor Avila de Marlowe, to produce a documentary about Castellanos and Mandel-Mantello titled Glass House. The 78-minute film was shown publicly for the first time on June 12 at the Washington Hebrew Congregation.

For its part, El Salvador also hopes to solidify its ties with the AJC and the American Jewish community, which in the past has lobbied hard in favour of issues important to that country. These include humanitarian aid following the devastation of Hurricane Mitch in 1998, temporary protective status for hundreds of thousands of Salvadoran immigrants in the United States and passage of the controversial Central American Free Trade Agreement in 2005.

Castellano's daughter, Frieda Garcia, 59, a translator for El Salvador's President Tony Saca, says her father never talked much about his wartime rescue effort, and he died in 1977 in relative obscurity.

"My father started giving these documents out long before the government of El Salvador told him to stop," she said.

"People say our president at that time was pro-Nazi. Later, after a new president took office, they were able to mass produce and distribute the papers. But whenever I asked him, he would say that he didn't do anything another person in his place wouldn't have done."

Olmert OKs primaries

Ehud Olmert authorized a primary in his Kadima party. Besieged by scandal and trailing in the polls, the prime minister's June 11 go-ahead may mean the end of his tenure. He revealed his decision in a meeting with the head of Kadima's steering committee, MK Tzachi Hanegbi. "The prime minister instructed us to act quickly," Hanegbi said. "The process has started running." Hanegbi will convene the party this week to continue the process, but said he doesn't expect a primary to be held before the July 17 cross-examination of U.S. businessman Morris Talansky in the illicit funding investigation against Olmert. The prime minister has denied any wrongdoing.

PM muzzles ministers

Israel's prime minister told Israeli officials to avoid making public threats against Iran. Ehud Olmert told his cabinet June 10 that officials should "refrain from discussing sensitive matters publicly" – an allusion to Iran's nuclear program, political sources said. Transport Minister Shaul Mofaz, an Olmert deputy, helped fuel record-high oil prices this month by telling a newspaper that Israel will have to attack Iran if international sanctions failed to rein in its uranium enrichment. Commentators said the comments were part of preparations to challenge Olmert for leadership of the Kadima Party.

Lobby authors speak

The authors of a controversial book about the "Israel lobby" spoke in Israel last week. Profs. John Mearsheimer and Stephen Walt, from the University of Chicago and Harvard University, respectively, spoke June 12 at a forum in Tel Aviv and at Hebrew University in their first visit to Israel since the publication of The Israel Lobby and U.S. Foreign Policy, which drew charges of anti-Semitism when it was published last year. They were guests of Gush Shalom, a far-left Israeli peace group. Echoing their claim that pro-Israel forces in Washington pressured the United States into attacking Iraq, they said the same forces are pushing America into attacking Iran. "There is only one country in the world that is putting any pressure on the U.S. to attack Iran, and that is Israel," Mearsheimer told a packed lecture hall at Hebrew University. "And it is putting enormous pressure on the U.S."

Shelling wounds woman

An Israeli woman was wounded June 12 after Palestinians in Gaza hit Israel with dozens of mortar shells and Qassam rockets. She was hit as Hamas terrorists bombarded Israel, calling it a response to an explosion earlier in the day that killed three and injured 40 in Gaza's Beit Lahiya area. An apparent longer-range Grad missile also landed near Ashkelon. Hamas accused Israel of launching an air strike on Beit Lahiya, but the IDF denied conducting any activity in the area and said the explosion was likely caused by terrorists building bombs.

Peace hopes low

Most Israelis and Palestinians see no point to the current round of peace talks, a survey found. A joint poll issued June 12 by Hebrew University and the Palestinian Center for Policy and Survey Research found 55 per cent of Israelis and 68 per cent of Palestinians think talks between their respective leaders, Ehud Olmert and Mahmoud Abbas, are going nowhere and should be suspended. The poll also showed both sides are dissatisfied with Egyptian efforts to broker a Gaza truce, which a senior Israeli official told the Jerusalem Post was "likely" by this week. In Israel, the idea has only minority support because it's unclear if Gilad Schalit, a soldier held hostage by Hamas since 2006, would be released as part of a ceasefire. The poll had 1,006 Israelis respondents, 1,270 Palestinian ones, and a three per cent margin of error.

Farmer traded plowshare for gun to help Israel

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Abe Levine, a self-described "farmer," is a humble man of few words. But his actions 60 years ago spoke volumes.

A dedicated member of the Machal – overseas volunteers who came to Israel between 1947 and 1949 to help found the fledgling state – Levine sat proudly wearing a Machal baseball cap in a recent breakfast interview with The CJN and spoke of his "close shaves" while serving as a armoured car driver during Israel's War of Independence.

Having served four years in the Canadian Army beforehand, Levine's skills and experience as a soldier were put to good use by the Haganah, helping raw recruits handle their weapons and imparting tactical knowledge.

After landing in British-controlled Palestine as a volunteer and being assigned to the 72nd infantry division, Levine parlayed his knowledge of tractors and trucks into a re-assignment with the Haganah's 79th armoured car division, he said.

"What would you rather do, walk or drive?" he answered with a smile when asked why he transferred regiments. "Those years driving the tractor on the farm paid off. And I [was] the only guy in the Israeli army who wore a plaid shirt. So they named me 'Zeke,' like a farmer."

Levine, now 85, said his urge to join the Machal stemmed from images he saw in Europe while he was stationed in Germany near the Bergen-Belsen concentration camp, just after its liberation towards the end of World War II.

In an autobiography he brought along with him to the interview, Levine pointed to the section where he put down his thoughts on his time in Israel and asked that his prose be used in lieu of comment.

"As a Jew, having heard about what had happened [in the Holocaust]... I was hoping to see for myself what the Germans had done," he wrote. "When we got to the camp, there were dead people lying all around in waist-high heaps. They were using the former guards to pick up the bodies to put them in the ditches... All these people were dead because they were Jews. No other reason."

Shortly thereafter, he was discharged from the Canadian Army and returned home to his parents' farm in Whitby, Ont. With images of Bergen-Belsen still fresh in his mind, Levine soon heard about an effort to recruit soldiers to fight for a Jewish homeland in Palestine.

Abe Levine poses atop his armoured vehicle during a victory parade in Israel after the country won its independence in 1948. According to Levine, David Ben Gurion personally inspected the troops that day. [Photo courtesy Abe Levine]

"Unlike other [Machalniks], I did not join up after being inspired at one of the recruitment meetings," he wrote. "Instead, I just went, with only the knowledge of the cause and a desire to be part of what was happening."

Levine arrived in Palestine after a long journey by boat with 1,200 others via New York, Marseilles, Le Havre and "a DP camp called Grand Arenas," he said.

"The significance of such a journey for everyone involved cannot be underestimated," Levine writes in his memoirs. "There were over 1,000 survivors from the terrors of Nazi Europe heading to a Jewish homeland, where they hoped they would be safe at last."

He bills himself as "one skinny guy from Canada" among the other Machalniks who fought for Israel.

Once in Palestine, Levine said he quickly observed the dire conditions soldiers and pioneers had to live in on a daily basis.

Despite this, Levine was determined to "make a difference" in memory of the six million Jews killed by the Nazis.

"I understood that if there had been an established Jewish country, half of the victims could have gotten away, or two million, or even one million," he recalled. "We volunteers, men and women, wanted to right that wrong."

The first battle Levine participated in was at Mount Meron, he said.

It was there that he had one of his many close shaves.

"I was fortunate enough to close the small lookout [window] of my armoured truck a second before it was hit by an Arab bullet meant for me," he said.

Levine next saw action at the battle for Jish (Gush Halav), as part of Operation Hiram, a "lightning attack" on the Arab Liberation Army intended to surprise the enemy and take out its northern command centre.

"We never knew what to expect when we went into battle," Levine said, but he was happy when a sudden communication came in from command in May of 1948.

"I was up in the hills when Israel declared independence. Word came right away and I felt wonderful. Like it was all worth it," Levine said.

Describing himself as a man who "formed a deep relationship with Israel at the critical hour of its birth," Levine would have settled in Israel after the war had he not received word from Canada that his father had become seriously ill.

Instead, he returned to Canada and opened a business supplying tanneries with leather.

Levine has visited Israel 22 times since serving as a Machalnik, helping out on numerous occasions as a volunteer with Sar El. He laments the way the country is treated today by the world community.

"If the world would leave Israel alone, the possibilities would be wonderful," he said.

And if they won't leave Israel alone?

"What I don't understand is why Israelis don't send 10 rockets back for every one fired from Gaza," Levine said, expressing a deep-seated, recalcitrant attitude toward any enemy of the country he helped form.

During his time in the Machal, Levine saw most Arabs as "the enemy." Though he said he had lines he would not cross – "I wouldn't kill an Arab if I just saw him standing outside his house," he wrote – Levine knew the Jewish people had just barely survived a slaughter in Europe and he knew they "had to fight back" if they were to avoid another one in the future.

Last month, he took his most recent trip to Israel, where he owns an apartment, to partake in its 60th anniversary. It coincided with his grandson's participation on the March of the Living trip and his eldest granddaughter's role as a youth leader on another Israel excursion. For Levine, it was a symbolic torch-passing.

Watching his progeny become involved in Jewish causes and events has given him a sense of fulfillment, he said.

He feels his work and commitment to the Jewish state, has now "come full circle."

Barbara Walters reflects on her career, marriages, family

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Barbara Walters, who is fast closing in on her 80th birthday, has had an amazing career in television in the United States. She was the first female nightly news co-anchor, the first woman to co-host the Today show, the host of 20/20, the co-host of The View, and the host and producer of a series of Specials.

In retrospect, Walters has made her mark as a star interviewer, having interviewed some 30 heads of state from Egypt's Anwar Sadat and Iraq's Saddam Hussein to Poland's Lech Walesa and Britain's Margaret Thatcher.

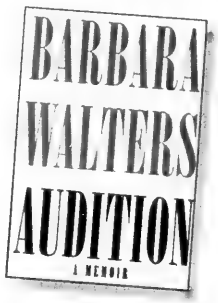
She has interviewed three Israeli prime ministers – Golda Meir, Menachem Begin and Yitzhak Rabin. In addition, she has covered U.S. presidents, including John F. Kennedy's assassination and Richard Nixon's historic trip to China.

Not bad for a Jewish girl who landed her first job as a lowly secretary in an advertising agency.

In Audition: A Memoir (Alfred A. Knopf), Walters recaps her eventful life with verve and passion. She recounts her rise in TV land, discloses bracing and sad details about her family, and reflects on heady love affairs and three failed marriages.

She dedicates this autobiography, in part, to her late older sister, Jacqueline, who was developmentally disabled and never had "a real life." Although Walters had "mixed feelings" about her, being both sympathetic and resentful, she credits Jacqueline with teaching her the meaning of compassion and the value of hard work.

This hefty book unfolds in chronological order, beginning with a frank account of the lives of her parents, Lou and Dena Seletsky, who never had much of a marriage. Not surprisingly, they hailed from remarkably similar backgrounds. Dena's family came from a village in Lithuania, while Lou's family – whose original name was Abrahams – came from Lodz, Poland, and settled in America by way of Britain.



Lou, the owner of a booking agency in the entertainment industry, struck it rich when, in 1937, he turned a former Greek Orthodox church in Boston into the glittering Latin Quarter nightclub.

Capitalizing on his success, Walters opened branches in Miami Beach and New York City. Walters, who was fairly close to him despite his long absences and womanizing, bears witness to his meteoric ascent.

Raised in an irreligious household, Walters writes, "We certainly knew full well that we were Jewish. But practising [Judaism] just never seemed important. As a result, I have no Jewish education… and don't observe the holidays."

A graduate of a renowned liberal arts college, she aspired to be an actress, but being practical, she attended a speedwriting school before being hired as a secretary. After a year, thanks to "pull," she acquired a position as a publicity assistant at an NBC affiliate in New York City. She began dating her boss, 10 years her senior, who was embroiled in divorce proceedings. "He was the first man I slept with," she discloses.

In this confessional tone, Walters subsequently writes about her first true love, a Frenchman who headed the catering and banquet department of a major hotel in Manhattan. "That he was married to an actress in Paris did not bother me," she admits. "Neither was I bothered by the 18-year difference in our ages."

Walters got her first big break after signing on as a writer for Today. She had previously been a publicist for a magazine, a job she disliked. By then, she had married and divorced her first husband, a manufacturer of children's hats, for whom she felt little sexual desire. The union lasted three years, and today, she barely remembers it. After they separated, she saw her ex only once again.

In passing, she relates her father's tragic descent into financial insolvency and his attempt at suicide. Due to these circumstances, Walters was forced to support her parents and sister, and for the next 40 years, she admits, she lived with a brooding sense of anxiety and insecurity. As she puts it, "I have… always felt I was auditioning, either for a new job or to make sure that I could hold on to the one I had."

Walters' foray into reporting occurred in the wake of Kennedy's murder in 1963. NBC, caught short-handed by the assassination, sent her to Washington, D.C., to help cover his funeral. Shortly afterward, she got married for the second time. "I loved him, but I wasn't passionately in love with him," she observes. "I felt trapped and restless."

Her reportage from China, in 1971, was a turning point. "I learned more about reporting than at any time before or since," she says.

Barbara Walters, right, interviewed former Israeli prime minister Golda Meir in 1973.

But there were dark days, too. Walters, a go-getter, was resented by her co-hosts, Frank McGee and Harry Reasoner, who were sullen male chauvinists. As a result, she had to scramble to advance her career.

Once her second marriage broke up, she dated the rather glitzy ambassadors to the United States from Iran and Argentina. One proposed marriage, but she was not game.

The first of her many reporting trips to the Middle East took place in August 1973, approximately a month before the outbreak of the Yom Kippur War. She went to Israel to interview Meir.

"Curiously, although I'm Jewish, I had never had any great desire to go to Israel," she acknowledges. "I'd never felt any special religious or spiritual connection to the Jewish state…" Much to her surprise, Israel overwhelmed her and "aroused feelings I never knew I had… I felt a startling and quite strong connection."

While in Israel, she was also granted an interview with Moshe Dayan, the flamboyant defence minister. Despite his reputation for rudeness, she befriended Dayan and remained friends with him until his untimely death.

By contrast, Sadat, whom she met in the wake of the Yom Kippur War, was personable and charismatic. She rates him as her best-ever interviewee. "He changed the world. At least he tried to." (She rates her interview with Hollywood actor Warren Beatty as her absolute worst. It was like "pulling teeth.")

In addition, Walters formed a cordial working relationship with Begin, but it unravelled after she pointedly questioned him about the wisdom of Israel's ill-fated invasion of Lebanon in 1982.

Outside the Mideast, one of her finest hours as a journalist when she landed an interview with Cuban leader Fidel Castro. She recalls that Castro, a friendly fellow, invited her and her crew into his kitchen and prepared delicious melted cheese sandwiches for them.

Walters' account of her third marriage, to a movie mogul she met on a blind date, makes for sober reading. "Wham! I thought, at last this is it." But no, this marriage "sputtered along," until it simply "ran out of steam."

She interviewed Saddam at a propitious moment, shortly after Israeli aircraft bombed Iraq's nuclear reactor in 1981. In usual style, he denounced Israel and its existence. She was not surprised. "I guess one might ask how I, being Jewish, felt hearing these remarks. The truth is that I felt great concern for Israel but nothing personal. I'd heard similar remarks from Arabs before and would again."

She closes on a high note, saying she had the good fortune to hit her peak during what she describes as "the golden age" of TV: "I am probably happier and more at peace than I have ever been. I know I had a fantastic career. I know I travelled everywhere and met almost every important person there was to meet. I achieved more than I could ever have imagined."

I.B. Singer praised and critiqued at a Luminato literary forum

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Dara Horn

David Bezmozgis

Isaac Bashevis Singer

The iconic Yiddish literary figure Isaac Bashevis Singer has been hailed as a novelist and short story writer who straddled the old and new worlds.

Singer, the winner of the 1978 Nobel Prize in literature, was nostalgically remembered at a forum sponsored by Luminato, the Toronto Festival of Arts and Creativity.

Singer was analyzed by three published authors – Joseph Kertes, David Bezmozgis and Dara Horn – earlier this month at the Al Green Theatre, in the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre.

Kertes, the dean of Humber College's department of creative and performing arts, is the author of Gratitude, which was Penguin's lead fiction title in its spring catalogue.

Bezmozgis wrote Natasha and Other Stories, which won the City of Toronto Book Award in 2004.

Horn, named one of Granta magazine's Top Young American Novelists, has written two novels, In the Image and The World to Come, both of which were the recipients of the National Jewish Book Award in the United States.

All three panelists delivered succinct appraisals of Singer, whose books range from Satan in Goray (1955) and The Manor (1967) to Enemies, a Love Story (1972) and Yentl the Yeshiva Boy (1983).

Born in Poland in 1902, Singer immigrated to the United States in 1935 to join his elder brother, Israel Joshua. He attained international fame after the American novelist Saul Bellow translated his collection of short stories, Gimpel the Fool, into English in the mid-1950s. Singer died in 1991.

Kertes, the founder of Humber College's creative writing program, suggested that Singer brought a storehouse of memories and impressions of Poland to his adopted homeland, and wrote unapologetically in Yiddish.

He was an outsider, yet he was imbued with a modern sensibility.

At heart, Singer was a storyteller whose self-professed role was to pay homage to a venerable and accomplished Jewish community that would virtually be wiped out by the Nazis.

Bezmozgis, an immigrant like Singer, noted that his body of work can be divided between the Polish shtetl and the post-war world.

Bezmozgis – who was born in Riga, Latvia, in 1973 and immigrated to Canada with his family when he was six years old – praised Singer's storytelling skills, but criticized his lack of attention to style.

Reading an excerpt from Enemies, a Love Story, he described it as a book that manages to distil many of Singer's themes.

Bezmozgis also read excerpts from his still uncompleted second novel, which is set in Soviet-occupied Latvia during World War II and is suffused with a sense of hard realism and disillusionment.

Horn, who is young enough to be Singer's great-granddaughter, said that he bridged the real and the surreal.

Born in New Jersey in 1977, Horn earned a Ph.D in comparative literature from Harvard University. She observed that Singer's commercial success stemmed in part from his ability to portray himself as an American writer, even though he primarily viewed himself as a Yiddish writer.

She added that Singer understood the need to promote his novels and short stories and realized the importance of having them translated into English.

In a critique, she said that he was "a bit lazy" stylistically, at least later in his career, and that he falsely presented himself as "the last voice of Yiddish literature" when, in fact, the opposite was really true.

Turning an old saying on its head, Horn, a fluent Yiddish speaker, elicited waves of laughter when she joked that she and her husband converse in Yiddish when they don't want their parents to understand what they have just said.

Concert was a love-in for Leonard Cohen

By SHLOMO SCHWARTZBERG
Special to The CJN

He still has it. In the third of his four shows performed at Toronto's Sony Centre, the legendary Leonard Cohen, still quite spry at 73, delivered a powerhouse evening of entertainment, backed by six stupendous musicians and three sublime vocalists, including Sharon Robinson, his collaborator and co-writer on his 2001 album Ten New Songs.

Attired in a nifty black double-breasted suit, blue shirt and jaunty fedora, Cohen, still the icon of cool, belied his age for most of the evening, and ranged confidently from the early classic songs of the 1960s and '70s, such as Suzanne, Bird on the Wire and Who By Fire (inspired by a prayer said on Yom Kippur) to his equally strong and memorable fare from the late '80s and '90s, including Democracy, I'm Your Man, First We Take Manhattan and Everybody Knows. (Tellingly, he didn't bother with any tracks from Dear Heather, his forgettable and bland 2004 album, and only picked the best songs – Boogie Street, In My Secret Life – from his middling 2001 album, Ten New Songs, though his stark, spoken word recitation of A Thousand Kisses Deep, from that same album, was one of the evening's highlights.)

The sold-out Sony Centre audience, most in their 40s and 50s but with a fair number of thirty- and twentysomethings, too, couldn't have been more rapt. This was a veritable concert love-in, with women screaming out their love for Cohen before songs and men thanking him for being, well, Leonard.

And Cohen reciprocated in kind, pronouncing himself "deeply grateful" to his fans for the "interest" they'd shown over the years in his career. This wasn't false modesty, nor was his supreme generosity to his co-performers an affectation.

In my experience, and I've been to my share of concerts over the years, the backup musicians and singers usually get thanked once before the encore(s), but Cohen started to thank them a few songs in and never stopped doing so throughout the evening; they must have been lauded a half dozen times each, which is simply unprecedented.

As for the music, it soared, whether it was Cohen singing Hallelujah with almost religious fervour, his voice seemingly rising to the heavens, or his quiet rendition of Suzanne, which has to be one of the most beautiful, heartbreaking songs ever written in the English language.

Other tunes were more prescient then they'd ever been before. Listening to Cohen's majestic turn on Democracy and its complex lyrics, "It's coming to America first, the cradle of the best and the worst/ It's here they got the range and the machinery for change, and it's here they got the spiritual thirst," I couldn't help thinking of Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama and the possibility that he may actually herald the positive revolutionary change that Cohen is singing about.

But it wasn't all serious stuff. Cohen literally jumped around the stage during his rousing barn-burner Closing Time and jokingly made reference to his last tour, way back in 1993, when he was, as he put it with a wry smile, "a 60-year-old kid with a crazy dream."

Watching Cohen during the long evening – which, including his two sets and three encores, added up to a remarkable 2½ hours of performance – you could believe that he might actually have trouble believing that he's so loved and so successful. He is, though, and that he's ascended to this career peak, including his recent induction into the U.S. Rock and Roll Hall of Fame, with such class and panache, only goes to show that the good guys sometimes do get the adulation and honour that they deserve.

CHRISTIE PITS DRAMA LOST DAUGHTER AT FRINGE FESTIVAL

Lost Daughter, a historical drama by Montreal playwright Tara Goldstein, is scheduled for performance during the Fringe Festival in Toronto. Inspired by Shakespeare's The Merchant of Venice, the play is set in Toronto in the summer of 1933, a time of intense heat, widespread unemployment and anti-Semitic incitements in city parks and beaches.

Goldstein was chosen to read aloud the part of Shylock in her Montreal high school English class in 1971. Although most of the students were Jewish, Goldstein recalls that there was no discussion of the play's concepts of Christian forgiveness (as symbolized by Portia's "quality of mercy" speech) and Jewish revenge (Shylock's desire for a pound of flesh). "We were left with the uncomfortable knowledge that Christians were merciful and Jews were vengeful and needed to be punished," she recalled.

With that memory in mind, Goldstein began writing Lost Daughter in 2000. The play "not only engages with the themes of Canadian xenophobia and anti-Semitism in the summer of 1933, but also portrays the rich tradition of forgiveness in Jewish thought and culture," she said.

The title comes from Jessica's last words to her Jewish father, Shylock, before she elopes with her Christian husband, Lorenzo, in The Merchant of Venice. "Farewell, and if my fortune be not crossed/ I have a father, you a daughter, lost." Al Green Theatre, Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre. July 3, 5, 6, 11 & 13

Fringe Presents The Lesson: In Eugene Ionesco's The Lesson, a dim-witted pupil and a scatterbrained professor confront each other in class; the lesson quickly devolves, with dire consequences for both. By turns comic and violent, Ionesco's absurdist dark comedy challenges our conventional assumptions about education, communication and knowledge itself.

The Fringe production stars actor-teacher Alex Fallis opposite his former student, Julia Nish-Lapidus, and Leah Black. (Julia's mother is Janet Nish-Lapidus, current principal of the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School.) Tarragon Theatre, Extra Space, July 5 to 12. $10. www.fringetoronto.com

Other Fringe Offerings: Damages, a drama involving two aging Holocaust survivors and an act of betrayal that kept them estranged for 30 years, features the artistry of playwright Michael Posner, director Kayla Gordon and actor Harvey Atkin. It's one of many upcoming worthy productions in the 2008 Toronto Fringe Festival.

Others include Jew for a Day, which tells the story of a gentile child who decides he wants to be Jewish; Just Another School Shooting by Art Moore, about an event during a trip to Israel; Sitting in a Tree, by Ronit Rubinstein, a funny, quirky look at love; The Spy, a comic show created and performed by Jonno Katz of Melbourne, Australia, a tale of intrigue and espionage set in London in 1975; and How I Learned to Stop Worrying and Love Abortion about a Bible group's assassination attempt on an elusive "baby killer," written by Erin Fleck and directed by Maya Rabinovitch.

Names in the News: Writers Dara Horn, David Bezmozgis and Joseph Kertesz participated in a celebration of Isaac Bashevis Singer as part of Toronto's Luminato Festival at the Miles Nadal JCC.

Kertesz, founding dean of the Humber creative writing program and moderator of the readings and panel discussion, led off with a capsule summary of the life and literary merit of the great Yiddish writer. Bezmozgis, author of the award-winning collection Natasha and Other Stories, expanded upon this as he read a selection from Singer's novel Enemies: A Love Story, then a passage from his own current novel-in-progress.

But it was Horn, whose most recent novel is The World to Come, who stole the show with her intimate, apparently encyclopedic knowledge of Singer's oeuvre and the works of lesser-known Yiddishists such as Lamed Shapiro, whom she said was superior even to Singer.

The only Yiddish speaker on the panel, Horn said she had learned the language not in the traditional way from one's parents, but at university. Her boyfriend used to help with her Yiddish and – "Reader, I married him," she quipped, adding that they now speak in Yiddish to discuss things they don't want her parents to hear. The event drew a capacity crowd to the Al Green Theatre, Miles Nadal JCC.

THE MAKING OF 'THE NEW MAN': The 1930s are known for the political upheavals that led to World War II and the Holocaust. The exhibition, The 1930s: the making of "The New Man," at the National Gallery of Canada in Ottawa until Sept. 6, brings together more than 200 works that explore the seminal link between art and biology, reflecting the dissemination of the contrasting concepts of the "degenerate" artists and those of the "Superman" or the "The New Man" that were spreading through Nazi Germany, Benito Mussolini's Italy and Josef Stalin's Soviet Union. The exhibition offers a unique opportunity to see works by Salvador Dali, Pablo Picasso, Max Ernst, Jackson Pollock, Alex Colville and others. Pictured is Blind Power, a 1937 painting by German artist Rudolf Schlichter, whose works were later seized by the Nazis as degenerate art.

Corrections

In the CJN Party Planner, June 5, the story "More than flowers, you'll get flair to remember" (page B31) did not include the phone number for An Affair to Remember. It is 905-881-6686.

Also, in the article "Caterers offer original dishes" (page B39), the name of the owner of J. Catering was mispelled. It should have read Josh Okorofsky.

Israeli band Rockfour rocks in neo-psychedelic style

By RITA POLIAKOV
CJN Intern

Rockfour, Memories of the Never Happened

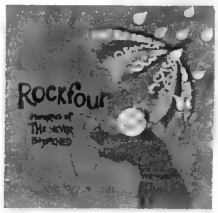
Rockfour's newest album, Memories of the Never Happened, is a throwback to the 1960s with a modern twist.



Their neo-psychedelic style is a mix of the Beatles and the Who, with a little bit of early Pink Floyd thrown in for good measure. The twang of guitars and thumping drum solos are joined with harmonicas, guitarrons (large Mexican acoustic guitars used in mariachi bands), mellotrons (electro-mechanical keyboards developed in the early 1960s) and the Wurlitzer, an electro-mechanical, stringless piano. It's hard to believe that Rockfour started as a rock band in Holon, Israel. After making a few Hebrew albums, the band switched to English.

As their music played in the background, I spent a surprising amount of time flipping through their lyrics pamphlet, which read like a book of poetry. The album is loaded with a mix of head-bopping rock numbers and soothing, chill-out tracks. Even though some songs, such as Old Village House, last nearly seven minutes, I couldn't help but tap along to the beat the whole way through.

David Buchbinder, Odessa/Havana

True to Canada's multicultural spirit, award-winning trumpeter David Buchbinder worked with Juno Award-winning pianist Hilario Duran in downtown Toronto to fuse two seemingly different styles into one album. Odessa/Havana is a mix of Jewish and Cuban music, two styles that originally came together in the 1950s during the American mambo craze. Few artists can pull off nine-minute songs as well as Buchbinder can. While I was skeptical at first, I soon found that each song is like an adventure, with musical twists and turns. The album's pumping highs and soothing lows make it a good soundtrack for any dinner party. Just when the trumpet seemed to get too soft, a mix of drums and piano would explode from my stereo. The album's blend of trumpets, violins, pianos and drums gives it a unique sound that challenges the boundaries of both Cuban and Jewish music. No song represents this best than Colaboracion, the only track that was composed by both Buchbinder and Duran. The song blends jazzy piano riffs with violin solos to create a genre of its own.

Out To Lunch, Excuse Me While I do the Boogaloo

Jazz is king in Out to Lunch's debut album, Excuse Me While I do the Boogaloo. Led by David Levy, the New York City-based band brings improvisation and soul together with mellow tracks like Maudlin's Eleven. Levy, a Canadian born multi-instrumentalist, met his fellow band members in the New England Conservatory of Music. Their love of all things jazz shines in this album, which mixes funk, salsa and house music. The band's use of a full horn section and live electronica gives a unique kick to a classic genre. Soft voices murmur throughout various tracks as the bass clarinet, saxophone, drums, flute, trumpet and keyboard mesh together to create toe-tapping songs. Out to Lunch's songs are like snowflakes, each one is different and every once in a while, they give you goose bumps.

Fern Lindzon, Moments Like These

It's obvious that Fern Lindzon has fallen in love with jazz. Her first album, Moments Like These, is a love song for jazz musicians. Her style is contemporary jazz with a mix of klezmer music. The album is a bit like a lullaby that lasts a little too long. Still, Lindzon's voice, soft and pure, makes up for the length. Let Yourself Go, one of my favourite songs on the album, is a soothing blend of jazzy piano and smooth vocals. The simplicity of the lyrics is appealing, as are Lindzon's duets with guitarist Reg Schwager and bassist George Koller. Lindzon, who was introduced to jazz in her early 20s, has spent most of her life studying music, and it shows. Her musical instincts combined with years of preparation make her debut album worth listening to.

www.fernlindzon.com

Aviva Chernick, In the Sea

Aviva Chernick's spunky personality shines through in her album In the Sea. Quirky lyrics and jazzy piano riffs are combined to create upbeat tracks such as Pirate Jenny (by Kurt Weill). With a little help from pianist Tania Gill and bassist Andrew Downing, Chernick created a first album loaded with heartfelt melodies and smooth, gentle vocals. Chernick's music has been described as world cabaret with an eastern European tone. Her album features songs from all over the world, including Judeo-Spanish tunes, Negro spirituals and Yiddish folk songs. Chernick trained as a theatre director, contemporary dancer and actor before turning to music. She is the lead singer of Shakshuka, a world fusion ensemble. Her debut album holds nothing back, bringing emotion and depth to every track.

When singer/songwriter Barry Manilow came to the Air Canada Centre in Toronto earlier this month as part of his first Canadian tour in 15 years, many of his fans considered it a miracle (to paraphrase a Manilow hit song) that the 1970s chart-topper has ventured outside Las Vegas to perform at all.

"When I agreed to perform in Las Vegas in 2000, I thought I said goodbye forever to touring," said Manilow in a telephone interview. "I loved the audiences, but hated the long journeys by plane and staying in hotels.

"But I missed seeing fans in Canada and elsewhere, so I agreed to do a series of one-night arena shows, which will be a little longer than the Vegas shows. Our show will have all the spectacular highlights of the Music and Passion shows that I do in Vegas," he said.

Those who heard him will be impressed that Manilow, who turned 65 on June 17, still has an impeccable voice that resonates with emotion. And audiences at his arena shows thus far are so familiar with Manilow's 25 top 40 songs from the 1970s, including Copacabana, I Write The Songs and Weekend In New England, that many sang along with him.

Manilow, who has sold more than 75 million records, loves sentiment and nostalgia. A highlight of the concerts will therefore be Manilow recalling his love for his late grandfather, Joseph Manilow, while singing I Made It Through The Rain.

"Grandpa coaxed me to sing Happy Birthday to my cousin in a Manhattan record-your-voice store when I was a toddler, and I wouldn't sing until years later.

"When I became a star in 1974, Grandpa gave me my first standing ovation and I was so nervous – but I knew that he was proud to see me at Carnegie Hall. How proud he was of seeing his grandson's star just blocks from the old record-your-voice studio," Manilow said.

Manilow's willingness to share his emotional vulnerability is what makes him so endearing. Despite being a multimillionaire, he has never forgotten his humble roots, knowing there would have been no career without Grandpa and others in his life.

His grandfather was the dominant male figure in the young Barry's life. Manilow was born in Brooklyn as Barry Alan Pincus, but his parents (a Jewish mother, Edna Manilow, and an Irish Catholic father, Harold Pincus) were divorced when Barry was two, and Pincus and his son never bonded from that point on.

Manilow was raised by his mother and grandparents Esther and Joseph Manilow, Jewish immigrants from Russia who lived in a small Williamsburg apartment. Barry changed his surname to Manilow shortly before his bar mitzvah out of love for his zaide.

He began his musical education on the accordion and refined it on the piano that he received as a bar mitzvah gift. "I hated the accordion. It seems that every Jewish kid had to play one. But when I played the piano, I knew music would be my passion and my ticket out of Brooklyn."

For a time, things were dire for Manilow financially and emotionally. He nearly went bankrupt twice and had married and divorced his high school sweetheart by the age of 25.

But he knew the craft of songwriting. For a time he coached singers wanting to audition on Broadway and was the musical director for Bette Midler. Manilow produced Midler's first album, as well as many more for several singers, before starring on his own in 1973 and developing a large fan base over the years.

In addition to his many hit songs, Manilow also wrote the music for two musicals, Copacabana and Harmony.

Harmony, a musical set in Nazi Germany in the 1930s, is based on the real-life story of The Comedian Harmonists, a group of three Jews (one a rabbi) and three non-Jews who were a popular singing group in Europe.

The story, a mixture of comedy and drama, recalls how the group fell apart when they returned to Nazi Germany in the late '30s and disbanded because of the Holocaust.

"The story is uplifting and may mean more to me because my relatives went through the Holocaust. [It has] songs that I wrote from Jewish cantorials and klezmer music."

Harmony has never had the same success as Manilow's other projects, despite receiving positive reviews when the play debuted in San Diego in 1997, and despite many attempts by Manilow to stage it on Broadway, the play has not been seen in over a decade.

"It's frustrating, because what is artistically good is not necessarily a commercial success. I am not producing Harmony anymore, but there are some producers that are willing to try again, and I hope Harmony can still come to Broadway. To this day, Harmony is the project in my career that I am most proud of."

Walk, fun fair to help raise funds for neuroblastoma research

For the fourth straight year, Sunday In The Park With Lilah will raise funds for neuroblastoma research at the Hospital for Sick Children.

The event, Sunday June 22, at Fieldstone Day School, 2999 Dufferin St., will feature a family walk and fun fair, not to mention live reptiles from Reptilia, scientists from Mad Science, Patty from kids'CBC, and live performances by Kayla and Jen Gould.

Bouncy castles, face painting, a silent auction, and lunch, as well as other surprises will round out the day.

Lilah is Lilah Petersiel, the four-year-old daughter of Eric Petersiel and Tami Moscoe. When she was born, she had only one kidney. An ultrasound and further tests determined that she had a severe childhood cancer called neuroblastoma.

Neuroblastoma is a cancer of the nervous system that causes tumours to grow quickly. If not discovered in the first few months of life, a child has only a 20 per cent chance of survival.

Shortly after birth, a golf ball-sized tumour was found on Lilah's adrenal gland. It was removed, but the cancer had spread to the liver.

Since then, life for Lilah has involved chemotherapy and multiple hospital and doctors' visits. It's now three years since her last round of chemotherapy, and Lilah is enjoying day care.

Registration is online at www.lilahsfund.com or at the event, at 9:30 a.m. Kickoff will be at 10 a.m. Previous picnics have raised more than $300,000, and organizers hope to raise another $100,000 this year.

For details, see the website, or call Moscoe or Petersiel at 416-651-1229.

Exhibit focuses on Jewish children in contemporary Holland

By LAUREN KRAMER
Special to The CJN

AMSTERDAM — If you have ever tried to shlep a child through the galleries of a museum, you'll know it's an experience best enjoyed in the company of adults.

But the JHM (Jewish Historical Museum) Children's Museum in Amsterdam stands as a stark exception to that rule. The three-level museum, which rubs shoulders with the adult-oriented Jewish Historical Museum, is a delightful, bright space that invites children – Jewish and other – to learn how the rich tapestry of custom, tradition and law weaves its way through Jewish life.

selves in a bright red and blue kitchen, the colours clearly demarcating meat from milk.

"Would you like to braid some challah?" came a voice from the kitchen. Our timing was impeccable that day. I'd arrived with my twin girls minutes after a local school group had left the building, and the kitchen was still bustling with activity. In no time, my girls were seated at the table learning the fine art of challah braiding with freshly baked dough. Using edible ink and rice paper, they stamped the underside of the challah and left it to bake while we explored the room further.

This kitchen is a Jewish educator's dream. At every turn is information explaining the intricacies of kashruth. A shelf painted green contains easily recognizable pareve items and information about the separation of meat and milk accompanies the blue and red shelves, with their corresponding sinks.

Rather than having visitors stare through glass panels at untouchable objects, the children's museum encourages interactivity at every turn, using multimedia screens to depict the lives and studies of Jewish children in Holland.

Max the Matzo leads kids through the imaginary Hollander family's Jewish home through interactive multimedia presentations. The ground floor is a craft room where kids can paint and draw. There are pages printed with Jewish themes for colouring and art supplies neatly stacked, though with strict instructions that they may only be used under supervision. Since there was no supervision on this level, we ascended to the second floor and found our-

The library and study are on level two, with children's books about the holidays in Dutch, English and Hebrew, and an assortment of Judaic literature. In the multimedia presentation on this level, we see the Hollander children learning about loving thy neighbour as thyself. But it's the third-floor music room that really magnetizes the kids.

Press a button in the music room and it fills with the beautiful melodies of Jewish music. The shelves of a large cupboard hold items of significance to the Jewish holidays, and everything is available for touching and playing. There are masks on the Purim shelf, a shofar on the Rosh Hashanah shelf and a seder plate with removable fake food on the Passover shelf. This is a space where kids can refresh their memories of the Jewish festivals and enjoy an environment where nothing is off limits.

While the Jewish Historical Museum next door is full of the sad facts of the Holocaust and the devastating effect it had on Holland's Jewry, there is no sadness in the children's museum. These three levels are about learning through exploration and encouragement, and offer a warm, positive environment that is pure celebration of the joy of being Jewish.

"Until it was renovated three years ago… the former Jewish Historical Museum was not especially attractive to children and not a lot of children visited," Annelie Spaans, the Jewish Historical Museum's spokesperson, says.

Petra Katzenstein, the museum's director, says, "We found our inspiration in the fact that children in the Netherlands are often only informed about Jews in the context of the Second World War. They don't know any Jews, and sometimes believe that they are all dead. So we show the life and daily activities that everyone, whatever their background, can relate to.

"The goal of the children's museum, which opened in December 2006, is to give the visitor the opportunity to get to know Jewish culture and knowledge. That's the best and most positive way to deal with prejudices and fear of what is different."

So if you're passing through Amsterdam with kids in tow, be sure to make this museum – one out of some 51 in the city competing for tourists' attention – a priority.

Berman the broadcaster headlines Winnipeg Y dinner

By HARVEY ROSEN
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — About eight months ago, the "Y" sports dinner committee, now in its 36th year, decided to roll the dice and bring in a legitimate heavy-weight speaker from the United States to headline its 36th fundraising dinner.

They chose broadcaster Chris Berman, ESPN's shining star who was listed on The Sporting News Top 100 Most Powerful People in sports in 1995 and 2005.

With Berman as the draw, the double-Chai dinner proved formidable as a fundraiser, and it was rewarding for the patrons at the Winnipeg Convention Centre. Some 1,305 attended, breaking the record set in 2000, when 1,125 broke bread with legendary boxer Rubin "Hurricane" Carter.

Berman, who has been selected the National Sportscaster of the Year six times and seen his various shows capture nine Emmy Awards, came across as a prototypical good-guy neighbour whom you might casually rehash last night's all-important playoff game with.

I spoke with Berman at a mid-afternoon press conference and learned that he is indeed a "lantzman." He didn't hesitate to elaborate on his ethnicity.

"Yea, mom [Peggy] and dad [Jim], and I are Jewish," he said. "Me being a Christopher is interesting. It makes people scratch their heads, but yeah, my brother and I are [Jewish].

"I may not be the most devout growing up and I'm not Orthodox by any means. We celebrate the main holidays and we light the candles on Chanukah. Passover has always been, like, fun if that's the right word. I mean we're pretty Reform. The answer is, yes, we grew up that way."

Chris also added he is proud to be Jewish and makes a point of always trying to mention a Jewish holiday while on camera.

The affable celebrity and graduate of Brown University who majored in history is married to Kathy Alexinski and has a daughter Meredith, 21, and son Douglas, 20.

As for why there are an inordinate number of Jews in TV and radio, Berman paused for a moment and then offered, "That's a good question. I never gave it much thought. It's hard to characterize a whole group of people whether it's by religion or whatever boundaries, but many Jewish people perhaps are more educated and are very good communicators. To do this job you have to be."

Berman praised his Jewish ESPN colleague, Canadian Dan Shulman, as "being one of the nicest people in the business. He's respectful and very good at what he does. I've known him a long time and I'm happy for his success."

Anyone who watches the 53-year-old Berman's in-studio telecasts or football and baseball broadcasts, knows his calling card is a name-shtick game.

"It all started at university," he told the "Y" audience, "when we'd all joke around with a few beers and dream up names."

Former major league pitcher Bert Blyleven's nickname became "Bert be home Blyleven," and one-time Toronto Blue Jays second baseman Roberto Alomar, was referred to as "Roberto at the Alamo."

His signature comment on baseball telecasts when a batter belts the ball deep is, "Back! Back! Back!" In football, when a receiver latches on to a pass, Berman's trademark description is: "He could go all the way!

"I never did all that stuff to be noticed," he said. "I'm just kind of having fun with sports, despite what revisionist history might say. I have over 1,000 names, and they're not all brilliant by any stretch of the imagination."

As for the current problem of drugs in sports, Berman felt that football is more on top of the situation than the other leagues. "I laud the NFL for being ahead of the game and seemingly being serious about it. Though to say nobody tiptoes around it would be naïve, I guess."

Berman, an original ESPN guy who has been with the American sports network for 29 years, connected with the dinner crowd and at times drew loud applause when he showed his knowledge of the Canadian Football League and expressed empathy with Winnipeggers over the loss of the Jets to Phoenix. The loss to Canada of the Montreal Expos was also, in his opinion, a travesty that might have been averted had Montreal built a cozy 30,000-seat ballpark.

"We at one time had two CFL games a week on ESPN," he said. "I remember when quarterback Warren Moon was playing and starred with Edmonton. That's how I got into it. Any help I can give the game in Canada, I'll give it my best try."

The Cheshire, Conn., resident, who was an avid hockey fan himself of the now defunct Hartford Whalers, imparted: "You had the Jets and we had the Whalers. It was your NHL team that put Winnipeg on the map for me. You should never have lost your team."

The affable Berman also fielded questions from the guests, saying that one of his biggest thrills was covering the game when Orioles' shortstop Cal Ripken broke legendary Lou Gehrig's consecutive games-played streak of 2,130.

One patron asked his opinion of the Buffalo Bills playing a number of games in Toronto. He put thumbs down on the idea. "The NFL has no business spreading into Canada. It's OK to have one game a year, but not to expand into your country" he said to loud applause.

Who is one of Berman's favorite people in the world of sports? Coach Mike Holmgren, who in January decided to come back and coach the NFL's Seattle Seahawks for one more year.

The greatest QB ever in Berman's view was Joe Montana. His favourite interview was the Bears' late star Walter Payton. "I just knew I was around someone special," he said of the Chicago running back.

Berman summed it all up when he spoke from the heart and offered: "I'm just a guy having fun with sports. It isn't brain surgery. You talk with your audience, not at them. Sport is the last melting pot. We can be perfect strangers, yet we can all talk about it with each other, regardless of whom we are. That's how I'd like to be remembered."

Understanding the media

By MICHAEL GORDON

"What do you think of this?" the patient asked.

"This" was another newspaper report on the risks of a standard medication that the patient was using.

It reminded me of the time the potential risks of hormone replacement therapy (HRT) came out in the media. A family member called me in a panic asking what she should do. She had been on HRT for more than four years, but she could not see her doctor for a week and was terrified because the media's report of an increased risk of heart attacks in users of the medication was interpreted by her and many thousand others as a medical emergency – a heart attack waiting to happen.

The Senior Side of Life

The actual results of the study revealed that the incidence of disease per 10,000 women on combined HRT in one year was this: seven more cases of coronary heart disease, 37 in those on combined HRT versus 30 in those on placebo, plus some other negative and some positive outcomes. For many people, the actual difference of 37 compared to 30 cases in 10,000 women per year may have seemed like a lot. But for any individual taking HRT, the increased risk from the medication was very low – much lower than many other risks that individuals routinely take when they drive, for example.

Still, the impact was monumental in terms of general usage, and HRT was discontinued by most physicians for most individuals. Some gradual return of use for short periods for defined symptoms is occurring, but not the large-scale use that was common before the news report.

The question is not whether that report was interpreted fairly by the media. It is whether the almost daily research outcomes for many drugs and foodstuffs should be taken at face value and lead to dramatic or urgent changes in usage. During the past few years, medications such as anti-depressants, major tranquilizers, anti-inflammatory drugs and over the counter cold medications have been reported as potentially dangerous.

Recently the issues of whether coffee and red wine are good for you or bad for you, or both good and bad depending on how much and what kind you consume, have been in the news. These kinds of reports can make the medical profession and the consumer dizzy and often lead to uncertainty and skepticism about medical science and medical recommendations.

What is sometimes forgotten is that medical knowledge is an ever-evolving entity. Throughout human history, medical knowledge developed, often slowly because of the nature of medical science, which has exploded over the last hundred years.

Medical research worldwide constantly addresses questions and challenges today's knowledge to either fortify or refute it. Eventually, what is initially learned gets translated into solid knowledge that ultimately ends up as medical wisdom, as physicians learn how to use the knowledge they have in individual clinical situations . That is part of the art of medicine that is required to balance its scientific base – which is always evolving and changing.

The key for the consumer is to take each media story with a bit of skepticism, and if you or a family member are computer-savvy, to explore in greater depth just what was actually reported and the basis of it, and look for commentaries from reliable sources on what was reported.

You should discuss these findings with your doctor before any drastic changes in treatment are made, because most of the reports, as in the example of HRT, are not urgent in long-term decision-making, but must be considered looking at all the risks and benefits, and then geared to your special situation as an individual.

Dr. Michael Gordon is medical program director of palliative care at Baycrest and co-author with Bart Mindszenthy of Parenting Your Parents (Dundurn Press).

Toward a creative future

Epi on Education

My last column ended with an idea that I have reiterated many times in speeches and articles: the notion that Jewish continuity is not a suitable goal for Jewish education. Of course, our entire tradition of education is about the transmission of knowledge and values from one generation to the next for the purpose of continuity, but we have learned that while continuity is necessary, it is not sufficient.

Seymour Epstein

We could not have overcome the obstacles to our continuing existence as a nation, religion and culture by mere continuation of our elegant traditions. In every generation, there were Jews who broke past paradigms in order to interpret our ways in accord with new conditions.

That revolutionary tradition began with Avraham, the first Jew, and it's no accident that both the biblical narrative and the midrashic overlay portray Avraham as completely breaking with his past, at times not even knowing what the future would bring. While his particular break was critically necessary for us to come into being as a spiritual innovation, his example repeated itself within our tradition again and again.

We found a mystical formula for maintaining the essence of Torah teaching over countless generations and in every location on the planet, while making Jewish life both relevant and liveable in every century and on every continent. And that was accomplished by a creativity that derived from pride and courage: pride in the past and courage to cope with the future.

While this creativity was nurtured and practised within Jewish life, it overflowed into western civilization. There is no doubt that the genius demonstrated by Jewish recipients of the Nobel Prize is mostly a product of our inability to accept a flawed world and our need for cosmic repair.

Our educational programs should be designed – through the teaching of Jewish literacy and the inculcation of deep identity – to engender pride and courage, not for a mere continuation of the past, but for a creative future.

Epi (Seymour Epstein) is the vice-president of Jewish Education at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Book offers Zionists a PR guide

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

You don't need to spend big shekels to make a difference for Israel.

That's the message being preached by Toronto-born lawyer and scribe Haskell Nussbaum in his latest book, 101+ Ways to Help Israel: A Guide To Doing Small Things That Can Make Big Differences.

Released in May by Gavel Press, the 161-page book reads like a handy guidebook that even the most casual supporters of Israel will find useful.

With lots of nifty advice on how to promote, fundraise, talk up and defend the Holy Land, Nussbaum offers a range of suggestions that go from the most minute activity, like putting a pro-Israel bumper sticker on your car, to more grandiose gestures such as organizing an Israel week in your community.

"If everyone who said they supported Israel actually did, Israel's GDP would go up exponentially," Nussbaum told The CJN in an interview last month. "Everybody always talks about 'buying Israel,' but I don't know how many people actually set aside a budget for it, whether it's Israeli chocolate, wine or whatever."

In the introduction to his book, Nussbaum writes: "This is a guide to those of us who don't [currently] live in Israel but who nevertheless care about Israel's long-term survival and want to contribute."

Nussbaum, 39, made aliyah in 1991. He served in the Israel Defence Forces in the Golani Brigades, and said he thought up the book in 2006 while he was living in New York, and watching Israel fight the Second Lebanon War through the media lens.

"I felt very powerless," he said. "I decided to think of ways where people can help. Little things aside from politics, sending cheques or one more letter to the editor."

Although he initially conceived his project as a small booklet, Nussbaum said he spent the next year and a half turning it into a full-blown book.

"I've kept the price really low in order to encourage people to buy it," he said, "because to me it seems that Israel is becoming less relevant to people's lives. I feel like people are less aware of what's going on in Israel and are therefore less connected. Which is why I put so much emphasis in the book on things you can do in your daily life."

In researching for the book, Nussbaum said many people told him they just don't have time to seek out causes for Israel. It's a sentiment he's out to explode.

"I think most people in North America are travelling less to Israel. It's more expensive, news is bad and it creates a disassociation," Nussbaum lamented.

The book therefore lays out some simple concepts and ideas that can be applied in our daily routine without much bother.

And the appendix is an A-to-Z treasure-trove of website addresses on all topics Israel.

Nussbaum said in his youth he was a strong advocate for people making aliyah to help ensure Israel's vitality and future. But he's since softened his stance.

"The older I get, the more I realize that Israel needs its allies around the world," he said, referring mainly to the Diaspora communities who have the power to maintain a positive Israel image in the public eye in their home countries.

And with this book, Nussbaum has given those communities an ample supply of ideas to help the cause.

'A nuclear Iran is intolerable,' Sarkozy tells Knesset

By SARA MILLER
and ARIEL ZILBER
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — French President Nicolas Sarkozy, speaking at a special session of the Knesset in his honour, vowed Monday that France would always defend Israel in the face of any existential threat – a direct reference to Iran and its nuclear program.

"A nuclear Iran is intolerable," Sarkozy said. "Anyone trying to destroy Israel will find France blocking the way."

Then, to applause from the assembled politicians, judicial leaders and dignitaries, Sarkozy declared: "Israel must know it is not alone in the battle against Iran's nuclear ambitions."

Turning to the issue of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, Sarkozy said the recognition of Jerusalem as the capital of both Israel and a Palestinian state is a condition for peace. The Palestinians, he said, "have the right to a viable state of their own." He added that such a state would "ensure Israel's security."

He also called on Israel to end its settlement activity in east Jerusalem and the West Bank, and said there would be "no peace without a solution to the problem of the Palestinian refugees," a key sticking point in negotiations between the two sides. The French leader also urged Israel to "encourage legislation that would entice settlers to leave the West Bank."

He added, however, that "there will be no peace if the Palestinians do not fight terrorism. Each side has to make an effort. Peace is not possible if the Palestinians cannot move about freely."

Sarkozy and his wife, Carla Bruni, were given a red carpet reception as they arrived at the Knesset, and as he stood to speak, the French leader received a standing ovation from lawmakers.

In his address to the plenum of lawmakers in Jerusalem, the first by a French president since François Mitterrand's in 1982, Sarkozy said his nation's connection to the Jewish people had enriched French culture.

Before Sarkozy's speech, Knesset Speaker Dalia Itzik praised him for his "determination" and "courageous reforms," and Opposition Leader Benjamin Netanyahu, called him a "true friend of Israel."

Hezbollah threatens community: report

By PAUL LUNGEN
& ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporters

Canada's Jewish communities awoke to shocking headlines in the wake of an ABC News report last week that suggested Hezbollah sleeper cells were set to strike Israeli and Jewish targets in Ottawa and Toronto.

Citing British, U.S. and Canadian intelligence reports, ABC News on June 19 reported Hezbollah operatives had conducted surveillance on the Israeli Embassy in Ottawa and synagogues in Toronto.

In Ottawa, Melisa Leclerc, a spokesperson for Minister of Public Safety Stockwell Day, told The CJN by e-mail that the ministry acknowledged "Canada is not immune from the threat of terrorism.

"As you can appreciate, the minister cannot comment on operations that Canada's security agencies may or may not be undertaking.

"The government of Canada remains vigilant in our efforts to prevent a terrorist act both at home and abroad," she wrote. "We continue to work very closely with our international partners, including the United States, sharing information and co-operating in the global fight against terrorism.

"Hezbollah is a listed [terrorist] entity. It is a crime to knowingly participate in certain activities of this organization."

Hezbollah, it is believed, acting on Iranian orders, attacked the Israeli embassy in Buenos Aires in 1992 and the city's Jewish community centre in 1994, killing 29 in the first attack and 85 in the second.

The News in Brief

CANADA

NDP Revolt Afoot?

OTTAWA — A revolt appears to be brewing in the New Democratic Party (NDP) over its position on the upcoming followup to the 2001 UN conference against racism, the National Post reported. Some NDP MPs are asking the party to reconsider its call for Canada to attend the controversial gathering. The NDP at first supported the government's decision to boycott the conference, but a few weeks ago, the party reversed itself, saying UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon had given assurances the meeting would not degenerate into an anti-Israel spectacle. The first conference was marked by anti-Israel and anti-Semitic agitation. Canadian Jewish Congress has criticized the NDP for its reversal.

Ghetto Ranks Fourth

MONTREAL — Montreal's McGill Ghetto is the only Canadian locale to be listed among the top 10 Jewish neighbourhoods in North America. It ranked fourth on a list compiled by Jewish Living, a New York-based magazine that's partly funded by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. The magazine said size and amenities weren't its only criteria. "We have identified neighbourhoods across the continent that are growing, rebuilding, reinventing themselves, unifying their disparate parts and exploring our traditions in unconventional ways," it said. The listed areas are Aventura, Fla.; Boulder, Colo.; Lower Merion, Pa.; the McGill Ghetto; North Dallas, Texas; North/West Berkeley, Calif.; Pico-Robertson in Los Angeles; SoHo/TriBeCa in New York City; University City in St. Louis; and West Seattle, Wash.

WORLD

Ex-Winnipegger Weds

LOS ANGELES — A Winnipeg-born woman is part of a lesbian Jewish couple who were among the first to legally marry in California. Diane Olson and Robin Tyler, born Arlene Chernick in Winnipeg, were one of the original plaintiffs to sue the state to legalize same-sex marriage. They wed June 16 under a chupah on the steps of the Beverly Hills Courthouse, the Jewish Journal of Greater Los Angeles reported. The couple, who have been together 14 years, applied annually for a marriage license for eight years. A Reform rabbi officiated. The California Supreme Court legalized gay marriage this month.

Beef Boycott Starts

NEW YORK — An Orthodox social justice group has launched a boycott of the kosher slaughterhouse Agriprocessors. Uri L'tzedek, started by students at the liberal Orthodox rabbinical seminary Yeshivat Chovevei Torah in New York, said it would stop patronizing the Iowa company on June 15 if it didn't adopt ethical labour standards. Some 400 workers were arrested in a raid on the plant last month. Organizers say 1,300 people signed the petition asking the firm to comply with Jewish and U.S. rules on workers' rights.

Pastor Apologizes

SAN ANTONIO — Pastor John Hagee expressed regret for suggesting the Holocaust was God's way of moving Jews to Israel. In a letter to the head of the Anti-Defamation League, Hagee promised to be sensitive and respectful in how he expresses his faith, and in particular to acknowledge human limitations in understanding God's motives. "I regret if my Jewish friends felt any pain as a result [of the comments]," Hagee wrote. "I have always believed that the Holocaust was a tragedy unique in its evil and horror." Hagee, a leading pro-Israel U.S. evangelical leader, has come under fire for offensive comments. Republican presidential nominee John McCain has repudiated Hagee for his Shoah comments.

Germany Seeks Demanjuk's Extradition

CLEVELAND — Germany is seeking the extradition of Nazi war criminal John Demjanjuk to stand trial.

Germany wants to prosecute Demjanjuk, 88, of suburban Cleveland, on charges he took part in killing Jewish prisoners at the Sobibor death camp. German authorities said he could be extradited by the end of 2008. Last month, the U.S. Supreme Court declined to hear his appeal of a 2005 deportation order, paving the way for his extradition.

Demjanjuk, a retired autoworker, is number 2 on the Simon Wiesenthal Center's list of most-wanted Nazi war criminals. The Israeli Supreme Court revoked his death sentence in 1988 when questions were raised about his identity as the notorious "Ivan the Terrible."

The news that Demjanjuk might face deportation came the same week as the U.S. Board of Immigration Appeals upheld a deportation order for another alleged war criminal, Josias Kumpf of Wisconsin, whose citizenship was revoked in 2003. U.S. authorities want to deport him to Germany, Austria or Serbia.

Meanwhile, an alleged Nazi war criminal living in Austria was spotted recently among fans of a soccer game in the city of Klagenfurt. Milivoj Asner, 95, a Croatia native, had avoided standing trial because of a diagnosis of dementia. He is alleged to have co-ordinated the deportation of Jews and Gypsies to a fascist camp in occupied Croatia. Asner has told reporters that he would welcome the chance to clear his name in court. Asner is number 4 on the Wiesenthal Center's most-wanted list.

Rabbi Still In Brazil

SAU PAULO — An Israeli rabbi who fled to Brazil amid child-abuse allegations is fighting extradition to Israel. Ha'aretz quoted Rabbi Elior Chen's Israeli lawyer last week as saying he denies charges that he told followers to abuse their children. He had just visited the rabbi in Brazil. Rabbi Chen, 29, was originally said to have fled to Canada.

Suicide bombing bill passes Senate

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A private member's bill that would make suicide bombing an explicit Criminal Code offence has passed the Senate and is making its way to the House of Commons.

The Senate last week unanimously approved Bill S-210, sponsored by Senator Jerry Grafstein, four years after it was first introduced. Grafstein said he hopes all parties in the House will line up behind the bill and grant it quick passage.

He has already received the support of his own Liberal party, and the governing Conservatives have also indicated they back the bill. Grafstein said he will lobby colleagues from the New Democratic Party and the Bloc Québécois for their support.

Sen. Jerry Grafstein

The one-paragraph bill, which was held up after the Justice Department voiced concerns that it was redundant and would complicate prosecutions, says simply, "suicide bombing comes within… the definition [of] terrorist activity."

Grafstein said he hopes the NDP will line up behind the bill, given that their former leader, Ed Broadbent, is part of list of prominent Canadians who endorse it. The group Canadians Against Suicide Bombing (CANASB) has rallied the support of dozens of well-known figures for the bill. Among them are former prime ministers Jean Chrétien, Kim Campbell and John Turner, one-time cabinet ministers Marc Lalonde and Flora MacDonald, Liberal MP Bob Rae and former Ontario premier David Peterson, plus academics, religious leaders and other well-known Canadians.

"Rarely in the history of Parliament has such a distinguished list of Canadians supported a private member's bill," Grafstein said.

Grafstein said the bill was thoroughly studied at committee stage in the Senate and could be passed by the House in only a couple of days. Passage by a respected country like Canada will have international repercussions. It could lead to changes to international treaties and conventions to include suicide bombing as a criminal act, he continued.

At the local level, it would criminalize those who aid and abet in suicide bombings, reaching even websites "that demonstrate how to make suicide bombs."

Jason Kenney, secretary of state for Multiculturalism and Canadian Identity, said that "the government is supporting the bill," but he would not say whether that would translate into quick passage. All members of the cabinet will back the bill, but backbenchers will be given a free vote, he said.

"I think the bill is largely symbolic," he said. "Bombings of any kind are illegal domestically and in international law. We think there is a useful symbolic point in the bill and we endorse it."

Kenney said while the Conservative government has taken steps to address terrorism – by cutting aid to Hamas, listing Hezbollah as a terrorist organization and adding the Tamil Tigers to the list of banned groups – previous Liberal governments "failed" to do so.

Reuben Bromstein, a retired judge who serves as CANASB president, said passage of the bill in the House would make Canada the first country to explicitly criminalize suicide bombing. Canada could serve as a model for other states considering enacting domestic law to address the issue, and it would have an educative effect, demonstrating Canadian "society's disapproval of the act in question."

"It would be a signal that we're the first country to do it. It's a Canadian invention that Grafstein has put in," he said.

Political unreality in Israel

From the editor's desk

Israel is a land of many splendours and unceasing marvels. First-time tourists or veteran visitors will never lack for meaningful ways to spend their time or breathtaking sights to inspire their souls.

But it is also a land of intense emotion and constant political quarrels.

The emotion and the quarrelling were much in evidence last week in newspapers, radio talk shows, TV broadcasts, coffee houses, taxicabs and probably many living rooms, as a result of the ceasefire that took effect Thursday morning between Israel and Hamas.

As of this writing, the ceasefire has held for four days.

A letter written by Gilad Schalit to his family was just released to a pitying Israeli public.

The young soldier was kidnapped two years ago by pitiless Hamas terrorists. His release was not part of the arrangement negotiated by the Egyptian mediators on behalf of Israel. It is to be negotiated at a later stage of the process. His parents have now initiated legal proceedings against the government for its failure to have included release terms for their son as part of the initial phase of the arrangement with Hamas.

The desperation and incongruity of the family's suing the government were but a small part, however, of the political storm that broke over the country.

The clouds burst because of the ceasefire itself. Or so it seemed to this observer, who, after an admittedly non-scientific, random sampling of opinion "on the street" and in various taxicabs, could find no one who supported the decision to enter into the ceasefire.

To be sure, the people of Israel want the communities around Gaza to live in peace and quiet. They want Gilad Schalit to be home with his parents. But they recoiled at the idea of cutting a deal with Hamas.

The disclaimer by Prime Minister Ehud Olmert that his government had not negotiated with Hamas, but rather with Egypt, was utterly unconvincing to mainstreet Israel. The party at the other end of the mutual commitments was Hamas, still openly striving for Israel's destruction, still receiving funds and training from Iran, still cruelly manipulating the nation's emotions surrounding abducted Schalit.

The criticisms openly and quite vociferously levelled against the ceasefire were the following:

- The government has stripped itself of any credibility in purporting never to deal with Hamas and other terrorist groups.
- The government has effectively enabled the Palestinian Authority to enter discussions with Hamas.
- The government has elevated Hamas' stature in the eyes of the Arab world.
- The government has demonstrated Israel's weakness to the Arab world. With all its military might, Israel has been incapable – or unwilling, some people said – to repatriate Gilad Schalit, let alone bring an end to the rocketfire on Sderot, Ashkelon and environs.

The most common complaint about the ceasefire, however, was that the government did not have the moral authority to negotiate it. More specifically, people said, Olmert no longer has that moral authority. He may technically still wield the legal authority of his office, but any claim to the moral authority of the position has been spent.

The large majority of the public has no confidence in Olmert. The allegations against him that he received cash-stuffed envelopes from Morris Talansky were the final straw that toppled the heap of his credibility.

The Talansky accusations were so shocking that one wiseacre, though not an Olmert supporter, suggested that the prime minister had been targeted by a group of right-wing religious leaders in the United States who wished to bring about his demise and thus prevent any territorial concessions to the Palestinians. According to his theory, Talansky was their foil.

But even this conspiratorial exculpation of Olmert did not translate into sympathy for the prime minister.

Olmert has not been found guilty in respect of any of the five investigations undertaken against him. But the authority of his office is no longer able to save his reputation, which to most Israelis, is one of self-absorption and corruption.

Olmert has set a busy course for himself recently. Last month, he launched Turkish-mediated peace talks with Syria. He has expressed an interest in holding direct negotiations with Syria, but Syrian President Bashar Assad refuses. Rumours persist that Olmert might meet with Assad next month in France. Last week he expressed his willingness to open diplomatic channels with Lebanon as well.

He was slated to visit Egypt this week to talk with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak primarily, although not exclusively, about Gilad Schalit.

Some pundits have suggested that Olmert's multi-fronted overtures are a sort of smokescreen for earnest preparations being made at the moment by the Israel Defence Forces for a strike against Iran should international diplomatic efforts fail to stop Tehran's development of nuclear weapons capability. Not too many Israelis "on the street," however, believe this.

Olmert's schedule seems only to irritate most Israelis more. They complain of a sense of unreality in the country's politics. There is a profound disconnect between the government's policies and the will of the majority of the people, that we were told time and again, the prime minister ignores. If he continues to do so, will it be at his or the country's peril?

OPERATION PEACE FOR GALILEE

In June 1982, Israel sent troops across the Lebanese border to root out PLO terrorists and push them at least 40 kilometres north, out of rocket range of northern Israel. The effort was dubbed Operation Peace for Galilee. The war generated misgivings among many Israelis and spawned the Peace Now movement. Pictured are Israel's then-prime minister Menachem Begin, left, embracing Maj. Sa'ad Haddad of the South (Free) Lebanese Army, which supported Israel's incursion into Lebanon, and Ariel Sharon, right, Israel's minister of defence. Only 18 years later, in 2000, on the orders of then-prime minister Ehud Barak, did the last Israeli soldier leave Lebanon.

Canadian Jewish Congress downplayed the report

Hundreds more were wounded in both bombings. Hezbollah has been placed on a list of banned terrorist organizations by the government of Canada, which sided with Israel in its 2006 war with the Lebanon-based terror group.

In Ottawa, Israeli embassy spokesperson Orit Kremer said, "We're not commenting on what is a sensitive security matter."

Canadian Jewish Congress, however, quickly downplayed the report.

Bernie Farber, CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress, told The CJN he had assured communal leadership there was nothing to panic about.

"We have been in touch with the highest security authorities in Canada, including local and regional police chiefs, anti-terrorism units, CSIS, RCMP, all of whom assured us that there's no truth to the report itself," he said.

Farber insisted the report was merely a rehash of old news by ABC, an American television network, relating to chatter that was picked up in mid-February after Imad Mugniyah – a notorious senior Hezbollah official – was assassinated in Damascus. At the time, Hezbollah immediately blamed Mossad, though Israel denied any responsibility for the killing.

At Mugniyah's funeral, Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah appeared via video link and during his eulogy declared, "Zionists, if you want an open war, let it be an open war anywhere."

When asked specifically if Toronto's Jewish community needs to worry about going to shul, Farber stated "absolutely not."

John Thompson, president of the Mackenzie Institute, a non-profit organization that studies political instability and terrorism, said Hezbollah poses "a real threat."

"Hezbollah is on Iran's leash, and Iran has been cruising for trouble for a few years. When Iran is locked within a major conflict with Israel and the United States, they activate [sleeper] cells."

"The threat to the Jewish community is coming. The threat to the Jewish community is real."

Asked why Canadian Jews might be on terrorists' hit list, Thompson said that the way to show "leadership in the Middle East is by demonstrating how dangerous you are to the world's Jewish community." He advised Canadian Jews to continue on their normal routines, but to "pay more attention to security and take security seriously."

David Harris, president of Democracy House, a Canadian think-tank, said security experts "know Canada is heavily infiltrated by Hezbollah and fellow travellers, and their targets will include Canadians in general and Jews in particular."

Harris said he had no specific information about the latest threat reports. "All I can say is to express my surprise and dismay that any of this should be considered a surprising kind of warning."

Even if the specific reports proves to be "inaccurate, it would be an inaccurate report with a heavy factual basis," he said.

"The Jewish and Canadian communities should be on the alert, because the enemy is among us."

"The very fact you have a presence of people dedicated to Hezbollah tells us you have people who, by and large, could be activated at any moment. Our peace and security are enjoyed with the sufferance of Hezbollah."

Harris said Islamic extremists are preoccupied with Jews, and "they focus on demonizing the Jews. It's no mistake it's been describe as a Nazi-like organization."

A third terrorism expert took a dissenting view. Speaking on CTV, Alan Bell, president of the security firm Globe Risk Holdings, said Hezbollah has no reason to attack in Canada. Hezbollah's presence in Canada is limited to fundraising, recruitment, document forgery and procuring equipment. An attack within Canada would likely alienate the group's supporters, he said.

Bernie Farber

He questioned the origin of the story. "If CSIS [Canada's security agency] picked up these guys coming from the Middle East and they're under surveillance, why would a reporter in the United States be given that information?" he asked.

Surveillance of Hezbollah suspects would continue secretly, "and this individual or these individuals would be being monitored at this particular moment."

Bell said Hezbollah would be unlikely to attack in the United States, as that would provide justification for an American attack on Iran.

Analyzing the ABC report, Farber said, "There was certainly chatter, which was normal, after [the Mugniyah assassination]. Congress was aware of this, because [Canada's] security people make us aware of these things. We were also aware of the fact that the proper security forces were investigating the chatter and came back to us to assure us that it was only chatter. They said there was nothing that led them to believe that there was any specific threat against the Jewish community.

"What ABC seems to have done is to have picked up an old story and regurgitated it again, without really following through properly.

"All that said, back in February we raised a community alert in relation to the assassination of Mugniyah. Yesterday, to be prudent, we sent out a second alert to Jewish communal institutions. This second alert was more because when things like this come into the newspapers... you never know what that can trigger. There are crazies out there. It's better for us to be safe than sorry," Farber said.

"This is not an alarmist alert. It's just based on the fact that we know this information has been proven wrong. Nonetheless, given the fact that it's out in the public domain, people should be aware of it."

B'nai Brith Canada, meanwhile, issued a statement acknowledging that while "officials agree that there is no specific threat at present, [B'nai Brith] has warned it is crucial that continued vigilance be maintained given the established presence of Hezbollah in our midst."

B'nai Brith reminded institutions in the Jewish community that it is essential that security protocols be reviewed and that vigilance be maintained as a top priority. Equally imperative is the need to inform members of the Jewish community of the ongoing need to be "aware and prepared."

Air Canada puts Tel Aviv back on the map

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Air Canada has asked one of its suppliers to correct "an inadvertent" omission that excluded Tel Aviv on its inflight seat-back videos.

Air Canada made the request after some of its customers complained that the Israeli destination was missing from the moving-map videos.

Peter Fitzpatrick, a spokesperson for the airline, said "we have talked to the supplier and they are in the process of redoing the map."

The map can be accessed by passengers on a television monitor located in the back of the seat in front of them. Television programs, movies and sporting events can also be viewed on the small screens.

Fitzpatrick said the supplier had been asked to match all the destinations on the video map with those in the airline's enRoute magazine, which includes Tel Aviv. The supplier must now re-do all the software in the fleet, he said.

The issue created a stir in France, where the Union des Patrons et des Professionels Juifs de France, a Jewish organization, reproduced the map. While it showed Israel's borders, no Israeli cities are highlighted, though Gaza, Amman and even Ajlun, Jordan, are present.

Fitzpatrick said the airline "went to our supplier as soon as it was brought to our attention."

Air Canada flies daily from Toronto's Pearson Airport to Israel's Ben-Gurion International Airport during the peak summer months.

Young Russian Jews connect through 'I'm a Jew.ru'

By RITA POLIAKOV
CJN Intern

As a Russian Jew, Suzy Uretzki never felt as if she fit into Toronto's Jewish community.

Then she went to a Shabbaton in Chicago after receiving an e-mail about the event, specifically for Russian Jews, from Hillel.

Impressed by Chicago's well organized Russian Jewish community, Uretzki,19, and her 24-year-old sister, Inna, realized how fragmented Toronto's Russian Jewish population is. Along with Sarit Shor, 24, who they met in Chicago, they decided to start the group "I'm a Jew.ru," so younger members of the community could connect.

Hillel-funded, I'm a Jew.ru is aimed at Russian Jews in Toronto aged 18 to 26. Created a few months ago as a Facebook group, it currently has more than 200 members.

According to Romm Gurel and Lea Soibelman of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS), many members of the Russian Jewish community have not integrated with the Jewish community in Canada. "They don't come to events, they don't feel like they belong," Gurel said.

The younger Uretzki agrees.

"It's discouraging," she said. "[We] don't have a place where [we] can feel comfortable."

While organizations such as Hillel do bring Jews together, both Uretzkis never felt like they fit into these groups.

"I went to university for four years, and I never went to Hillel. [It] wasn't a safe space," the older Uretzki said.

Rotem Stark, a 25-year-old Israeli, is the group's Hillel contact and is helping them organize. She is the founder of Fanan, a Hillel-funded Israeli Jewish group.

"Just because we're all Jewish doesn't mean we have the same culture or background. Jews in Canada have different interests," Stark said.

Olga Safro, a 24-year-old Ryerson University graduate, emigrated from Kazakhstan in 2001.

A member of the I'm a Jew.ru Facebook page, she said Russian organizations in Toronto are "based solely on language. Nobody cares about cultural background. I think that most Jews in Canada are from the same background… It's hard to connect."

Jew.ru's first event, held on June 22, was a meet-and-greet at the Jewish Urban Meeting Place (JUMP). In future, the group may add more of a religious aspect to events, but this could get complicated.

"Judaism [in Canada] is seen as a religion, in Russia it's a culture," Shor said.

Groups for Russian Jews in Toronto are "very religious oriented. If you don't ally with religious beliefs, you're left to find your own [group]," Shor added. "We want to expose them [people] to Judaism, but we're not pursuing them."

From left are Sarit Shor, 24, Suzy Uretzki, 19, and her sister, Inna, 24, who started the group "I'm a Jew.ru" to help the Russian Jewish population in Toronto connect.

The Uretzki sisters and Shor are considering modelling an event after the Shabbaton they attended in Chicago.

"We had a Shabbat dinner with a rabbi. It wasn't too religious. [We were] getting exposed to topics in a completely different way. It was social and fun. Basic religious aspects were there to expose [guests] very slowly," Shor said.

Jew.ru's mandate is to recognize both the Russian and Jewish aspects of their members' identities.

"The two aren't exclusive, you can't separate being Russian and Jewish," Suzy Uretzki said. "I'm Russian Jewish, it's who I am."

Sarkozy's friendship

It has been more than 25 years since the president of France addressed the Knesset of Israel. Francois Mitterrand did so in 1982. Current French President Nicolas Sarkozy did so this week, on Monday. It is no wonder, therefore, that the government of Israel treated the visit by the French president and his wife, Carla Bruni, as a moment of high protocol and circumstance. Indeed, the French president himself regarded the occasion as one laden with significant bilateral weight. The entourage that travelled with Sarkozy to Israel included seven cabinet ministers, 80 business people, 40 senior members of the French Jewish community and some 100 reporters.

Ever since former French president Charles DeGaulle embargoed the delivery of French-built missile boats to Israel – for which Israel had already paid – and the subsequent clandestine retrieval of the boats by Israeli commandos, relations between the two states had not risen beyond cool or polite. At times the policies of the French government in the Arab-Israeli dispute have been quite inimical, and even hostile, to the Jewish state.

But Sarkozy seems to have been cut from different tricolore cloth than that of his predecessors. He seems genuinely concerned for the future well-being and security of the Jewish state. And he has never missed an opportunity, either in France or abroad, to make that very point, even though it is decidedly unwise for him to do so from a domestic political point of view, since more than six million Muslims and barely more than half a million Jews live in France. Indeed, it cannot have been a coincidence that on the eve of Sarkozy's visit to Israel, a 17-year-old boy wearing a kippah was beaten over the head with metal bars in eastern Paris in what was described as "an anti-Semitic act."

"I have always been and would always be a friend of Israel," Sarkozy told the welcoming assembly at Ben-Gurion Airport.

"A nuclear Iran is intolerable," he later told the Knesset. "Anyone trying to destroy Israel will find France blocking the way."

Given that Israeli relations with the EU were officially upgraded last week; that Europe will play an increasingly pivotal role in the international effort to stop the development of an Iranian nuclear weapon; and that the uncertainty surrounding the presidential election in the United States will inevitably create a perceived vacuum of western power and leadership, which could embolden Middle Eastern Islamist terrorists, Sarkozy's promise will become ever more important to Israel and the region.

Sarkozy's friendship for Israel does not ensure agreement with Israel in all aspects of the Jewish state's conflict with the Palestinians and other Arab forces in the region.

But if he can influence and co-ordinate collective action with his counterparts in Germany and Great Britain, his promise will be akin to a beacon in what Israelis and most Jews perceive will be a dark time ahead and sole existential struggle in the face of grave, ultimate danger.

Yasser Arafat's leadership of the PLO was under siege in an intense and often violent revolt by some in his own organization, aided by Syria and Libya. Syrian leaders said they had no desire to depose Arafat, just to stop what they called his willingness to discuss peace with Israel.

Imperfections of Roosevelt, Churchill

Reviewer Rabbi Bernard Baskin does not adequately deal with the critical issues the book Human Smoke touches on ("Revelatory revisionist history," CJN, June 12). The book deserves much more serious questioning and criticism.

Yes, American president Franklin D. Roosevelt was far from being a saintly, or even a fair person, when it came to the Jews and reacting in a humane way to the subhuman treatment of our people by Adolf Hitler and his friends. Yes, British prime minister Winston Churchill was certainly not a pacifist and ultimately contributed to the death of many German civilians.

However, it is clear from Nazi plans that if Britain had not declared war on Germany for its attack on Poland, Germany would have continued the blitzkrieg war it had begun on its neighbours. There simply cannot be any doubt that the Nazis' twin aims were conquest and elimination of "undesirables."

JEWISH COMMUNITY TURF WAR
LET'S SEE HOW YOU LIKE SLEEPING WITH THE GEFILTE FISHES WHEN WE THROW YOU INTO THE LAKE WEARING CHOLENT SHOES

Human beings have a right, and even an obligation, to defend themselves against aggression and violence. Even imperfect humans have a right to resist the efforts of those vicious people who seek to loot and kill them. Examining the imperfections of Roosevelt and Churchill simply obscures the central issue of World War II.

Ceding the Golan

Jordy Cummings gravely misunderstands the nature of Israel's situation ("Supports talks with Syria, CJN letters, June 19). There is no way that ceding the Golan Heights to Syria will ease tension or reduce Israel's precarious predicament in the Middle East. Why should land be exchanged for peace? If Syria or any other countries should desire peace, all they need do is make a sincere promise to prevent ill will and hateful actions against Israel. Syria invaded Israel several times and is responsible for the deaths of many Israeli soldiers and civilians. Why should such a large country as Syria have the right to try and take land away from a diminutive Israel? Why should Israel cede strategic land that helps guarantee its security? It is my sincere opinion that people who can do nothing but critique Israel are indeed "anti-Semitic," whether they are Jews or not. I fully endorse a balanced approach to controversial issues, but I do find fault with those who are arrogant enough to chastise Israel at the expense of its own security and well-being.

Rabbi Heschel and the Berrigans

In his highly laudatory review of the latest volume of the biography of the late Rabbi Abraham Heschel ("Heschel's voice still speaks," CJN Perspectives, June 5), Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, rightly praises Rabbi Heschel for his academic and rabbinical work, as well as for his involvement in social causes and anti-war activities.

I was surprised, however, at the lack of any mention of Rabbi Heschel's controversial and unwise connections to some openly anti-Semitic and virulently anti-Israel activists, such as Philip Berrigan and Rev. Daniel Berrigan, whom Heschel considered to be his "soul-brothers." For years, these Catholic priests issued inflammatory and vicious attacks against the Jewish state, such as the description of Israel by Rev. Daniel Berrigan in front of a group of Arab university graduates, as "a criminal Jewish community."

Historian Rabbi Arthur Hertzberg, a great leader of the American Jewish community, himself a leading promoter of human rights and peace with the Palestinians, unmasked the true meaning of the Berrigans' hate for Israel, by explaining that "underneath the language of the new left, it is the old-fashioned theological anti-Semitism." Unfortunately, Rabbi Heschel, who had witnessed himself how millions of Jews were slaughtered while so-called friends stood silent or even participated in atrocities, decided to ignore the dark, anti-Semitic side of people such as the Berrigans and continued to befriend and support them, uncritically, until his last days.

In today's world, we can still observe some of our brethren, rabbis, writers, academics, a few perhaps motivated by genuine social concerns, making common cause with the sworn enemies of Israel. While we should praise and cherish Heschel's social legacy and rabbinical teachings, it would be prudent to remember his apparent blindness toward evil against our own people and to be vigilant not to repeat his naivete.

Jewish prayer at Queen's Park

Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty says that adding multicultural prayers at the legislature reflects the "respectful" Ontario we have built together. ("Jewish prayer to be part of Queen's Park rituals," CJN, June 19). It is a decent symbolic gesture, but it is deeply at odds with Ontario's institutionalized disrespect of small, non-Catholic religious minorities who must pay to provide their children with a faith-based education that more than 600,000 Catholic children receive from their tax dollars.

Truce with Hamas is a victory for Iran

By MICHAEL B. OREN

Proponents of an Israeli-Palestinian accord are praising the ceasefire between Israel and Hamas that went into effect June 19. Yet even if the agreement suspends violence temporarily – though dozens of Hamas rockets struck Israel the day before – it represents a historic accomplishment for the jihadist forces most opposed to peace, and defeat for the Palestinians who might still have been Israel's partners.

The roots of this tragedy go back to the summer of 2005 and the Israeli withdrawal from Gaza. The evacuation, intended to free Israel of Gaza's political and strategic burden, was hailed as a victory by Palestinian terrorist groups, above all Hamas.

Hamas proceeded to fire some 1,000 rocket and mortar shells into Israel. Six months later, Hamas gunmen, taking advantage of an earlier ceasefire, infiltrated Israel, killed two soldiers, and captured Cpl. Gilad Schalit.

Hamas' audacity spurred Hezbollah to mount a similar ambush against Israelis patrolling the Lebanese border, triggering a war in which Israel was once again humbled. Hamas now felt sufficiently emboldened to overthrow Gaza's Fatah-led government, and to declare itself regnant in the strip. Subsequently, Hamas launched thousands more rocket and mortar salvos against Israel, rendering parts of the country nearly uninhabitable.

In response, Israel Defence Forces (IDF) air strikes and limited ground incursions killed hundreds of armed Palestinians in Gaza, and Israel earned international censure for collateral civilian deaths and "disproportionate" tactics. Israel also imposed a land and sea blockade of Gaza, strictly controlling its supply of vital commodities such as a gasoline. But the policy enabled Hamas to hoard the fuel and declare a humanitarian crisis.

Israel never mounted the rolling, multi-month operation that the IDF had planned. Traumatized by his abortive performance in the Lebanon War and hobbled by financial scandals, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert balked at a military engagement liable to result in incalculable casualties and United Nations condemnations, but unlikely to halt Hamas aggression.

Sderot residents seek shelter after a Kassam rocket attack.

Like Hezbollah in 2006, Hamas won because it did not lose. Its leaders still walked Gaza's streets freely while children in Sderot and other Israeli border towns cowered in bomb shelters. Like Hezbollah, which recently wrested unprecedented powers from the Lebanese parliament, Hamas parlayed its military success into political capital.

The European Parliament demanded the immediate lifting of the Gaza blockade, and France initiated secret contacts with Hamas officials. A minister from the Israeli Labor Party, Ami Ayalon, went a step further by calling for Hamas' inclusion in peace talks – a recommendation soon echoed by former U.S. president Jimmy Carter and the New York Times.

One of Sderot's younger residents after an attack by Hamas.

The Egyptian-brokered ceasefire yields Hamas greater benefits than it might have obtained in direct negotiations. In exchange for giving its word to halt rocket attacks and weapons smuggling, Hamas receives the right to monitor the main border crossings into Gaza and to enforce a truce in the West Bank, where Fatah retains formal control.

If quiet is maintained, then Israel will be required to accept a ceasefire in the West Bank as well. The blockade will be incrementally lifted, while Schalit remains in captivity. Hamas can regroup and re-arm.

The Olmert government will have to go to vast lengths to portray this arrangement as anything other than a strategic and moral defeat. Hamas initiated a vicious war against Israel, destroyed and disrupted myriad Israeli lives, and has been rewarded with economic salvation and international prestige.

Tellingly, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, who once declared Hamas illegal, will soon travel to Gaza for reconciliation talks. Abbas' move signifies the degree to which Hamas, with Israel's help, now dominates Palestinian politics. It testifies, moreover, to another Iranian triumph.

As the primary sponsor of Hamas, Iran is the ceasefire's ultimate beneficiary. Having already surrounded Israel on three of its borders – Gaza, Lebanon and Syria – Iran is poised to penetrate the West Bank. By activating these fronts, Tehran can divert attention from its nuclear program and block any diplomatic efforts to stop it.

The advocates of peace between Israelis and Palestinians should recognize that fact when applauding quiet at any price. The cost of this truce may well be war.

This calm is fragile and liable to be short-lived

Excerpts from a June 16 statement in Jerusalem by Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert at the Sheatufim Conference on Philanthropy and Civil Society, during which he referred to the situation in Gaza:

A few weeks ago, I said that… I intended to exhaust my full responsibility as prime minister and my obligation to bring about quiet and security for the residents of the south.

I reiterated that this would happen one way or another. The terrorist organizations that control the Gaza Strip have been under continuous military and economic pressure in recent months as a result of the government's policies. It was they who sought the calm.

In recent weeks, the government has held a dialogue with Egypt, in the framework of which the Egyptians committed themselves to bringing about a calm on the ground. In this context, I would like to take the opportunity to thank the Egyptian government and President Hosni Mubarak – Israel's most important partner in the efforts to create calm, stability and a continuity of peace in the Middle East – and his right-hand man, Gen. Omar Suleiman.

I would like to emphasize and make it clear that we did not hold – and I will not hold – negotiations with any terrorist organization. We have no illusions. This calm is fragile and is liable to be short-lived. Hamas and the other terrorist organizations have not changed and have not become patrons of peace. These are contemptible and bloodthirsty terrorists. Even today, they are doing everything they can to harm innocent Israeli civilians.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert

I would like to make it clear that Hamas is [in charge] in the Gaza Strip and it will bear the responsibility for any violation of the quiet. If the firing and terrorist actions continue, Israel will be compelled to act in order to halt the threat against its citizens.

Regarding Cpl. Gilad Schalit, his release is an inseparable part of the understandings regarding the terms of the calm. Next week will mark two years since Gilad's abduction. His photograph is in my office, in front of me. I see his eyes every day, and I make an effort every day so that it will be possible to return Gilad to his parents, Noam and Aviva, and to the rest of his family, safe and sound. I have told them more than once that aside from them, there is no one in the world who wishes for Gilad Schalit's return home, safe and sound, more than I.

I believe that as part of the understandings that facilitated the start of the calm, that I hope that we will also be able to move forward on Gilad Schalit's return home.

As we approach the implementation of this calm, we are aware and alert. Alongside our willingness to give this step a chance, the cabinet has decided to instruct Defense Minister Ehud Barak and the security forces to be ready for any other action that may be required, on a short timetable, should it become clear that this effort that the State of Israel has made in order avoid a violent confrontation and direct friction with the Palestinians is unsuccessful.

I very much hope that it succeeds. I believe that there will be quiet in the south of the country. From here, I warmly embrace all the residents of the south who, with great courage and strength, have faced this daily threat throughout these very long months and years. It is they who, in the end, have enabled the government to act in the responsible, balanced and correct way that, I believe, it has, even in this sensitive, complicated and delicate situation.

Healed but not cured

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

She could not be cured. As a result of contracting polio as a child, she has become more and more incapacitated, and in the last few years, she has been confined to a wheelchair. She has also had other serious illnesses.

But she is healing. Her spirit is whole and as vibrant as ever. There is hardly a play she doesn't see or a cultural event she doesn't attend. She sees most of the movies at the annual Toronto International Film Festival.

The forceful person that she is has turned her into a staunch advocate for the rights of the disabled. For years, she appeared on a television program devoted to the subject. She still writes letters to newspapers if she feels that the disabled have been misrepresented or discriminated against.

When in the 1990s a few social workers, therapists and rabbis came together to form what nowadays is called the Toronto Jewish Healing Project, it was quite obvious that it would only get off the ground if she took it in hand. She did. As a result, for more than a decade now, many members of the Jewish community have been helped to cope with their medical and psychological burdens through Jewish teachings.

Through conferences, lectures and study sessions, the project has attracted professionals in the field. Some pay greater attention nowadays to the spiritual needs of their patients. The groups the project runs and the healing services it arranges have strengthened many individuals in the knowledge that even if you can't be cured, you can be healed.

Though she had been the director of social work at Baycrest in Toronto until her retirement, and despite her very Jewish New York upbringing, it was thanks to the Healing Project that she herself discovered the spiritual roots of Judaism. She now regularly attends services and study groups at Holy Blossom Temple in Toronto and for several years was a formidable presence on its board. Her continued counsel brings strength and comfort to many members of the congregation. At age 75, she celebrated her bat mitzvah.

Recently, in line with similar agencies across North America, Toronto's Jewish Family and Child Service has taken over the administration of the Healing Project, thus recognizing the contribution it is making to the welfare of members of our community. Together with her team of volunteers, she will continue to be involved, but the heavy burden of organization has been lifted from her shoulders.

I cannot think of a woman more deserving of the epithet eshet chayil, a woman of valour. She is a role model and an inspiration to us all. Toronto Jewry owes her an enormous debt of gratitude.

Early next month, Etta Ginsberg McEwan will be 82. Bis hundert un tsvantsig.

Pearls of wisdom for the Jewish class of 2008

Mark Masters in Ottawa

The Jewish students who have graduated this spring are an incredibly important part of our community. We are the wave of young leaders who will strengthen Canada's Jewish community and ensure that it continues to thrive.

So, while listening to the honorary degree recipient address my graduating class this June at Carleton University, my mind began to wander. I started putting together my own speech, one that, to me at least, was more important than any words spoken at my own graduation ceremony…

To the class of Jewish graduating students 2008: Mazel tov! We did it.

Being a Jewish student on a university campus these days brings with it a set of challenges on top of those faced by the average student. But as we clutch our newly earned degrees, we must learn from the challenges we confronted.

First and foremost, we must not abandon our roots. It's important to stay in touch with those running your local Hillel and offer to help them.

One of the greatest flaws that student organizations have is a lack of institutional memory. The turnover rate of four years ensures that such groups are almost always in a state of flux. Students are usually out the door before long-term results can be seen.

There are dedicated staffs that remain with the Hillel organizations nationwide and work to offer continuity, but they far too often become disconnected from the common student's life.

Every graduating student must try to stay in touch with the Jewish community at their university or college, at least in the first few months of the next semester.

As we leave our university life behind, we must pay heed to the diversity we discovered. When I met my roommates in first year, I quickly found out that two of the three had never met a Jewish person before.

We tend to be sheltered in our community sometimes, but we must note that for most people, we remain a mystery and people – whatever they tell you – tend to think the worst of the unknown.

In our post-university lives, we must be goodwill ambassadors for our faith. Wherever we go, we are representing not just ourselves, but Judaism as a whole.

The diversity within our universities is also found within our faith. There is no right way to be Jewish. There is no right amount of time to go to synagogue, and there is no right way to celebrate our festivals.

During my years in university, I attended different synagogues, different Passover seders and different Shabbat dinners. All were unique, and all were an experience unto themselves.

Our community is strongest when we stick together. Student life gets bogged down far too much in infighting and petty squabbling over issues that, when seen in the light of day, don't deserve the attention they get in the heat of the moment.

When I was younger, I use to shun anything that strayed from the customs I grew up with. I have since shed this immaturity.

We need to work together and be together. To reach this goal, we must try to take positions in the Jewish community outside of our professional lives.

My final message to the Jewish graduating class of 2008 is this: family is the most important thing. It's a lesson I'm repeatedly taught in my life. Parents, grandparents, siblings and extended family all exist for us to enjoy and rely on.

My university life would have been far different if I didn't have the unflinching support of my parents, which paved the way for me to succeed.

I know full well that every person has a different relationship with his or her family, but I trust that among the many relatives we all have, there are connections that can be made and Friday nights that can be shared.

And so with that I say good luck to all the graduating Jewish students. I write this not because of some arrogant belief that I know best. I don't write with pretension, but rather from a desire to share, because in these life-affirming moments, a desire to relate to others is a driving force.

This is simply my effort to share what I have learned from my university life.

The more things change…

Jesse Mintz in Halifax

As inevitable as aging is the personal growth that often accompanies it. The casualties of such change, for better or worse, are often one's closest relationships as people mature differently and inevitably grow apart. Knowing this, I have often wondered what exactly the axiom "the more things change, the more they stay the same" means.

University presents a particularly trying time for most relationships. Leaving high school means more then leaving home – for many it also means leaving a social comfort level for the first time.

While I usually revel in the opportunity to write on politics and religion, it often serves me well to reflect on things a little closer to home. In that vein, I write this column on the preservation of friendships over the stretch of time and the expanse of personal differences.

Grade 11 served as a formative year for me. The March of the Living was a tremendously spiritual experience – one that forced me to seriously consider the type of person I was fast becoming and the type of friends I wanted to surround myself with. Shortly following this experience, I joined several of my friends in their weekly Friday night tish – in what lovingly became known as the "Shabbas Crew."

What started as small Friday night gatherings grew with each passing week. Following each of our own family Shabbat meals, we would congregate in an empty basement or backyard, sing niggunim, swap Jewish stories and jokes, and learn a little Torah.

Cellphones occasionally interrupted stories, basic Shabbat rules – especially concerning lights – were often overlooked, and I myself went straight downtown on several occasions. However, Shabbas Crew served as a three-hour Jewish anchor amid whatever else was going on in our lives.

Despite how much I enjoyed these weekly get-togethers, I found myself continually being pulled between two poles. Many Friday nights were divided – the first half spent sitting round a table, laughing and joking and singing with friends, while the second half was often spent running around downtown, trying to catch up with others who had been there all evening.

It's always easier to understand motives in retrospect, and I look back now and ask myself why I acted in such a way. The Shabbas Crew bonded over something concrete – a shared religion and culture that manifested itself in a common experience of kinship, and often a communal bottle of scotch. I looked forward to every Friday night because I always felt at ease around that table. But more so than that, I felt that many of the friends I made, people I had been close to for barely a year, knew me in a different way then others did or could.

All people change over time. While I have spent three years in university in Halifax, some of my friends have made aliyah and are serving in the Israeli army or studying in Israeli yeshivas and seminaries. Others, meanwhile, have gone on to succeed at the disparate university programs they have found themselves in.

I hadn't really given the Shabbas Crew much thought until recently when I was invited to a reunion. As I have grown less connected with Judaism, my relationship with those with whom I bonded over a shared culture has tragically suffered. It is understandable, then, that the thought of revisiting our old stomping grounds made me a little anxious.

I was not apprehensive at the thought of the political debates or religious disagreements that would inevitably arise; likewise, I was not distressed about the awkward glances shot at my nose-ring or the fact that I alone drove on Shabbat. What caused me to be nervous was the possibility that by sitting around that table now as a different person, I would be changing my perception of past gatherings and of the people with whom I shared them.

As I walked up the steps this time around, though, there was no debate within me as to where I wanted to be. Granted, there are few people that I have shared a table with whom my politics clash so vehemently; and little remains of our religious commonalties beyond our attendance at what is now the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto and experiences in Israel together. But sitting together, humming niggunim, talking and sharing stories, transcended any differences of politics and religion.

We only have a couple of months together in the same city until we all return to the rest of our lives – be it in Israel and the army or university programs around the country. Yet it seems that the more things have changed personally for each of us over the years, the more our common relationships have managed to stay the same.

The Kirshner File

The Jew who transformed himself into a Muslim

If there was ever a person who crossed every conceivable cultural and religious boundary and boldly stepped into a brave, new world, no doubt it was Leopold Weiss.

Born in 1900 in the city of Lvov, in what was then the Habsburg empire but is now in Ukraine, he was the descendant of a long line of rabbis.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Proficient in Hebrew and conversant with the Talmud, yet probably influenced by his father's break with Orthodox Judaism, Weiss soon lost interest in religion as he pursued his studies at the University of Vienna.

In 1922, in a detour that radically changed his life, he visited his two uncles in Jerusalem, Dorian Feigenbaum, a psychoanalyst and a pupil of Sigmund Freud, and Aryeh Feigenbaum, an ophthalmologist who founded the first Hebrew medical journal in Palestine.

From Jerusalem, Weiss, a critic of Zionism, freelanced for a German daily, the Frankfurter Zeitung, and these assignments exposed him to Arabs and Islam, to whom and to which he became partial.

Having been commissioned by that newspaper to write more stories, he travelled around the Middle East, fascinated by the region and increasingly engaged by Islam. His first book, The Unromantic Orient, was published in 1924.

Georg Misch

Weiss, who had grown up with the hoary notion that Muslims were barbarians, converted to Islam in 1926, taking the name Mohammad Asad.

Having been excommunicated by his family for leaving Judaism, he spent the next six years in Saudi Arabia, which formed him as a Muslim and where he became a trusted member of the king's inner circle.

Travelling to the Indian sub-continent, he met the poet and philosopher Muhammad Iqbal, who promoted the concept of a liberal, independent Muslim state in India.

Asad, a reformer who believed that "moderation in all its forms is a basic demand of Islam," was one of Iqbal's disciples.

With the partition of India in 1947, Pakistan emerged as a separate nation and he was appointed its first ambassador to the United Nations. By then, he was a renowned scholar, having written Islam at the Crossroads.

When his assignment at the UN ended, due to a personal scandal, Asad wrote The Road to Mecca. Published to critical acclaim in 1954, it was a memoir about his conversion to Islam and a travelogue about his odyssey in the Muslim world.

Settling next in Tangier, Morocco, he produced what is widely considered his magnum opus, The Message of the Qur'an, a translation and commentary of Islam's holiest book.

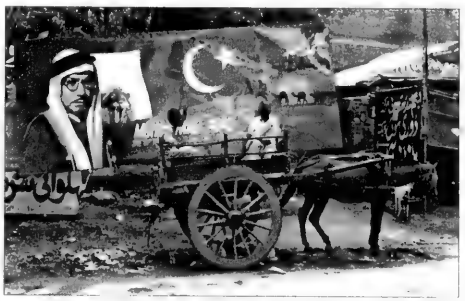
In 1982, he moved to southern Spain, where he died a decade later. He was buried in a Muslim cemetery in Granada.

Asad was an unknown quantity to Georg Misch, an Austrian documentary filmmaker, only a few short years ago. But now, with the release of his latest movie, A Road to Mecca: The Journey of Muhammad Asad, which was screened at the Hot Docs festival in Toronto recently, Misch has become something of an authority on this intriguing figure.

A 38-year-old agnostic raised as a Catholic in Vienna, he first heard about Asad when his girlfriend, Miriam Ali de Unzaga, mentioned him in 2001, shortly after 19 Arab terrorists crashed commercial airliners into the World Trade Center in Manhattan. Unzaga, a practising Ismaili Muslim whose grandfather immigrated to Europe from India decades ago, encountered Asad when she read his translation of the Qur'an while studying anthropology in London. "I didn't realize he was an Austrian, much less originally a Jew, " she said in an interview.

She asked Misch whether, in light of the Twin Towers disaster and the debate it had unleashed in Islam, he would be interested in making a film about Asad. Misch's previous documentaries, Calling Hedy Lamarr and I Am From Nowhere, which dealt with a glamorous Hollywood actress of Austrian origin and the American dream, were far removed from the topic of Islam. Nonetheless, he and Unzaga concluded that a film about Asad's life would be exceedingly timely.

Asad, whom they describe in their film as "Europe's gift to Islam," always sought to bridge the gap between Islam and the West. But after Sept. 11, Asad's brand of conciliatory Islam was all the more relevant. Misch, too, wanted to humanize Islam."The West has a deformed and caricatured image of Islam," he said. "With the Cold War over, Islam replaced communism as the enemy, the other."



Muhammad Asad, as seen on a poster in Pakistan

Unzaga, the scriptwriter of A Road to Mecca, was animated by the same objective, having been annoyed by the West's perception of Islam as a fanatical faith. An "enlightened Muslim," in Misch's words, she is an acolyte of the Aga Khan, the leader of the world's approximately 15 million Ismaili Muslims. "Having also been persecuted, we have a lot in common with Jews," she said.

To Misch, Asad is not merely "a hippie who did a bit of Islam lite." As he put it, "Asad really transformed himself. He became an Arab, though he never forgot or denied his Jewishness." Asked if he may have been a self-hating Jew, Misch said, "He never hated himself. He was a lost Jew who found a new direction. His son, Talal, told us he never had a bad thing to say about Jews." And he wept upon learning that his relatives had been murdered in the Holocaust.

According to Misch, Asad was drawn to Islam for intellectual reasons. "He had a logical approach. He liked the universality of Islam and disliked the materialism and hedonism of the West." A Road to Mecca, however, says that Asad adopted Islam as an answer to his "spiritual emptiness."

Asad himself observed: "Islam appears to me like a perfect work of architecture. All its parts are harmoniously conceived to complement and support each other. Nothing is superfluous and nothing [is] lacking; and the result is a structure of absolute balance and solid composure."

If Asad had been alive today, Misch speculated, he would have denounced Islamic extremism and terrorism. "He completely opposed violence. Militant Islam was a source of immense disappointment to him."

Asad's jaundiced view of Zionism was established during his sojourn in Palestine. "I conceived from the outset a strong objection to Zionism," Asad wrote. "I considered it immoral that [Jewish] immigrants, assisted by a foreign great power, should come from abroad with the avowed intention of attaining a majority in the country and thus to dispossess the people whose country it had been since time immemorial."

Middle East specialist Martin Kramer says that Asad, while a fervent anti-Zionist until his death, maintained contact with Aryeh Feigenbaum's daughter, Hemdah, and even attended her son's bar mitzvah in New York City. "Asad looked at the Arab-Israeli conflict from a political standpoint," Misch said.

In the Muslim world today, Asad is known and revered. In Pakistan, his books are widely available in bookshops, and in Nigeria, they are distributed free of charge by the ministry of education. In Saudi Arabia, he is held in high esteem by some members of the elite.

Yet Asad's brand of reform Islam remains controversial, as Misch learned the hard way. At the last minute, much to his disgust, a film festival in the United Arab Emirates pulled A Road to Mecca from its program. Meanwhile, Misch hopes the film will be bought by distributors in the United States, Canada and, particularly, Israel.

"Asad tried to break down walls between cultures and religions," he said. "He wanted to unite the East and the West. He thought that Islam and democracy are compatible. He is a relevant figure for our times."

Rabbi Gemara teaches Gemarah – and life lessons

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Shlomo Gemara, rosh yeshiva of Yeshivat Or Chaim and Ulpanat Orot, spends almost 13 hours a week in the school's classrooms teaching Talmud.

A few years ago, because he was not teaching as much, he felt like he was losing contact with the students, he said in an interview in his office at Or Chaim, the Orthodox boys' high school that, together with Ulpana, forms Toronto's Bnei Akiva high schools.

A native of Petach Tikva, Rabbi Gemara came to Toronto in 1993 as a shaliach for a four-year stint at the school. After returning to Israel for two years, the school brought him back, and he's been there ever since.

The 49-year-old rabbi was introduced to teaching at a young age when, as a Grade 9 student during the Yom Kippur War in 1973, he and some friends were asked to teach Grade 3 and 4 students because there was a shortage of teachers.

"We thought it would be fun," he recalls. At the time, he was a youth group leader in the Bnai Akiva movement.

The interaction with students and the feeling that he was making a difference were more compelling than he expected. "I actually fell in love with teaching, and it was quite clear to me that I would like to teach in the future."

An alumnus of Bar-Ilan University, where he obtained a bachelor's degree in mathematics, Rabbi Gemara received his rabbinic ordination and teaching qualifications at Kerem B'Yavneh, a hesder yeshiva that combines Torah study with army service.

It may just be coincidence that Rabbi Gemara teaches Gemarah (part of the Talmud), but it seems to be serendipitous as well.

He said that – although he's never been among them – "many people believe that Talmud is one of the most boring subjects."

"I believe this is one of the most exciting subjects, if you teach it properly. It deals with real issues in life, it gives you historical perspective on things, and it forces you to think, which is the most important asset that I believe a high school should equip students with.

"I think my goal in teaching Gemarah is very clear, and this is really to make students understand the text in a precise way, and at the end of the shiur [lesson], I would like them to take something to their own life from the class."

Rabbi Gemara, who says he still understands and can relate to issues of teenagers, believes in using humour as a teaching tool. One year, his students in Israel presented him with a book of his jokes that they had compiled.

Over the past five years, spending time as a rabbi-in-residence at Jewish summer camps, he has become "much more aware of the power of informal activities" and has begun to incorporate more of them into the school.

"They are our teachers..."

He also believes in encouraging students to ask questions and express their values.

Last December, at Limmud: A Festival of Jewish Learning and Culture, he offered a Jewish take on John Lennon's song "Imagine."

The topic, an unlikely one for an Orthodox rabbi, came to his attention a few years ago when an Ulpana student read from the song at a school event.

Rabbi Gemara, who was only somewhat familiar with the tune, decided he needed to address the issue quickly, after a shaliach at the school immediately decried the song as heresy.

Doing as much research as he could during a short window of time, within 90 minutes the rabbi was presenting a shiur to the students. Since then Rabbi Gemara – who also teaches adults at Mekorot, a Jewish learning institute for women – has also addressed the topic at a North American principals' conference.

He noted that "Imagine" raises "many issues that our sages dealt with. They came up with completely different solutions and ideas, but the questions and the discussion are important, and [students] should know that there are people who think differently." He added that such issues are an adjunct to the school's main focus of teaching Torah.

"I think our job as a Modern Orthodox school is to show students that the outer world has a lot to offer, but you have to be well prepared and well informed in order to really synthesize the outer world and the Torah world together."

"They are our teachers... " will return at the end of September.

A lesson from the teacher: "I wouldn't be afraid to take any text or any value from the outer world and to confront it with our [Jewish] values, and maybe to learn something good ... Torah values are going to be confronted in the future, and to ignore this confrontation might be disastrous, if students are not prepared to answer and to criticize and to think."

Anne Golden honoured at Paul Penna gala

By SHERI SHEFA

The Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School held its fifth annual fundraising tribute gala last week, honouring someone who embodies the same qualities promoted by the school.

Anne Golden, a key figure in public policy and city-building initiatives in Toronto, as well as the president and CEO of the Conference Board of Canada, was feted at the June 16 event, which boasted an impressive lineup of performers.

Anne Golden

The sold-out event at the Al Green Theatre at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre was hosted by Tony Award winner Bob Martin and was entertained by the Mighty Popo, klezmerist David Buchbinder, the comedy troupe Women Fully Clothed, comedian Seán Cullen, the Canadian Tenors and others.

Before Golden – who served as president of the United Way of Greater Toronto for 14 years until 2001 and was named to the Order of Canada in 2003 – addressed the audience, Aviva Rajsky, the school board president, thanked her for her commitment to community building and for her involvement in the downtown Jewish community.

"Anne, you are known for your dedication and commitment to social justice. How fitting it is, then, for you to be honoured by a school whose mission statement includes a commitment to social justice as one of its core values," Rajsky said. "We pride ourselves on being a unique school, and it is so rewarding to have someone who has been involved with so many other organizations recognize our values."

Proceeds from tickets sales and a silent auction will go to subsidies for families that can't afford tuition at the school, which welcomes students from senior kindergarten to Grade 8 and is celebrating its 10th anniversary this year.

Golden expressed gratitude for being recognized by a school whose values mirror hers.

"I wanted to accept this honour for several reasons. First, I believe in Jewish day school education. We live in a secularized, fast-paced world, and there seems to be less and less room for our cultural and religious traditions, and I feel that we can't count on our ever-diluted celebrations of holidays to transmit the substance of Judaism to future generations," she said.

"Second, this day school is unique. It serves a population which is extremely diverse. They are committed to helping those who can't pay the full tuition with subsidies," she said, adding that each year, the school manages to raise more than $150,000 for that purpose.

Golden said she loves that the school is in the downtown core, operating out of the Miles Nadal JCC.

"Successful cities have vital downtowns, so providing this kind of institution for people who chose to live in the centre of the city, as we do, is a really important addition to the fabric of Toronto," she said.

"When I see young leaders like the Paul Penna team, who are so dedicated and energized and willing to give so much of themselves to build a stronger community, it resonates with me."

A number of tribute videos to Golden were also screened, including from essayist and novelist John Ralston Saul and Toronto Mayor David Miller.

Trudeau speaks at USDS

By RITA POLIAKOV
CJN Intern

Individuals have never mattered as much as they do now, Justin Trudeau told a group of students at United Synagogue Day School (USDS) last Wednesday.

Justin Trudeau

"If there are problems in the world, the problems are [caused] by years of little actions by individuals who weren't thinking about the big picture," the former prime minister Pierre Trudeau's son told the students.

Trudeau, who will be running for the Liberal party in the Montreal Papineau riding in the next election, spoke about his childhood, the environment and children's ability to affect the world.

"The decisions we make are extremely important," he told a group of grades 5, 6, 7 and 8. "We don't need you to be leaders of tomorrow. There's something conditional to that– we need you to be leaders of today."

Trudeau emphasized the importance of connecting with children, especially when it comes to helping the environment.

"The coming generations are aware of the breadth of the situation," he said. "Take an example like recycling. It was started in a classroom. The students taught the parents and it spread."

USDS is trying to teach its students the importance of environmentalism. According to Raquel Black, a USDS middle school teacher and incoming vice-principal, the school has integrated Earth-friendly concepts both in and out of the classroom.

"We've been concentrating a lot on recycling and the environment from junior kindergarten up to Grade 8. They learn about different parts of science, recycling, [alternative] energy and current events. This will become part of their future," Black said.

Over the past two years, the school has been implementing various environmentally friendly policies. It has a no-paper policy, which encourages students to use e-mail when submitting assignments. Classrooms are equipped with SMART boards to eliminate paper handouts.

"The school has a green team [made up of about 10 students]. They're responsible for recycling and tree planting," Black said. "If you take something away, you have to give it back. [Students] understand that not everything needs to be wasted."

Trudeau also touched on this concept.

"For the environment, we need to start thinking very differently about how we operate as a society," he said. "If a company pollutes streams and air, the company is making a profit off this. [They] calculate the value of a barrel of oil they sell, they don't calculate the pollution [they create]. The Earth is something we have to care for."

Trudeau, who is a former high school teacher, had no trouble connecting with the USDS students.

"You get away with a lot less with kids, [they're] a lot tougher as an audience. You have to be real," he said. "[Kids are] capable of understanding difficult concepts. You can challenge [them] to step up."

Heschel brings Columbia program to Toronto

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Until recently, professional development opportunities for teachers at the Toronto Heschel School did not include anything specifically for new teachers.

This year, however, the school ran an 18-session program called the New Teacher Academy, developed by Columbia University in New York.

Heschel is the first Canadian school to partner with Columbia for the program, which will wrap up this week with a presentation and dinner on Thursday. A representative from Columbia will be in attendance, and a number of educators from other local schools have been invited.

Heschel's head of child study, Tobie Franklin, trained last summer as a facilitator for the program and brought it to the school.

She told The CJN that, generally speaking, 33 per cent of new teachers leave the profession within three years, and almost 50 per cent within five years. The program was designed to increase teacher retention and encourage leadership in the classroom, Franklin said.

Standards of the program include leadership, community and "differentiation" – how to teach to students at different levels.

Donor's vision and generosity to change the face of Holocaust education

Survivor donates $10 million for new state-of-the-art Holocaust Centre

Chaim Neuberger with his late wife Sarah.

By Daniel Horowitz

Few people anywhere can attest, firsthand, to the horrific nightmare that was the Holocaust, better than Toronto's Chaim Neuberger.

Neuberger's entire family - his parents, four brothers and one sister - were all killed by the Nazis.

He managed to escape the same fate thanks to the heroic selflessness of a non-Jewish Polish family who took him in - along with nine other Jewish youngsters - and hid them for nine months in secret rooms, closets and even a horse stable, where Chaim would often sleep under piles of straw and hay.

"I remember the family very well; they were obviously very generous," says Neuberger, an affable and fit 79-year-old builder who regularly works out at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre. "The wife would always prepare proper meals for us and slide it through an opening in a closet, or wherever we were hiding at the time. It was this way for all those months until the Russians came and we were all liberated. If the Nazis knew what this family was doing, they would have been killed along with all of us. They gambled their lives for us."

For years after the war ended, Neuberger expressed his gratitude by regularly sending money to the family that saved his life.

Jennifer Ritter

After the war, he decided to leave Poland, travelling to Austria and Italy before ultimately making Canada his home.

It was thanks to a special initiative by the Canadian government that sponsored Jewish orphans under the age of 18 that Neuberger, along with 80 others, came to this country in 1948. After docking in Halifax, he went to Montreal before ultimately deciding to give Toronto a try. His instincts proved correct as, within just a few short years, he began to find success in the city's booming building business.

It was in Toronto that he also found personal success, meeting and marrying his wife of fifty years, Sarah. The couple had two daughters – Edith and Myra - who produced eight grandchildren. Sadly, Sarah passed away six years ago. Today, sixty years after arriving in a new country, Neuberger can still be found working away in his office in the Yonge and St. Clair area of the city. "I enjoy working; it's important to be busy. It's no good when you have nothing to do," he explains. "When I need to relax, the grandchildren give me plenty of nachas; they're good kids. We did okay," he says with a wide smile.

Neuberger, who is normally reticent to share his painful memories of the Holocaust, recently decided to do something on a much grander scale in order to educate others about the dangers of hatred, intolerance and indifference. Through UJA Federation's $400 million Tomorrow Campaign, which is revitalizing Jewish life across the Greater Toronto Area, Neuberger has donated $10 million, creating The Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre.

"Educating people of all faiths about the Holocaust is so important to me; after all, I'm a part of the Holocaust," says Neuberger. "I was the youngest in my family and they were all taken from me and murdered. Holocaust education is so important because nobody lives forever, including my generation. We need what happened documented, so people can see the facts, the photos, and other information. We need to tell the stories. There are those out there who even deny that the Holocaust ever took place. We want to build this centre so that all people, of all ages and all nationalities, will learn the truth, and learn from the lessons of the past."

Upon completion, the new Centre – which will be part of the Sherman Campus on Bathurst Street, just north of Sheppard Avenue - will continue its long-standing tradition of preserving the memory of the six million Jews who died in the Shoah.

Part of the National Centre for Jewish Heritage, The Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre will welcome more visitors than ever before as up to 100,000 are expected to pass through its doors annually.

"Mr. Neuberger's gift is a true inspiration," says UJA Federation chair David Koschitzky. "His personal journey from the horrific experiences of the Holocaust to a man who gives so generously to ensure that the past is never repeated will stand as a shining example for generations to come."

"The generous, visionary leadership displayed by Mr. Neuberger is nothing short of phenomenal," says Lorraine Sandler, chair, Holocaust Centre of Toronto, UJA Federation. "By coming forth and taking the initiative as the lead donor on the new Holocaust Centre, he personifies the Jewish value of tikun olam, repairing the world. Not only will the Jewish community in Toronto, and those from around the world, benefit from what will be an unprecedented centre of learning and culture, but so too will the community-at-large."

"Learning the lessons of hate and intolerance is essential in today's world – especially with the global resurgence of anti-Semitism and anti-Zionism," says Jennifer Ritter, director, Holocaust Centre of Toronto, UJA Federation. "Through the Centre, people of all ages, races and religions, will learn the importance of treating each other with dignity and respect."

When it's completed, the new Holocaust Education Centre bearing the Neuberger name will include advancement of all the programming, learning, outreach, educational training and pedagogic material the current centre does, but with the bar raised and at a level second to none. The proximity of the other arms of the National Centre for Jewish Heritage as well as the other partners on the Sherman Campus will lead to a collaborative environment that will enhance the Centre experience.

Lorraine Sandler

"I know how much this project means to Chaim," says Michael Lax, a principal in Neuberger's building company. "This is a man whose life was changed – forever – by the Holocaust, and finally, through the Tomorrow Campaign, he now has the chance to make a positive difference in the lives of so many others. What a legacy this is for him."

"Everybody in my family said nothing but 'yes' when I told them what I was doing with this money," says Neuberger. "They were all so pleased and so proud of this idea. Sarah was such a wonderful lady and I know that if she were here today, she'd be so happy and so proud of what's happening, too. She knows how important it is to share our good fortune with others. It's like what I always say: it's good to have and good to give."

Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre

Helping us to remember our past and dream about our future

By Daniel Horowitz

When its doors open for the first time as the Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre, an anticipated 100,000 annual visitors will learn the lessons of the Holocaust in a world-class, state-of-the-art cultural facility whose time has come.

As Canada's pluralistic population continues to grow and become increasingly diverse, the new Holocaust Education Centre will play an integral role in promoting discourse around our differences and our similarities in order to nurture a harmonious society.

Part of the new Sherman Campus – one of three new centres of Jewish life being built across the Greater Toronto Area through UJA Federation's Tomorrow Campaign – the Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre, slated for completion in late 2011, will replace the current, aging Holocaust Centre of Toronto, established in 1985, building upon its rich legacy with new facilities, exhibits and programs geared to the new millennium, emphasizing history and personal stories.

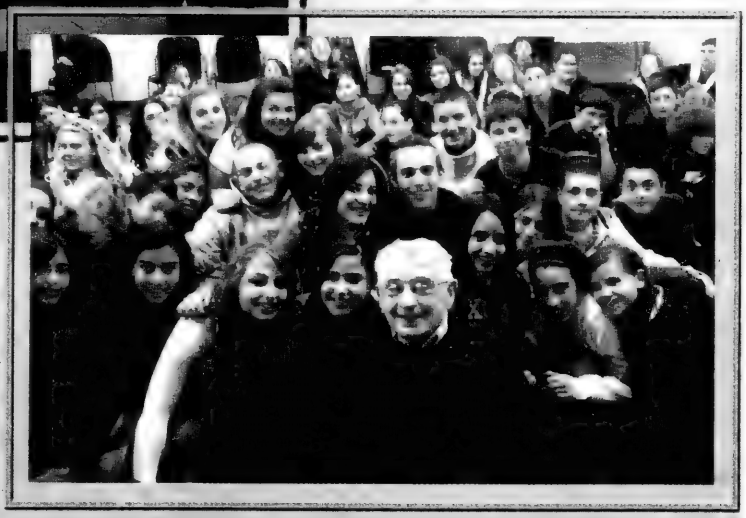
As a living memorial, the Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre will honour the indominitable spirit of the Holocaust survivors who came to Canada and the memories of six million Jews who perished. The survivors' miraculous stories of loss, rebirth and renewal will inspire visitors to overcome challenges in their own lives, to choose action over indifference to suffering and to encourage others to do so.

One of the strengths of the new institution will be its ability to present the history of the Holocaust in ways that enable visitors to relate this experience to their own lives today – the values we embrace as Jews and as Canadians, the moral choices we confront, and recognizing that each of us has the power to stand up to bias and bigotry of any kind in our multicultural society.

"There is, first and foremost, a need to preserve the memory and story of each of the six million who died in the Holocaust, and to remember the families, communities, and rich cultural and religious life lost to us," says Jennifer Ritter, director, Holocaust Centre of Toronto, UJA Federation. "Tikun olam, 'repairing the world', is an important Jewish obligation. In teaching about the Holocaust, we endeavour to create a safer world for all. This new centre – with its interactive public galleries and second-to-none teaching facilities – will go a long way toward teaching future generations about the importance of maintaining moral clarity, understanding where choices lead, and about taking responsibility for our own actions."

"Mr. Neuberger's heartfelt and remarkably generous gift to help make this dream a reality shows the magic behind the entire Tomorrow Campaign which continues to make people's dreams into realities," says Leslie Gales, chair, UJA Federation's Tomorrow Leadership Cabinet.

TOMORROW



Holocaust Survivor Alec Eisen with students from Father John Kelly Elementary School at Maple Library, 2007.

The need is vast; the time is now.

- Many new immigrants to Canada come from regions embroiled in racial, religious conflict. The Holocaust alerts us to the painful and deadly consequences of racism and bigotry in our world.
- In the 2001 census, 12,815, or 54.2% of Canada's 23,660 Holocaust survivors lived in the Greater Toronto Area.
- The Holocaust is the prism through which meaningful interfaith, intercultural and interracial dialogue can be fostered.
- It is crucial that survivors' stories be recorded and perpetuated after they are no longer here to tell them. Time is of the essence as the survivor population continues to diminish. Artifacts from area survivors can only be preserved with advanced climate controls, adequate space and proper lighting.
- There are approximately 12 million people living in Ontario and close to five million in the Greater Toronto Area. The Holocaust Centre of Toronto impacts 60,000 people per year. The Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre will reach over 100,00 persons annually.

Israeli-based organization helps victims of terror

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

After witnessing the carnage of a 2002 terror attack that killed 12 students in a cafeteria at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, Orly Vaknin developed a classic case of post-traumatic stress disorder.

The 28-year-old teacher and pilates instructor from Jerusalem said she was immobilized by anxiety and depression, but she couldn't afford the long-term psychotherapy she needed to rebuild her life.

She was subsequently referred to the One Family Fund, a non-denominational, Israeli-based organization that helps victims of terror.

"They sent someone to my house and two days later, they gave me a cheque for psychotherapy for a year and a half."

Vaknin was visiting Canada recently as an ambassador for the One Family Fund. While in the Toronto area, she took part in a number of fundraising events for the organization, including a 50-kilometre bike ride organized by Daniel Winberg.

The One Family Fund recently held a 50-kilometre bike ride. Participants included, from left, Lauren Albert, her mother Pam, the executive director of One Family, and Orly Vaknin, who represented the One Family Fund in Israel.

Pam Albert, executive director of the Canadian branch of the One Family Fund, said the organization helped Vaknin complete her education and get a career. She was matched with an adoptive family, Tom and Karen Ehrlich of Toronto, who have assisted her financially and emotionally.

The Ehrlichs have visited Vaknin in Israel and she was their guest on her recent trip to Toronto, Albert said, noting that One Family has also helped Vaknin build a support network with other victims of terror.

"She teaches pilates classes to bereaved mothers at the One Family centre. She's like a daughter to these bereaved women, and they're like mothers to her."

Vaknin said the organization helped her forge social ties with people her own age. She recalled how therapeutic it was for her to travel to England two years ago with peers from One Family. She described her ease in connecting with members of the group because of their mutual experience with terror.

"They understood what it's like to be so scared that you feel like you're going to die."

She said one of the activities funded by One Family that helped her the most was her participation in a full triathlon in New York last summer.

"They gave me a coach to train me. This really helped me. When you become strong physically, you feel stronger emotionally," Vaknin said.

"That's what I want to do now. I want to help people with emotional problems deal with their problems through physical activity."

Albert said that six years ago, a group of volunteers in Toronto and Montreal decided to support the One Family Fund after raising $250,000 through their synagogues for victims of the second intifadah, which began in 2000.

"Over 3,500 families are being helped by One Family," Albert said.

She said the organization offers workshops, art and physical education classes, support groups and other therapeutic activities at its centres in Jerusalem and Ranana.

"We run retreats for bereaved parents, wounded couples, and orphans. We help everyone who's been in an attack. We send 350 kids to camps in Israel."

The organization has also hired a psychologist to be a front-line caseworker in Sderot, the Negev town that's under constant bombardment from Gaza.

This summer, 25 Israeli children, many of whom are from Sderot, will be attending two Ontario camps through One Family. Camp Gesher will take five children, and 20 will be going to Camp Timberlane.

As well, a group of Bel Ewart cottagers, organized by Ari Belzberg and Emanuel Greenberg, will be hosting a group of Israeli children at their cottages in July.

Albert said there are many ways people can become involved with One Family, such as through missions to Israel, where participants can connect with victims of terror, as well as through such initiatives as family adoptions, bar and bat mitzvah twinnings, and golf tournaments.

In mid-June, a whirlwind of fundraisers kicked off with a party at Hava Nagila night club organized by Dorit Elbaz and Israeli television host Gila Yefet, of Mifgashim. More than 200 women, many of them Israeli, sang and danced the night away in support of One Family.

The bike ride, which drew 100 participants, and several smaller receptions followed. Upcoming fundraisers include an annual golf tournament on Aug. 11 at Devil's Pulpit, and the Sea to Sea hike in Israel, a five-day excursion from Rosh Hanikra to the Sea of Galilee that runs from Nov. 2 to 6.

Vaknin credits One Family with helping her rebuild her life over the last six years, which has involved learning to cope with the fear she still harbours from the terror attack at Hebrew U.

"I'm teaching in the gym. I'm biking. I keep myself busy. I still have fear in public places," she said.

"You have to accept that you have this [fear]. It's there, but to lead a normal life, you need to figure out how to go on."

For information about the Sea to Sea hike or other One Family Fund events, visit www.onefamilyfund.org, or call 416-644-4955.

Ve'ahavta adds night shift to help homeless

By RITA POLIAKOV
CJN Intern

On one side of a park in downtown Toronto, three men are snuggled up in tattered sleeping bags with cardboard box beds.

"Street help," calls a Ve'ahavta driver as I cower in the background. "We have coffee and sandwiches. Sir? Street help?"

Nobody budges. All three are fast asleep, so we move on.

"Street help," we call to a bearded man with sky-blue eyes. "Would you like some coffee and sandwiches?"

The man nods, moving slightly on his bench. "Just make your way to the van."

My eyes slowly shift to his wheelchair.

"I have no legs," he says.

We promise to bring him some food once we've made our way around.

This is an average shift on Ve'ahavta's Mobile Jewish Response to the Homeless Van (MJRH), although it was the first Tuesday night shift in the program's history.

Ve'ahavta is a Jewish organization that helps the needy locally and internationally. Its programs range from outreach vans and a homework club based in Toronto's Regent Park, to helping impoverished communities around the world.

Every Wednesday, Thursday and Sunday morning, Ve'ahavta staff and volunteers deliver food, clothes and hygiene supplies to Toronto's homeless. Tuesday's shift, which lasted from 6 p.m. to 12 a.m., was Ve'ahavta's first solo night run. In the past, they had partnered with a native group for evening patrols.

"Tuesday night is vastly different than Sunday morning. We're reaching different people in different areas of the city," said Katie Stemeroff, manager of volunteer programs at Ve'ahavta. "We did a needs assessment and found that there were a lot of people on the street late at night and there wasn't a lot of presence."

Alex Cywink, who has worked with Ve'ahavta for three years, emphasized that MJRH isn't just about handing out food.

"There are no vans that do what we do. [The program] addresses physical and humanitarian [needs.] We're supportive, we have an accepting attitude," he said.

The night started off slowly. After packing the van, Cywink told me what to expect, emphasizing the bonus point system.

"You get points if you spot someone before us, and if you make [a client] laugh."

The first man we served took only a bottle of water and a bagel.

"I could hug you," he said, smiling broadly at Cywink.

After stopping for a chat and offering some bagels to another man, we left, searching for more clients.

Cywink and the driver were determined to reach as many people as they could, even if it meant bending a few rules. I learned this as we veered onto the sidewalk, through a bike path and under a bridge.

"This [was] a four-bedroom apartment," Cywink said, pointing to a paved path under the bridge. I thought of all the times I'd complained about the size of my room or my old mattress.

Under another bridge, we found three teens sitting around a crackling fire.

"Do you have any books? I just finished mine," one asked. After another chat and a look through our box of novels, we were off again.

We searched back alleys, ravines, bridges and wooded area, stopping at a moment's notice if Cywink spotted a client.

"There's one!" I yelled, pointing at a bearded man weaving his way through sidewalk traffic.

"Looks like he's booking it [running away]," our driver said, making a quick U-turn.

Most people just took a cup of coffee and some sandwiches, while others asked for socks, pants or shirts.

"It's hard finding pants," said one as he held a pair of black jeans up to his waist.

"I want to find Chris," the driver demanded halfway through the shift.

Chris, as it turned out, was just about to go to sleep when we found him. Sighing slightly, he followed us to the van, asking if possums were edible.

Like most of the people we served that night, Chris was intelligent, articulate and polite. He talked about the evils of Starbucks as he sipped his coffee. He reminded me of one of my friends, who refused to touch a Starbucks coffee for most of high school.

At a crowded park, we found a balding man walking around aimlessly. His clothes were clean and probably new. A large silver-coloured necklace hung from his neck. He clearly didn't belong and he looked lost.

"I've never slept outside before," he told us. "Is it safe here?"

When we left, I saw him tearing some cardboard in half for his bed.

While walking through a park, looking for clients, the driver and I started talking about living situations.

"I wouldn't know where to sleep," I said, looking around the park. The driver began to explain the difference between the bridge where the teenagers were staying and Chris' spot under a few trees.

"Chris's place is cleaner," the driver said. "It's his home."

Students impressed by Trudeau

During the question-and-answer period, questions ranging from the subjects of Tibet and poverty to Trudeau's childhood were asked.

"Until I was 13, I was just the prime minister's son. I got to travel a lot. By the time I was 13, I'd been to 50 countries," he said.

"My parents tried to make sure I had an ordinary life. I took the school bus to school, but it was followed [by the RCMP]... I used to read Archie comics and [think], 'It'd be so nice to have a normal life in Riverdale.' I just wanted to be normal."

The students were impressed by Trudeau's speech.

"I thought it was inspiring. I like his ideas on the youth perspective," Andi, a Grade 8 student, said.

Danielle, another Grade 8 student, said,"I really liked that he wasn't telling us what to do. It was our choice – we have a choice to do what we want in the world."

According to Trudeau, not everyone needs to become a politician to change the world.

"The way you connect to the world around you will define the way this world is when you're older," he told the students.

"Right now the decisions we make will have a huge impact on the future of this world. Each and everyone of us can become important and powerful."

Teachers invited to program

The 10 participants, who were invited to take part in the program, include mostly "new-career teachers" who have been teaching for less than five years, but also a few more experienced educators who Franklin knew were "looking for more support.

"It's an opportunity to get what they were looking for, and I felt the newer teachers could benefit from their experience," she said. Also, participating teachers have the opportunity to write a mini grant proposal and earn up to three graduate school credits, she said.

Drew Rothman, 29, a middle school math and science teacher, has been at Heschel for 2½ years and has been part of the program this year. He said that, for him, it's "good to review" strategies for dealing with different ways that students learn.

Also, he added, "it's important to have a place where we can sit and brainstorm."

On a practical level, Rothman used his $250 grant proposal to facilitate the building of wind generators by his students. "This grant was great, because it really allowed creativity."

"There wasn't anything like this when I started my career," said Franklin.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Jewish Life

Drivers wanted

Class Act
By Daniel Held

As an experiential educator, I have multiple professions. I am a teacher, a counsellor and a social worker. I am also a nurse, a truck driver, a carpenter, a plumber, a computer technician, a chef, a shepherd and a travel agent.

At the end of each program I run, I am amazed by the variety of skills needed to put the event together. I thrive on the breadth of experiences and the dynamic nature of my job.

The most important vocation I hold, however, and the profession most needed in our Jewish community, is the bus driver.

I have never sat behind the wheel of a bus. What I mean by a bus driver is an educator who guides the route of students' Jewish education and directs them from one education station to the next. I draw the term "bus driver" from Prof. Jack Wertheimer's article titled Linking the Silos.

Jewish education cannot be a one-stop shop. Alone, day schools, synagogues, camps and youth movements cannot provide the holistic experience that a child needs to develop his Jewish self. Jewish students, and even Jewish adults, must find a variety of ways to connect themselves to Jewish living and learning and they need guidance along this path.

As a case study to think about the variety of Jewish experiences, let's consider Suzie, a high school student.

During the day, Suzie goes to school. Ideally, a Jewish day school that offers her richness both in Jewish studies and Jewish experiences. If not day school, she attends a supplementary program of Jewish studies in the evenings after her regular school. Schooling, however, is not enough.

Suzie is a member of a youth movement. There, she connects with Jewish peers, goes on weekend retreats and develops leadership skills.

Suzie is engaged in synagogue life. She goes with her parents on Shabbat mornings but abandons them at the door to go sit – and chat – with friends.

She volunteers once each week – not only fulfilling her mandatory community service hours but also engaging with the community in a way that is meaningful to her.

Suzie has participated in Jewish travel – she's participated in one of countless Tikkun olam trips to New Orleans, South America or Africa. She has been on the March of the Living or a summer Israel program.

For many years, Suzie has spent her summers at a Jewish camp, living Jewish life 24/7.

I spend countless hours with students like Suzie. Helping them find exciting summer experiences and meaningful community service projects. I help drive them from one Jewish activity to the next, challenging them to expand their circle of affiliation. I am a bus driver for Jewish teens.

But we often see on the back of yellow school buses: "Drivers wanted."

We don't have enough bus drivers. We need drivers to guide children from early childhood education into synagogue and school programs. We need drivers to connect the parents of young children to adult education classes and moms and tots.

We need drivers to send our high school grads on long-term Israel programs, to spend a year studying and experiencing all that Israel has to offer. We need drivers to connect them with Hillels and Jewish campus professionals.

Bus drivers serve as the connection point, not only easing transitions through stages of life but also pushing the individual to engage fully in Jewish living. As a driver in a high school, I urge my students to think about Judaism outside of the school, about their summers, their volunteer hours, their sports leagues and their Shabbatot.

While we don't have enough drivers, it is easy to get a driver's licence. Each of us knows people who could be dropped off at a new station and we can all drive the car pool.

Ready for the ingathering

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Through A Sephardi Window

There was once a time when a direct flight to Israel was non-existent, and one had to make a stop somewhere in Europe.

While not too many of us will remember those days – or even the days when passengers would retrieve their own luggage from under the belly of the plane and proceed to walk with their suitcases in hand to the terminal – some of us – the fortunate ones, I believe – will recall when the flight to Israel was still an experience itself.

It all began with the colours and symbols of the national carrier, El Al, which at one time was the only airline to make the journey. Then there were the "Shalom" greetings of the flight attendants, who in those days were still called stewardesses. One sensed that even while still in North America awaiting take-off, one was, at least in part, already in Israel.

Of course, nothing could rival the emotional high upon hearing and feeling the distinct thump of the landing. It wasn't the relief of terra firma, but the realization that one had just accomplished something that used to be virtually impossible, and that one had done so with relative ease. The pioneer excitement of the land of Israel was still palpable.

On cue with that thud came the music of the national anthem on the PA system. Then, an immediate roar of spontaneous applause would fill the plane.

All these things seem quite quaint today, if not outright cheesy. We have become more sophisticated and rather jaded. Today, the whole experience is taken in stride. "The Homecoming," even if just for a couple of weeks, is so much more subdued. "Thank you for flying...." is all we may hear.

Then there is the new airport. Everything about it says you have arrived at an up-to-the-minute and quite affluent country. As well, the airport comes to us, instead of us going to it. Its long sleeves extend out like tendons to receive passengers. It is all sparkling, massive, efficient and very, very impressive.

Its architecture is at once modern and Middle Eastern in style, and it is proudly second to none among the airports of the world. It is certainly eons away from that weary walk after a long trip, on a humid runway toward a distant building.

But looking beyond the duty free, the international brands, the shops, boutiques and cafés, there is something eerily unique about this place. Here, from this very space, the vast atrium from which many corridors with gates on all sides extend, people arrive and depart to anywhere on earth.

It will be here that one day, at least for some time, all departures will cease, and instead, this airport will serve exclusively as a one-way portal into the Land of Israel.

On that day, Jews from the four corners of the world will travel on a one-way ticket to Israel, and on that day, the prophecy will be realized: "And I will lift you on the wings of eagles to your land".

For those messianic days, a befitting airport has been built in Israel.

Jewish Life

How Jesus Became Christian by Barrie Wilson, Random House.

Jesus was a Jew

Books
Bernard Baskin

After 2,000 years, Jesus still remains a puzzling and enigmatic personality. Yet, writes Barrie Wilson, author of this contentious book, "Of all the Jewish males who ever lived, Jesus was by far the most influential."

Questions abound: did he intend to start a new religion? Did he consider himself the long-awaited messiah? Was his essential message distorted by those who came after him?

It is difficult, if not impossible, to answer these and similar questions because the "real Jesus" is hidden behind four different accounts of him in the Christian Bible. Aside from these Gospel versions, there are virtually no other sources from which to gain any authentic knowledge of his life or teachings.

The Gospels – written from 40 to 90 years after Jesus' death – are filled with gaps and contradictions, encrusted with legendary accretions, influenced by the theological preconceptions of their authors, and concerned with influencing or placating the Roman authorities at the time.

It is helpful to make a distinction between the terms Jesus and Christ and what they imply.

Jesus is a proper name for the Hebrew Joshua; it denotes a Palestinian of 19 centuries ago, around whom the Gospels weave a radiant biography. They indicate that his concern was an ethical and redemptive message to a strife-torn and restive society, addressed especially to the poor and outcast.

Christ, on the other hand, derives from the Greek word for "saviour," closely akin to the Hebrew Mashiach (which means "messiah" or "anointed"). Christ represents the concept of a man-God, not a mortal creature, who came voluntarily into this world to atone for the sins of men and women by self-immolation.

The life lived and the ideas taught by Jesus were in essence a product of his Jewish birth and background. When he was asked about the essentials of his religion, he replied, "Here, O Israel, the Lord is our God, the Lord is One" and "Love your neighbour as yourself." Both are quotations from the Hebrew Bible, and the very foundation of Judaism's faith.

How Jesus Became Christian is a seminal work by a professor of humanities and religious studies at York University. His major thesis is that the teachings and true personality of Jesus – loyal to his people and faith – were altered by Paul and early Christian leaders to create a radically new religion.

James, Jesus' brother, led a group in Jerusalem that tried to win followers to a new but Jewish way of life. After his death, the movement was eventually "hijacked" by an alternative theology launched by Paul of Tarsus, Wilson says, a Hellenized Jew who contended that the laws of Moses could not bring a person to righteousness and could be ignored or nullified.

Wilson writes, "We tend to think of Paul's movement as just another form of early Christianity. It wasn't. It was a brand new religion entirely." Wilson continues bluntly, "Paul took a popular, charismatic Jewish teacher and transformed him into a universal Saviour." It was a caricature of the earlier faith.

Unhappily, asserts the author, it was Paul's teachings that became in future centuries, the anti-Semitism so pervasive in the Christian world.

Wilson's basic contention is not new, but rarely has it been so plausibly argued and so impressively documented. His style is engaging and meant for a popular audience. This provocative work should be widely read and discussed.

Hoopoes, Hatikvah and menorahs

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Move over, menorah. Hold on, Hatikvah. Israel's got a brand-new symbol, the hoopoe.

Perhaps you've heard about the national competition to select an official bird for the State of Israel – and not surprisingly, the resulting controversy. We'll get to the hoopoe in a moment, but to mark this auspicious announcement and Israel's 60th, I thought this would be a good opportunity to look at some of the country's other official symbols.

In an excellent article, art historian Alec Mishory traces the history of Israel's two most famous symbols: its familiar blue and white flag with a Star of David at the centre and its emblem, a menorah cradled by two olive branches. According to Mishory, the search for a flag and emblem represents a balancing act between the use of religious symbols and modern ones with less religious connotations.

I learned that an early version for the flag is said to date back to Zionist Theodor Herzl's proposed white banner with seven gold stars. Those stars would represent the seven hours of daily labour advocated by Herzl. As for the familiar Star of David, unlike biblical symbols such as the shofar, lulav and Lion of Judah, formal Jewish ties to the Magen David are less defined. It was left to the flag's blue and white stripes to be reminiscent of the similarly striped tallit. [tinyurl.com/6yrpm3]

As for Israel's national anthem, Hatikvah has its roots in 1878 when Naftali Herz Imber wrote a poem titled Tikvatenu (Our Hope) to commemorate the founding of the Jewish settlement of Petach Tikvah (Gateway of Hope). It was officially confirmed as the Zionist anthem at the 18th conference in Prague in 1933. [tinyurl.com/33e5oa] But it would have to wait until November 2004 to be proclaimed Israel's official anthem. [tinyurl.com34mn52]

Things moved quicker in the search for an official symbol marking the country's 60th year. Chosen over five other contenders [tinyurl.com/6dzcr8], Ynetnews.com describes the banner as a child holding a blue and white sheet of cloth swirling into the figure 60. And once again, in a move that proves that you can't please all Israelis all of the time, member of the Knesset Yitzhak Cohen has dissed the design. His critique: the child looked "frumpy and should get a haircut." [tinyurl.com/6js9bb]

That design was chosen by the Knesset's symbols and ceremonies committee. Unfortunately, not all their work is as pleasant. The task also falls to them to decide official names for Israel's wars, such as what to call the 2006 conflict with Hezbollah. The committee considered naming it the War of the North or the Shield of the North War, before choosing the Second Lebanon War. An official name was needed for use on the graves of the fallen and medals of honour. [tinyurl.com/6jj5el]

Unlike most Canadian provinces and U.S. states, Israel does not have an official flower or plant. But Asaf Abir suggests that if Israel did, he feels two candidates would certainly be in the running: the olive tree, mentioned in the Torah and depicted as a symbol of peace. And the sabra, the prickly pear cactus, whose name has come to represent native-born Israelis: thick-skinned and thorny on the outside yet sweet and soft inside. [tinyurl.com/5px5kt]

Israel may not have a national flower, but as mentioned, it has joined the ranks of nations with official birds. [tinyurl.com/d8ug8] The organizers of the competition, the Society for the Protection of Nature in Israel, have created a Hebrew-language page on which you can see all the contenders for the coveted honour, including the yellow vented bulbul, the European goldfinch, the griffon vulture, the spur-winged plover, the lesser kestrel, the barn owl, the Palestine sunbird, the graceful warbler and the hoopoe with its distinctive crest and swooping beak. [tinyurl.com/2scc25]

With 35 per cent of the vote, the hoopoe ("duchifat" in Hebrew) was the clear leader. Although folklore tells us that King Solomon once called it wise, the Jerusalem Post didn't exactly give the bird a royal welcome with the headline, "Dirty, treif, but fit for a king, the hoopoe's our national bird." [tinyurl.com/3ra4wo]

B'nai Brith challenges cabinet on war criminal case

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

B'nai Brith Canada has fended off a legal challenge from Nazi collaborator Wasyl Odynsky that sought to prevent it from asking the federal cabinet to reconsider its decision not to strip him of citizenship.

Odynsky had filed a motion arguing that B'nai Brith did not have standing in the case, but the Federal Court's interim decision last week means B'nai Brith can ask a different Federal Court judge to order the cabinet to review its decision last May not to strip Odynsky and Vladimir Katriuk of their citizenship.

At the time, the Harper cabinet examined four cases involving Nazi collaborators who had been found by Federal Court judges to have lied about their wartime activities. The findings made each of them liable to lose their citizenship, but the cabinet stripped only Jacob Fast and Helmut Oberlander of citizenship, leaving the legal status of Katriuk and Odynsky unchanged.

No reasons were given for the decisions, but B'nai Brith lawyer David Matas believes cabinet relied on documentary submissions from Odynsky and the Ukrainian Canadian Congress. The documents, which were revealed during the Federal Court proceedings, indicate Odynsky claimed that he didn't lie about his wartime role as a labour camp guard, that he was not a war criminal, that he had ties to the community and that he had stayed out of trouble in Canada.

Matas said those arguments "are not legally relevant" to the question of whether or not his citizenship should be stripped. "The only relevant question is did he lie" when obtaining citizenship, Matas said.

A Federal Court judge found in 2001 that Odynsky served as a guard in an auxiliary unit at the Trawniki and Poniatowa labour camps and that he did not reveal those facts when immigrating to Canada. Trawniki was a training centre for Ukrainian guards who were enlisted as auxiliaries to SS killing units.

Katriuk had been a volunteer member of Ukrainian battalion 118 in Byelorussia (now Belarus) under the control of the Waffen SS. The unit was implicated in numerous atrocities, including the deaths of thousands of Jews in Belarus between 1941 and 1944. The Federal Court judge who heard the case said, "I find it difficult, if not impossible, to accept [Katriuk's] evidence that he did not participate in any important military operation while his battalion was in Byelorussia."

Matas said prior to making its decision, cabinet should have heard from Jewish groups, which have an interest in the cases. Cabinet also erred by going beyond the scope of its discretion, he said, because the Citizenship Act limits the discretion of the cabinet and doesn't permit it to accept new grounds in deciding whether or not to strip a suspect of citizenship.

Matas noted citizenship cases involving Nazi-era collaborators have languished in the legal system and before cabinet for years. He said he hoped the federal government won't appeal last week's interim Federal Court decision and permit the case to proceed to court to be heard on its merits.

Toews criticizes Arbour, defends Israel

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Conservative MP and president of the treasury board, Vic Toews, called outgoing UN High Commissioner for Human Rights, Louise Arbour, "a disgrace" for her position on Israel.

Toews uttered the remark last week in the House of Commons in response to calls by Liberal MP Martha Hall-Findlay urging the government to acknowledge Arbour – a former judge on the Supreme Court and international war crimes prosecutor – on her work as high commissioner.

Arbour has "already been congratulated by people of the world over her courage and candour, but here, this Conservative government is remaining silent, humiliating Canada in front of the international community," Hall-Findlay said during debate on June 17.

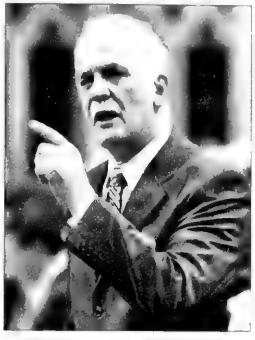
She added that Arbour has helped to "combat abuses and indignities against the world's most disenfranchised. She is world renowned as one of the most courageous and accomplished women this country has ever produced."

Hall-Findlay later asked Toews to retract his comment but he refused.

"The comments that Louise Arbour has made in respect of the state of Israel and the people of Israel are, in fact, a disgrace and I stand by those words," he said.

Afterward, a spokesperson for the PMO sought to mitigate the government's official position on the matter, noting that former foreign affairs minister Maxime Bernier and his interim replacement, MP David Emerson, have both "saluted and congratulated Mme. Arbour on her career. That said, the government hasn't always agreed with the positions she has taken."

Calls by The CJN to Toews were not returned by deadline.



Vic Toews

In the past, Arbour has been called to task by Jewish organizations and UN Watch – a Geneva-based watchdog organization led by Jewish Montrealer Hillel Neuer – for a perceived unwillingness to defend the Jewish state and call out anti-Semitism in the face of Arab member states' pressure to isolate and vilify Israel and Zionism in the UN.

UN Watch was particularly critical of Arbour in a report it issued late last year, titled The United Nations and Anti-Semitism 2004-2007 Report Card, which said Arbour had been virtually silent on anti-Semitism during her tenure.

It also took her to task for limiting her response to Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's Holocaust denial and threats to Israel in a private letter.

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Canada-Israel Committee told The CJN his organization considers Toews a "great friend" of Israel.

"We've had serious concerns about [Arbour's] assessment of the Middle East," he said. "We've had occasion to engage her a number of times and left those encounters less than enthused about her understanding of the situation."

Fogel added: "Toews was most likely reflecting a frustration that we share in the failure of the UN… to move beyond this chronic vilification of Israel."

A Feb. 7 report in The CJN cast Arbour in a more redemptive light after she issued a statement denouncing the Arab Charter on Human Rights for categorizing Zionism as a form of racism.

At the time, Arbour noted the charter was contrary to a UN General Assembly resolution which rejected that linkage. She also criticized the charter for sanctioning the death penalty for children and for its approach to the rights of women and non-citizens.

"Throughout the development of the Arab Charter, my office shared concerns with the drafters about the incompatibility of some of its provisions with international norms and standards," she said.

Frank Dimant, spokesperson for B'nai Brith Canada, said in a statement last week that Toews' remarks were "justified" because Arbour's record on Israel was consistently poor. "She condemned the Jewish State when it sought to carry out [its] right to protect its citizens against terrorist attacks," he said.

Arbour will step down from her position on June 30 and it's speculated that she may return to Canadian politics and run as a Liberal in the next federal election.

Winnipeg mother says she tried to wipe off swastika

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The mother of two children who were seized from their home after her seven-year-old daughter came to school with a swastika and other markings on her body says she tried to remove the swastika.

"I tried to wipe off the swastika on my daughter's arm before she went to school. I tried with a baby wipe and then nail polish remover. I guess I could have tried harder," she said in a telephone interview with The CJN.

The mother said she kicked out her husband, whom she said drew the swastika on the child, once she was served with court documents containing allegations against her by Winnipeg's Child and Family Services (CFS).

"I didn't understand why the school would be so alarmed. Then I saw things [in the documentation from CFS] that my daughter had said [to school officials]. My daughter was talking about a good way to kill a nigger. These aren't things I told her. These would have been things my husband told her," the mother said.

She added: "[My husband] never worked, so he was home with the kids. These are things that he said. I wasn't at home to hear them… There was also a drinking issue. He [my husband] was drinking and was able to hide it from me for a good period of time."

The mother said that she learned from CFS that in addition to the swastika, her daughter had the white supremacist tag of "14/88" on her body when she went to school.

The number 14 refers to a familiar slogan containing 14 words: "We must secure the existence of our people and a future for white children." The 88 represents the letters "HH" (H is the eighth letter of the alphabet), which stands for "Heil Hitler."

The mother, who wears a silver necklace with an etching of a swastika around her neck, also told The CJN: "I don't know anyone who doesn't know what [the tag "14/88"] means."

She also said that her original lawyer "dropped both me and my husband. I don't know why."

She added: "I have new legal counsel but I would rather not say who… I think that my ex-husband is getting a lawyer from legal aid."

The mother's former lawyer, John Ramsay, did not return calls and his secretary said he is not speaking to the media.

The mother said she is hopeful that an agreement will be arrived at with CFS for the children to be returned to her home gradually, and at first on weekends.

"I know that the CFS social worker is backing me and is not backing [my husband]… Slow integration of the kids back into my home would be the best for everybody," she said.

August Kreis III, the leader of the Aryan Nations, based in South Carolina, told the Winnipeg Free Press that his organization is offering to provide the mother and her husband financial, legal and other resources in their efforts to get their children back. The Free Press also reported that the words "Aryan Pride" were marked on the seven-year-old's body.

Debra Poskar, legal counsel for the CFS said she couldn't comment on the case, because it's before the courts.

The case was next scheduled to be heard in child protection court on June 23.

Ottawa exhibit chronicles Nazi eugenics policy

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The Canadian War Museum has recently opened Deadly Medicine: Creating the Master Race, an exhibit organized and circulated by the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington.

Through storyboards, artifacts, photographs and video clips, the exhibit examines how eugenics – the belief that humanity can be improved by encouraging some people to have children while preventing others from doing so – was employed by the Nazis in their quest to create a "master race."

Though focusing on the horror of the Nazis' use of eugenics to "cleanse" Germany of those deemed unfit and undesirable, the exhibit begins by putting eugenics in historical context, which included the belief by many supporters in the United States, parts of Europe and even in Canada in the early 20th century that eugenics would reduce the incidence of physical and mental infirmity in society.

Many Canadians will no doubt be surprised to learn that both Alberta and British Columbia enacted sterilization laws that weren't repealed for nearly 40 years.

The exhibit explores how the use of eugenics progressed in Nazi Germany from a way to control the reproduction and marriage of those deemed biologically "unfit" to an even more sinister method of weeding out those considered "racially" unfit, to ultimately being used as a method of eliminating the country's Jews, among other "undesirables."

One chilling caption lists the conditions for which Germans were forcibly sterilized: "Between 1934 and 1945, an estimated 400,000 Germans were surgically sterilized on account of their 'suffering' from any of nine conditions: 'feeblemindedness,' schizophrenia, manic-depressive disorder, genetic epilepsy, Huntington's chorea, genetic blindness, genetic deafness, severe physical deformity and chronic alcoholism."

"This exhibition provides visitors with an opportunity to explore the origins and rationale for Nazi Germany's racial policies and to understand how such policies contributed to the Holocaust," said Mark O'Neill, the war museum's director general.

Introducing the exhibit at a preview for the media, Susan Bachrach, curator of special exhibits at the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum, expressed gratitude to the Canadian War Museum for hosting it.

"Everyone in our museum is very excited about this collaboration, and I am very happy that the museum convinced us that the exhibit could be adapted for a bilingual presentation."

Deadly Medicine was first shown at the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum from 2004 to 2006 and has travelled to a number of venues since then. Next March, it will be in Berlin. The exhibit will remain in Ottawa at the war museum until Nov. 11.

Petition for Israeli MIAs presented in Parliament

Urges MPs to use 'all reasonable means' to bring about return of missing soldiers

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — As reports surfaced that some of Israel's captured soldiers will soon be released in a prisoner exchange with the Palestinians, a petition was presented to Parliament last week asking that Canada help free them and others being held by radical Islamic groups.

B.C. MP James Lunney stood in the House of Commons on June 17 to present petitions with nearly 10,000 signatures calling on Parliament to use "all reasonable means, including the application of economic sanctions and the severing of diplomatic ties with the governments of Lebanon, Syria and Iran, in order to bring about the return of Israel's missing soldiers."

The petitions – on behalf of Ehud Goldwasser, Eldad Regev, Gilad Schalit, Guy Hever, Ron Arad, Zachary Baumel, Yehuda Katz, Tzvi Feldman and Majdy Halabi, as well as and on behalf of Eli Cohen, who was hanged in Syria more than 30 years ago and whose remains were never returned – were delivered to Lunney by Renanah Goldhar who, along with other volunteers in Toronto, collected the signatures. Goldhar has been involved for a number of years with helping the families of Israel's missing soldiers.

Following the presentation to Parliament, Goldhar and a number of MPs met with Lunney to discuss the issue of the missing soldiers and Canada's role in helping to free them. Goldhar read an e-mail from Goldwasser's mother that she had hoped to share with all MPs.

"You came here, today, to show your support for three innocent Israeli soldiers kidnapped by the Hezbollah and the Hamas. However, your being here today has a wider moral meaning: in coming here today you are warning the world about the infiltration of Islamic fundamentalism and its dangerous groups, which already operate and live among your communities," Goldwasser's mother said in her e-mail.

Goldhar distributed bookmarks with the pictures of nine missing Israeli soldiers, which she said would also be given to all members of the Canada-Israel Parliamentary Friendship group.

Ontario MP David Sweet said, "We have great compassion. We are great friends. Anything we can do to help, we will."

Lunney added: "Sadly, the people we are dealing with are not known for their good care of prisoners… it would be wonderful, it would be miraculous, to have some of the boys returned to their families."

Orit Kremer, a consul at the Israeli embassy, thanked Goldhar on behalf of the Israeli government and emphasized that "we are doing things all the time to try to get the boys back."

Media advisor explains disproportionate Israel coverage

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Retired colonel Miri Eisen, who has been Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's foreign media adviser since the Second Lebanon War, was here recently to address the women's campaign of the Combined Jewish Appeal.

In her talk, Eisen, who has been at the forefront of presenting Israel's case to the media around the world, focused on why Israel gets a disproportionate amount of media attention.

"There are 340 international media correspondents stationed in Jerusalem. For the last 15 years, the largest contingency of foreign media personnel in the world aside from Washington, has been in Israel," said Eisen, who left her position three months ago in order to complete her doctoral dissertation in security studies at Haifa University.

The mother of three young children and married to a career officer in the IDF, Eisen said that one of the reasons that Israel has so many foreign correspondents is that "the standard of living is much higher in Israel than in neighbouring countries in the Middle East, so it is an attractive location."

In Israel, she said, foreign correspondents "can film anything, because it is open and democratic."

Eisen, who served for 20 years in the Israeli intelligence community, said that in Israel "we have the most critical press on earth."

According to Eisen, all foreign correspondents are responsible for covering not only Israel but the Palestinian territories, and as such they have to pass checkpoints on a regular basis.

Checkpoints are by their nature points of friction, she said, and not always the most pleasant place to be. A lot of what foreign correspondents cover are conflict areas, and so there is little emphasis on regular life in Israel.

"It is difficult for a foreign correspondent not to notice the thriving mood in Israel versus the mood in the Palestinian territories, or in Gaza. The foreign correspondent comes out affected. I can try to put things in context [for them] but it is difficult to stop the feeling they have," she said.

Another reason that Israel gets so much attention is that "Sunday is a slow day [for news], and Israel is the only place in the world where there is a cabinet meeting every Sunday. So this gets attention," said Eisen, who was born and raised in northern California.

Additionally, there are 25 cameramen stationed in Israel and the Palestinian territories for Reuters and the Associated Press, which is a disproportionate amount, and therefore there are more images emanating from Israel than other parts of the world.

Eisen believes that "as bad as Israel's image is in the media, the image of the Palestinians is worse. Ever since Hamas has taken over in Gaza, the world sees the Palestinians as being violent.

Eisen noted that Palestinian spokeswoman Hanan Ashrawi is not in the media as much as she used to be. "Hanan Ashrawi is having difficulty with her own [Palestinian] leadership. Many moderate speakers are taking a backseat because if you look at the Palestinian people right now, there are defining their own future, and it's not clear [what is going to emerge]," she said.

In the Second Lebanon War, Eisen said, there were three parallel stories. The first was the story that the Israeli media were telling, which was about Israel responding in a just war to the kidnappings of Israeli soldiers by Hezbollah. It was also the story of Israel having to ready the home front in response to rocket attacks in the north. "The Israeli media focused on whether the bomb shelters were ready," said Eisen.

But four days into the war the story changed for the international media, which began focusing on foreign nationals having to leave Lebanon, and whether Israel's response in Lebanon was proportional. The third parallel story was one that was shown by the Arab media, which was that "Israel wasn't managing to make Hezbollah disappear and look how well Hezbollah was doing.

"There was a real disconnect between the story in the Israeli media and the foreign media," she said.

According to Eisen, the best thing that supporters of Israel can do, "is to talk about Israel, and give the personal perspective of what life is like there."

When asked about the corruption scandal that has ensnared Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, Eisen said, "I believe in Ehud Olmert as a person. I worked for him. I don't believe the allegations against him."

She said that she stopped working for Olmert a short while ago, "This had nothing to do with any allegations against him. I left work so that I could see my children more. I couldn't keep all of the long hours," she said.

More doctors quit in life support case

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Two critical care doctors have quit working at Winnipeg's Grace Hospital rather than obey a court order to treat Sam Golubchuk, an 84-year-old Orthodox Jewish man who has been on life support since last fall.

A third doctor has refused to act as an attending physician to Golubchuk, but is still working in the hospital's intensive care unit.

Golubchuk is alive today because his children obtained an injunction last November preventing doctors from removing his life support against the religious beliefs and wishes of his family. The injunction requires doctors to treat Golubchuk until a trial takes place in the case. It's scheduled to begin Sept. 15.

The resignation of Dr. Anand Kumar and Dr. Bojan Paunovic leaves only four other critical care doctors working at the hospital. One of them is Dr. David Easton, who refuses to attend to Golubchuk. All three doctors have privileges to work at other hospitals in the city.

In a letter to the hospital, Kumar wrote: "If we honestly continue to follow the court mandate… we will likely have to continue to surgically hack away at his [Golubchuk's] infected flesh in order to keep infection at bay." He added that continued treatment " is tantamount to torture."

Heidi Graham, spokesperson for the Winnipeg Regional Health Authority (WRHA), which oversees the hospital, said on June 16, that the "WRHA and the hospital have now developed a plan whereby there will be one attending critical care physician of record for this patient [Golubchuk] and that doctor will be supported by two other critical-care specialists. The other critical care specialists are then free to schedule rotations as they wish at the Grace. This will ensure that all patients at the Grace have proper care at all times."

Neil Kravetsky, the family's lawyer, said that "Dr. Paunovic and Dr. Kumar are the original defendants sued for trying to end Mr Golubchuk's life. Their actions now are self serving… The hospital better treat him [Golubchuk], because if not, it is in contempt of court."

Miriam Geller, Golubchuk's daughter says, "This is just a ploy. Dr. Paunovic is head of the ICU at Grace, so how could he quit? I was at the hospital the other day and they called Dr. Kumar on the overhead system, even though this was after the [supposed] day that he quit. This is all a ploy [by these doctors] to do what they want to do. If there's a court order… are they laughing in front of the judge?"

Nurse who served in 1948 shines the light on others

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

"Listen, I'm not the type that likes to talk about myself," said Miriam Robinson, a veteran of Israel's War of Independence, who would rather sing the praises of the men and women she fought with.

But despite her reluctance to talk about herself, Robinson, who chose not to reveal her age for personal reasons, was eager to share stories about events she witnessed and experienced while fighting to establish a Jewish state in 1948.

Sitting in her apartment, shuffling through old photos, news articles and stories she wrote, Robinson, née Miriam Erlich, began her story when she arrived in Kfar Saba, Israel, from Poland in 1930 with her parents and siblings.

"Kfar Saba didn't have streets, didn't have nothing. The only thing we had was running water," she said, adding that Kfar Saba was a small community of about 3,000 people.

She said her family had a hard time making ends meet, and just a few years after moving to Israel, her father was ready to move back to Poland.

"My mother said, 'No way. I'd rather die here from hunger with my children than be called a dirty Jew.'

"On Sundays, they used to throw stones into Jewish homes in Poland, and my brother was only six when a [Polish man] who was drunk ran after him with a knife, trying to kill him."

Robinson recalled life before Israel's independence, when Palestine was ruled by the British Mandate. She said it was illegal to build kibbutzim, but if a group of people managed to erect a roof on four posts before the British got wind of their plans, they couldn't remove them from the land.

The first kibbutz she remembers was Kibbutz Hakovesh, which was founded by Zionist youth from the Hashomer Hatzair and Hechalutz movements just north of Kfar Saba, but she helped establish Kibbutz Eyal, which was just five minutes from her home.

"We got a piece of land north of the sea of Galilee near the Hula Lake, in '47... We went at night, quietly, and everyone was afraid to open their mouths so the British wouldn't [find out]."

She said they erected a couple of wooden shacks and "it was de facto. They couldn't do anything, the British, once there were houses there."

Miriam Robinson 60 years ago

The conversation often shifted from her own experiences, to those of others she admired and respected. She spoke often about her two older brothers.

Shimshon, the eldest, was described as a gentle boy, a bookworm, but also as a brave fighter in the Alexandroni brigade in the 1948 war.

But it was her second brother, Elazar, who was "the bravest of the brave. There weren't many like him," she said.

"Since he was 10 or 12, he was very active [in the underground movement]. One day we were sitting in the middle of the street. They weren't paved streets – just sand and pebbles. And we were digging, and suddenly, I found a bullet and another bullet and another. I ran to Elazar and said, 'Look! Bullets!'

"He comes, looks and said, 'OK put it back. Tomorrow morning we'll come back and dig everything out.'

"The next morning, we came, we started to dig, but nothing was there. I came back to him, and I said, 'Look, there's no bullets.' And he said, 'What bullets? I don't know about bullets. Forget about it.'

"At night, the Haganah came and took the bullets... He was the first to know everything."

She recalled many adventures during which her brother could have been hurt, but he always escaped harm. The irony, she said, is that after having escaped so many dangers unhurt, he succumbed to cancer at the age of 50.

Robinson, like her brothers, was also involved in the underground movement.

"When the unrest broke, I went back to the kibbutz and took first-aid courses. We were trained with rifles. This was Haganah training, but I joined the Palmach right after," she said, adding that she served as a nurse.

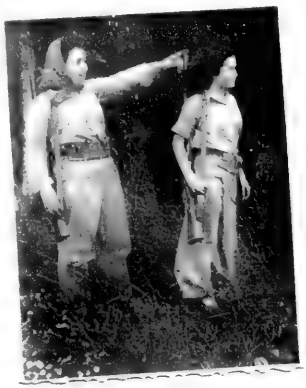
"I didn't even have shoes. They gave uniforms but not shoes. I went with sandals."

She said when she learned of Israel's independence in May 1948, she was happy, as were most others.

"But you know what? My mother was a very clever woman. She worried, and said, 'Yes, it's nice to have independence, but we are going to have a lot of trouble.' She saw it."

She said that even before the Arab nations attacked Israel, some mothers were crying when their children went off to fight, but her mother knew what had to be done.

"My mother told us, 'Children, we have to fight. If we die, we die with dignity and not like cowards...' We didn't think we were going to win this time. Really. But I knew that if I died, I would die with dignity."



Robinson, on the right, stood guard for the Haganah

They were so gentle and nice in one way and so courageous in another way. You wouldn't believe that the people were so strong and powerful."

She told a story of a man named Rafi, who was shot in the stomach five times. The doctors weren't able to remove the five bullets from his stomach, yet once his wounds healed, he went back to fight in the war.

Always looking to shine the light on others who contributed to Israel's victory, Robinson spoke enthusiastically about two men she only knew as Ra'anana and Gavrush, who, she feels, don't get enough recognition for helping to open the Burma Road to Jerusalem.

"Jerusalem was under siege and you couldn't go in or out. The situation in Jerusalem was awful, so three commanders of the Palmach – two of them were Ra'anana and Gavrush – went up with the Jeep... and they helped open the Burma Road and Jerusalem was saved," she said.

"Gavrush was a little more rough, but Ra'anana was so gentle and so kind to everybody. He was outstanding. You would never believe that behind that was such a rock of a man."

Robinson, who served in the army until 1949, shortly after Israeli Prime Minister David Ben-Gurion dismantled the Palmach and dispersed the soldiers to different cities, met and married a Canadian from Winnipeg who was a Machal volunteer.

She currently lives in Toronto and has two sons – one lives in Ottawa, and the other in Spain.

It's been almost 60 years since Robinson served in the army, but her conviction that it is important to fight for the Jewish state is as strong today as it was in 1948.

"It wasn't a sacrifice. It was a part of us."

When she served as a nurse during the war, Robinson said that at their hospital – which was an abandoned building they cleaned and prepared to serve as a hospital – they didn't even have gowns for the wounded. They would sleep in their undershirts and underwear. They didn't have enough dishes, so the wounded ate in shifts. The water came from a well.

Robinson also helped establish a collecting station for wounded soldiers in the Negev in December 1948 to treat the soldiers who fought in Operation Horev to expel the Egyptian army from the area.

But one of the memories that stands out in her mind from her experience as a nurse was that her patients never complained and remained dignified despite their pain.

"They didn't cry, they didn't scream. They just bit into their hands or their lip and whispered for something to ease the pain.

New project to promote Yiddish in Toronto

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Yiddish Canada in the 20th Century, a new initiative to help groups organize a variety of programs to highlight the contribution of Yiddish language and culture to the fabric of Canadian and Jewish life, is in the planning stages.

Representatives from Toronto synagogues, schools, libraries and landsmanshaften came together recently to begin planning activities for Yiddish Canada in the 20th Century, which will take place throughout the city from September into 2009.

The project is being spearheaded by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's committee for Yiddish and centre for Jewish knowledge and heritage, both of which will partner with community organizations to organize the activities for the initiative.

Susan Jackson, who heads the centre for Jewish knowledge and heritage, welcomed the participants.

"The remarkable thing about Yiddish," Jackson said, "is how it has enriched Ashkenazi culture well beyond the spoken language. Literature, music and ethnic identity have been deepened through Yiddish culture, a culture which did not end with the immigration of eastern Europe's Jews to Canada and other shores.

"A vibrant Yiddish culture was planted within our borders, beginning in the early 1900s and ending with an influx of Holocaust survivors in the late '40s and '50s. The multicultural fabric of Canada has been profoundly impacted by Yiddish, which is still being taught, sung and read today."

Committee for Yiddish chair Shelly Friedman outlined the concept behind programming for Yiddish Canada in the 20th Century and spoke about how the community organizations would be assisted by the committee for Yiddish in implementing the projects.

Ethel Cooper, co-ordinator of the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's committee for Yiddish

"The project was very well received," said committee for Yiddish co-ordinator Ethel Cooper. "There was enthusiasm for the project and its theme and a call for communication and co-operation amongst the attendees."

She added that other organizations that wish to participate in the program will also be offered help.

"When we partner with community groups," Cooper said, "projects do not have to be in Yiddish, as we hope to interest not only Yiddish-speaking individuals but people who are attached to it culturally."

One of the major goals of this project, she said, is to keep the importance of Yiddish alive.

The representatives at the inaugural meeting received information on possible program ideas and suggested presenters. Topics proposed included the Yiddish press, radio, humour, theatre, literature, music and Yiddish in the haredi community.

Friedman told The CJN that the project was created by the committee for Yiddish to celebrate the significance of the Yiddish language and its subsequent enrichment of the tapestry of Canadian life during the past century.

"We should be proud and acknowledge the contributions Jews made during the past century," Friedman said. "These programs will highlight these contributions."

UWO president honoured

By NOAH SLEPKOV
Special to The CJN

Paul Davenport, the president of the University of Western Ontario, was honoured earlier this month by the Jewish National Fund at its annual London Negev Dinner for his "steadfast belief in the importance of diversity, tolerance of ideas, and support for free speech," JNF said.

The June 1 dinner featured a keynote address by Harvard law professor Alan Dershowitz, and it highlighted Davenport's accomplishments during his 14 years as Western's president and his strong relationship with the Jewish community.

"Western has one of the largest representations of Jewish students and faculty in Canada," Sheldon Aaron, one of the dinner's co-chairs, said as he paid tribute to Davenport.

"Paul's support and respect for them, as well as those of Muslim, Christian, Hindu and other faiths, has created an atmosphere of tolerance and understanding that many other Canadian universities can only envy. Paul has promoted a culture at Western where students and faculty are encouraged to express their views in a respectful manner."

Under Davenport's leadership, the average grade of students accepted into Western has increased from 72 per cent to 86 per cent, Aaron said.

He also noted that Davenport has helped to attract approximately $462 million in funding to the university. Many of the university's top donors were at the dinner, including Richard Ivey, Sonia and Arthur Labatt, Seymour Schulich, and the Waks family, who recently supported the establishment of a chair in Jewish history.

Davenport's choice to accept the JNF honour became a topic of contention on campus after a small group of professors publicly urged him to reject it. As well, some 100 protesters from a number of Arab groups, including the Canadian Arab Federation, held a peaceful protest outside the hotel where the dinner was held.

Ironically, the dissent helped publicize the event and even encouraged some faculty members to attend the dinner.

Ben Singer, a UWO professor emeritus of sociology, said "that a lot of university people didn't go to the Negev dinners in the past, because they felt that the dinners were for the financial elite."

But this year, Singer said he, along with a few dozen other faculty members and a large contingent of students, were motivated to come to the dinner.

"I talked to several people who told me that they had not planned on going, and then when they saw what was going on at the campus they decided to go for that reason," Singer said.

Frank Simkevitz, executive director of JNF's Ontario region, said the event was "unquestionably one of the largest Negev dinners in London's history."

Simkevitz attributed the event's success not only to the large campus contingent but to Davenport's gregarious personality and ability to engage people.

"There was a joyous atmosphere throughout the evening which really impressed me," Davenport told The CJN.

"People had gathered not simply to honour me, but also to celebrate the many achievements of the Jewish National Fund and the people of Israel, achievements all the more remarkable because of the very difficult conditions which Israel must deal with every day," he said.

Davenport, born in Summit, N.J., holds honorary degrees from the University of Toronto, the University of Alberta and the International University of Moscow. He has also been named a Knight of the Legion of Honour by the government of France, and is an officer of the Order of Canada.

He has a PhD in economics from the University of Toronto and has taught economics at McGill University. He has also served as president of the University of Alberta.

Israel incapable of threatening Iran, official says in Tehran

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEHRAN — Iran said Monday that Israel doesn't have the ability to threaten it militarily. The remarks came a few days after a U.S. newspaper reported that Israel's air force had apparently rehearsed a potential bombing raid of Iran's nuclear facilities.

Iran and Israel have engaged in a sharp exchange of words this month over suspicions that Tehran is looking to develop nuclear weapons, helping to push global oil prices higher.

"They do not have the capacity to threaten the Islamic Republic of Iran," Iranian Foreign Ministry spokesperson Mohammad Ali Hosseini told a news conference.

He was asked about a New York Times report on Friday that quoted U.S. officials as saying Israeli jets had conducted a long-range Mediterranean exercise this month that appeared to be practice for a mission against Iran.

"They [Israel] have a number of domestic crises, and they want to extrapolate it to cover others. Sometimes they come up with these empty slogans," Hosseini said in comments translated by Iran's English-language Press TV satellite station.

On Sunday, Iran's defence minister accused Israel of "psychological warfare" and said Tehran would give a "devastating" response to any attack.

Mostafa Mohammad Najjar told state television that Iran would strongly counter any hostile action with a destructive response that considered all options, regardless of time and place.

Iran would resort to "all means available" if it was attacked, he said.

"Iran will come up with a devastating… response, without any time limit, to any hostile measure against our country," Najjar was quoted as saying, but he also said Iran would not initiate any tension or conflict

On Saturday, the official Iranian news agency IRNA quoted a government spokesperson as saying the exercises show how Israel jeopardizes global peace and security.

Also on Saturday, an Israeli official told the London-based Times on Saturday that the Iranians should view the exercise as a warning.

"Read the writing on the wall," the official urged Iran. "This was a dress rehearsal, and the Iranians should read the script before they continue with their program for nuclear weapons. If diplomacy does not yield results, Israel will take military steps to halt Tehran's production of bomb-grade uranium."

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's office declined to comment on the reported exercises, but a senior lawmaker in Olmert's Kadima party said Saturday that diplomatic efforts to curb Iran's nuclear program have failed and that the next one to two years will be critical.

MK Tzachi Hanegbi, who heads the Knesset foreign affairs and defence committee, told Israel Radio that the world had to decide how to proceed.

As well, an Israeli military spokesman said of the Times report: "The Israeli Air Force regularly trains for various missions in order to confront and meet the challenges posed by the threats facing Israel."

On Friday, the UN nuclear watchdog chief, Mohamed ElBaradei, said a military strike on Iran would turn the Middle East into a fireball and prompt Tehran to launch a crash course to build nuclear weapons.

Meanwhile, the European Union was scheduled to agree to a new round of sanctions against Iran on Monday over its refusal to meet international demands to curb its nuclear program, the EU's Slovenian presidency said.

"They are on the agenda to be adopted today," a presidency official said of a two-day meeting of EU ministers in Luxembourg that started on Monday.

The 27-member bloc had not detailed the new measures as of Monday, but EU diplomats have said they will target the financial sector and notably Iran's biggest bank, Bank Melli, with an asset and funds freeze.

The application of further sanctions on Iran was placed on the agenda of EU ministers as a so-called "A Point," meaning its adoption is just a formality.

The United States and the EU agreed this month that they're ready to supplement UN sanctions with further measures aimed at ensuring Iranian banks can't support terror activities.

Iran rejects suspicions that it's seeking the atom bomb and claims it has pursued uranium enrichment as part of what it says is a peaceful nuclear program.

Iran said Monday that it was encouraged by common points between separate proposals put forward by it and world powers aimed at defusing a nuclear dispute, but it again dismissed any suggestion of suspending uranium enrichment.

Hosseini said Tehran is studying an offer of economic and other incentives by six major powers trying to convince Iran to halt activity that the West suspects is aimed at making bombs.

But he didn't say when Iran would respond to the incentives proposal by the United States, Russia, China, Britain, Germany and France, which was handed to Tehran by European Union foreign policy chief Javier Solana on June 14.

Iran has put forward its own package of proposals aimed at resolving the row, but diplomats say it ignores global concerns about its enrichment program, which can have both military and civilian uses.

"We believe this common ground is encouraging," Hosseini told a news conference, without elaborating. "We say that this common ground can help with the start of negotiations."

"Time is ripe for these talks and we should not lose this opportunity," he said. "We feel that compared to years past, there is a more pronounced serious will on the side of the other party."

The incentives package offered by the sextet is an updated version of one rejected by Iran in 2006.

Hosseini said Iran would respond to the incentives offer, which includes help in developing a civilian nuclear program and trade benefits, at an "appropriate time," and that it expected the six powers to study Tehran's proposals as well.

Iranian officials have repeatedly rejected stopping enriching uranium as a precondition for negotiations.

Their refusal to do so has drawn three rounds of United Nations sanctions since 2006, and western powers have warned of more punitive measures if Iran rejects the latest offer.

"Suspension of enrichment has no logical reason behind it," Hosseini said. "We believe that no proposals should be made that lead to the Iranian nation being denied its rights."

The United States says it's focusing on diplomatic pressure to thwart Tehran's nuclear ambitions, but it has not ruled out military action as a last resort.

The price of U.S. light crude for August delivery rose on Monday, partly because of concerns over the report that Israel's air force had rehearsed a possible bombing run against Iran.

On Friday, oil prices jumped more than $3 on reports of rising tensions between Israel and Iran.

Energy experts are concerned any conflict in Iran could lead to a shutdown of the Strait of Hormuz, a waterway separating Iran from the Arabian Peninsula, through which roughly 40 per cent of the world's traded oil is shipped.

Schalit family won't drop court bid against ceasefire

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The parents of abducted Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit vowed Monday to press on with their legal bid to keep the Gaza-Israel crossings closed, despite apparent pressure from the Defence Ministry.

The opening of the crossings is part of the ceasefire deal between Israel and Gaza rulers Hamas, which came into effect Thursday.

The High Court of Justice was set Monday to rule on the petition. Defence officials say they believe the court will opt against interfering with the government's plans.

Upon reviewing the petition Sunday, the court ordered the state to keep the border crossings to Gaza closed until noon Monday. The temporary injunction was issued to give the government time to clarify the terms of the Gaza cease-fire.

The petition – filed against the State of Israel, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni and Defence Minister Ehud Barak – asks the High Court to instruct the government to explain why the truce between Israel and Hamas was not conditioned on Schalit's release.

Since Schalit's abduction in June 2006, his parents, Noam and Aviva, have met many times with government and security officials, including six times with Olmert and three with Barak. According to the petition, during these meetings the Schalit family was promised that any ceasefire agreement would include Gilad's release.

The parents say that keeping the crossings closed is Israel's only means of pressuring Hamas to release their son, and that Israel should hold on to the option of opening the crossings as its only effective bargaining chip vis-a-vis Hamas in talks for Schalit's release.

Noam Schalit, Gilad's father

The court also instructed the cabinet to brief Schalit's parents and tell them how the talks have progressed so far and why the government believes it should open the crossings without first securing Schalit's release.

On Sunday night, Amos Gilad, who is handling talks for Schalit's release as head of the Defence Ministry's political department, met with the Schalits to tell them Israel would not cede any leverage on Hamas by opening the crossings, and that the move would "improve the atmosphere" between the two sides. It would thus benefit efforts to bring home the corporal.

Olmert was scheduled to discuss the matter with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak later this week. Olmert is expected to travel to Cairo for the meeting, along with Ofer Dekel, the government's chief co-ordinator for prisoner deals.

In his review of the post-ceasefire situation at the weekly cabinet meeting, Yuval Diskin, head of the Shin Bet security service, said the price Hamas is demanding for Schalit is not expected to drop following Israel's ceasefire agreement with the organization.

Diskin told the ministers that "Hamas does not regard the deal for Schalit's release as part of the truce." Justice Minister Daniel Friedmann criticized the current deal, calling the fact that opening the crossings is not conditioned on Schalit's release "systemic lunacy."

Defence Minister Barak said efforts to win Schalit's release might fare better during a period of quiet than during fighting, but said at the cabinet meeting that making concessions to Hamas, such as opening the borders, was not likely to be the move that brings him home.

"Those who think we can bring about Schalit's release by opening or closing the crossings are harbouring illusions," he said.

Sarkozy's words 'touch our hearts'

Netanyahu's remarks, in which he labelled "radical Islam as the greatest threat to the free world," prompted angry catcalls from the Arab MKs, who heckled the former prime minister.

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert applauded Sarkozy for his "determination to root out anti-Semitism in France," and said ties between France and Israel have seen a "revival under your leadership.

"Your words of support for Israel touch our hearts," he said.

Sarkozy, who arrived Sunday for a three-day trip accompanied by an entourage of some 100 businesspeople, cabinet ministers and Jewish leaders, spent the first part of Monday morning at the Yad Vashem Holocaust museum, where he was accompanied by Bruni and Israeli President Shimon Peres.

Prior to Sarkozy's arrival, France promised Israel that it would put the brakes on its rapprochement with Syria until Damascus shows it is willing to distance itself from the axis of extremists, Iran in particular.

During a meeting in Jerusalem Sunday, Sarkozy and Peres discussed Syria. Peres applauded his French counterpart for inviting Syrian President Bashar Assad to a meeting of the Mediterranean nations in Paris on July 13.

The visit, which was to conclude Tuesday afternoon, was also to include meetings for Sarkozy with the parents of Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit, who was abducted to Gaza in 2006. Schalit's father, Noam, is of French extraction, and Gilad holds French citizenship. In his address to the Knesset, Sarkozy offered to assist in efforts to free Schalit and the two Israeli reservists held by Hezbollah since July 2006.

Sarkozy was also to hold talks with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas in Bethlehem, and with Netanyahu in Jerusalem.

The United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism salutes Canada as we mark the anniversary of the country's birth on Canada Day.

Like Canada, United Synagogue is made up of a coalition of like-minded constituent groups, each coming to us with its own traditions and heritage while sharing our fundamental core values. Within the big family of about 700 congregations that is United Synagogue, itself a part of the larger family that is the Conservative movement, each congregation can take what it needs, share what works, and improve those things that need improvement. Each contributes something unique and together we create a vibrant, living Jewish community. Working together, facing and overcoming challenges together, we celebrate our strengths and look forward to a future bright with promise.

We are proud of the strength of our Canadian congregations, which make up a vital part of the Conservative/Masorti movement and our United Synagogue family.

Review Israel-Diaspora ties: Olmert

"For the first time since the destruction of the Second Temple, a majority of the world's Jews live in Israel. We must understand that it is possible that the period of massive immigration to Israel is nearing an end," the Israeli prime minister told the Jewish Agency Board of Governors meeting in Jerusalem Sunday. "The time has come to reconsider the link between Israel and Jewish communities around the world," he said. Olmert called for crafting a new approach to Israel-Diaspora relations. "Our main goal is to strengthen Jewish education in Jewish communities, including the study of Hebrew; increase awareness regarding Jewish culture and heritage; instil Jewish values; and deepen the links between world Jewish communities and the State of Israel," he said.

Sarkozy seeks meeting

France's president is trying to arrange a meeting between Ehud Olmert and Bashar Assad in Paris. The Israeli and Syrian leaders are to attend a July 13 conference of European and Mediterranean countries in the French capital, staying on for Bastille Day on July 14. Diplomatic sources said that French President Nicolas Sarkozy wants to host a private meeting between Olmert and Assad amid the events, which would build on the indirect talks their envoys have been holding in Turkey.

Israel seeks Lebanon talks

Israel says the disputed Shebaa Farms would be on the table if Lebanon is willing to enter direct peace talks. Israel made the offer to hold talks last week. Lebanon and Hezbollah claim Shebaa Farms, a small piece of border land, but the United Nations says it belongs to Syria. Israel did not turn over the land to Lebanon when it withdrew from the southern part of the country in 2000. Hezbollah says it continues to arm its supporters due to Israel's continued presence there.

Killers spared charges

Israeli prosecutors have decided not to file homicide charges against Arabs who lynched a Jewish terrorist in 2005. The State Attorney's Office announced that 12 Israeli Arabs who had been under investigation for their role in the death of Natan Eden-Zada, who went on a racist shooting spree in August 2005, will not face the most serious charges for his killing. Instead, the suspects will be indicted for aggravated assault, State Attorney's Office sources said. Eden-Zada, an army deserter and far-right extremist, shot up a bus in the Israeli Arab town of Shfaram, killing four people. He was overpowered by Arab onlookers and beaten to death, with police apparently powerless to extricate him. The prospect of trials for lynch mob members has put more strain on race relations in the Jewish state.

Arms sale opposed

Israel is reportedly opposing the proposed U.S. sale of arms to Lebanon. The Bush administration has until now restricted its assistance to Lebanon's pro-western government to training. But in the face of increased challenges from Hezbollah, the terror group that maintains its own army, some Bush officials now want to end a ban on selling weapons to an enemy of Israel. The deal, according to Ha'aretz, would be worth $400 million (US) and would include anti-tank missiles. The Israeli Defence Ministry's liaison with the United States reportedly told Pentagon officials the weapons could be turned against Israel.

Jewish men charged

Two Jews from the community of Susya, in the West Bank – both male, and one a minor – were arrested in connection with an attack on Palestinian farmers that was captured on video. The arrests followed the release of video by the B'Tselem human rights group showing the beating of a Palestinian farmer and his aunt and uncle.

Singer's debut CD has an award-winning producer

By SHLOMIT KRIGER
Special to The CJN

Thornhill native Vivian Nicole Tesler, a 20-year-old singer, dancer and actor, is currently working on her debut pop-rock album slated for release by fall.

"I sometimes have to pinch myself to check if this is really happening," said Tesler between sips of a soy latte during a recent interview at a Toronto Second Cup. "Yet I was a dreamer, and I knew I would make it happen somehow.

"It's a calling. Just like my older sister, who's a doctor, wanted to be that since she was five, it's just something that you know."

Viviane Nicole Tesler

Dancing since she was five and singing since age 10, Tesler participated in several dance competitions each year until she turned 18, as well as appearing in music videos and commercials.

Juggling school, family and her social life wasn't easy. While her friends hung out after school, she came home to eat dinner and then headed to dance lessons, struggling to complete her homework in her free time.

It was difficult for her friends to understand her commitment to her passions, which made her feel different, she said.

Following high school, Tesler decided to pursue singing more seriously. She attended the Randolph Academy for the Performing Arts, where she spent 10 hours a day honing her dancing, singing, and acting skills, and got lead roles in some of the school's musicals.

A while later, she headed to Orlando, Fla., where she won the Fashion Rocks dance competition and earned a scholarship to the Broadway Dance Center in New York. However, visa problems led her to decline the scholarship.

Instead, having caught the eye of Oscar-winning producer John Daly at the competition, she took up his offer to come to Los Angeles, where he helped solve the visa troubles that were preventing her from landing long-term work in the United States.

Tesler got some work in Los Angeles, but she said her manager didn't seem to be working hard at promoting her. She soon ended up suffering with an ulcer, for which she was treated in Toronto.

Thinking she may have to put her dreams aside, she decided to intern as a paralegal at a law firm and later worked at a marketing firm.

Yet fate pulled her back into the entertainment industry six months ago when her parents happened to bump into wills lawyer and professional songwriter Les Kotzer at a local restaurant.

Knowing Tesler was a performer, he asked about her, and her mother mentioned that she had performed the national anthem at the Toronto Marathon earlier that day.

Kotzer listened to some of Tesler's songs on her website and soon decided to work with her. He teamed her up with composer Lewis Manne and arranger Wendy Watson, who have written numerous songs for television, including the theme song for the hit television show Degrassi.

A belief in herself and 'thick skin' help singer succeed

Her album's producer is Greg Kavanagh, former member of techno group BKS and winner of seven Juno Awards and 11 Grammy Awards. Tesler is currently seeking a manager to add to her team.

Tesler has been influenced by both contemporary and older artists, including Liza Minnelli, Beyonce, Kelly Clarkson, Billie Holiday, the Supremes, and Judy Garland. With her pop-rock sound, she hopes to bring back "old school" style with a fresh twist, she said.

As she's been performing most of her life, Tesler is at home on stage. "When I'm on stage, that performer thing kicks in," she said.

While Tesler admits that she sometimes feels the pressure to meet others' expectations in the entertainment industry, she has learned to remain true to herself.

"I feel the pressure primarily with body image, but I felt it more when I was younger, more on the diet side. If someone says anything now, I won't sacrifice my health for this.

"You have to be very strong within your beliefs and not let this business eat you alive. It's tough, though, because it's your livelihood."

Tesler credits the values that her parents instilled in her while she grew up in a Conservative Jewish home for keeping her level-headed and out of trouble.

She said the most important thing that other aspiring artists should keep in mind is to believe in themselves.

"However many times people slap you in the face, turn the cheek. If I've ever come across people saying they didn't like what I was doing, I knew that's one opinion amongst many. You have to realize you can't please the world.

"I've had lots of people tell me, 'You're super talented,' and you have to take that with a grain of salt, too. If you let that get to your head, you're never going to progress as an artist," Tesler said.

"I've also learned that talent can take you so far, but perseverance will take you the rest of the way, along with a thick skin."

Tesler said, laughing, that her egotistical side says she would "like to win it all and do it all."

But "if that doesn't happen, I would like to be singing internationally and have people enjoy my music and allow me to do what I do best," she allowed.

"You have to be grateful for the people who were there to help you in the beginning and those who keep you there. Always stay humble, because all of this could be taken away from you in two seconds."

Tesler will perform at Kathedral in downtown Toronto on July 11.

Two survivors reunite in post-Holocaust drama

By RITA POLIAKOV
CJN Intern

Young directors, actors and writers usually dominate at the Toronto Fringe Festival. And then there's 61-year-old Michael Posner and his over 60 cast.

"Most people who are part of the Fringe Festival are usually 30 and under. There's two old guys coming to the Fringe," said Posner of the cast of his play Damages.

Posner, a Globe and Mail arts reporter, has been writing plays for about 10 years, but Damages is the first one to be staged.

"The other plays [I've written] are harder to produce. One of the plays has 35 characters. I guess the others either weren't good enough, were too big to produce or too expensive," he said.

The concept of Posner's one-act play is simple. Damages explores the relationship between two men who survived the Holocaust together. An act of betrayal has kept them estranged for 30 years. In the drama, Ezra, played by Harvey Atkin, comes to visit Jacob, a rabbi, who is played by Howard Jerome. Jacob demands damages for injuries, as per Jewish law.

"It's about the search for forgiveness, though I'm not sure they get there [in the end]. I guess it's about how deep family pain can be and how difficult it is to deal with," Posner said.

"I don't want it to be perceived as a Holocaust play, it's a post-Holocaust play. It's more about personal sin committed by one of the two men."

When casting for the play, it wasn't long before Posner found Atkin and Jerome, who are both veteran Canadian actors.

"In theory, we had infinite choice, but in reality I knew of Harvey Atkin… He's in total control of his acting, both of his vocal equipment and his emotional equipment," he said. "[Then] I asked friends and colleagues for recommendations and Howard's name was used by several. He's just a pro."

Atkin's portrayal of Ezra, a man who turned his back on religion, is fuelled by personal experience.

"Ezra and I have gone through a couple of things that are quite similar. My wife is a child of the Holocaust," he said.

Jerome also uses personal experience to create his role as a rabbi.

"There are aspects to this character that I relate to very much. I even look like a rabbi," Jerome said. "I've played in many different Holocaust-related plays. I have a really big grasp of the madness of it."

Jerome has been studying the Kabbalah for the last 17 years, which helps with his role, he said.

"I've been really immersed… I know a lot about synagogue life and a lot about rabbis."

Jerome believes that while non-Jewish actors could play his role, his connection to Judaism adds depth to the character.

"I'm an actor, I play Italians, Greeks, all kinds of characters. That's the actor's task, that's the job. [But] do [non-Jewish actors] feel it as much in their blood? I don't think so, because it literally is in the consciousness of our people. It does touch me more deeply," he said.

Posner agrees. "I think a non-Jewish actor could do it, it wouldn't trouble me. I sort of felt intuitively that it might get a more sympathetic hearing from a Jewish actor. [Jewish actors] might be able to connect with the material more completely than a non-Jewish actor," he said.

According to Posner, the situation is similar for writers.

"I don't want to say that a non-Jew couldn't have written the play, but I think for me I'd have problems writing it if I were a non-Jew. I'm a secular Jew, not a shul-going Jew, and yet it's part of my DNA," he said.

HAROLD GREEN JEWISH THEATRE COMPANY SHINES WITH SISTERS ROSENSWEIG

By the time you read this, the Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company's remarkable production of The Sisters Rosensweig will have finished its roughly two-week run at the St. Lawrence Centre's Jane Mallet Theatre; the last performance was on June 22. How wonderful for a relatively new company to blossom forth with such a rich and balanced production.

Director Jim Warren and artistic directors Avery Saltzman and David Eisner obviously had excellence in their sights when they set out to stage this semi-autobiographical play from the late Pulitzer Prize-winning playwright Wendy Wasserstein. The set was impressive and unstinting, the direction superbly nuanced, the cast (led by Rosemary Dunsmore, Linda Kash and Sarah Dodd) unfaltering. I'll bet their production would have held up well against the first production that premièred on Broadway in 1993 and ran for 18 months.

As the city's only professional Jewish theatre company, the HGJTC has proven to be a great addition to the city's cultural life, not only with this production but with its first offering, Martin Sherman's Rose, which recently received five Dora award nominations. We look forward to more great things from the Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company. For more information, visit www.hgjewishtheatre. com.

Unsung Canadian Hero: God's Red Poet: The Life of Kenneth Leslie tells the story of a Nova Scotia-born poet and political activist who stood firmly with the Axis powers and against the oppression of the Jews in the United States during the 1930s and '40s.

Born in 1892, Leslie was a child prodigy, an assistant preacher and an acclaimed poet who won a Governor General's Award in 1938. Troubled by American isolationism and the rise of pro-fascist and anti-Semitic sentiment in the United States in the late 1930s, he launched a progressive journal of religion and politics and worked to eliminate anti-Semitic references from American educational texts.

A socialist, Leslie attracted the ire of Senator Joseph McCarthy and the FBI in the Cold War era, and returned in 1949 to his native Nova Scotia, where he died in 1974. God's Red Poet, by Halifax filmmaker Chuck Lapp, makes a convincing case for Leslie as one of Canada's unsung heroes. LA rabbi helps youth through surfing

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Nachum Shifren is a most unusual Chabad rabbi.

He helps disadvantaged high school students in Los Angeles by teaching them the joys of surfing in the Pacific Ocean.

Rabbi Shifren is the subject of an interesting Vision TV documentary, The Surfing Rabbi, which will be broadcast on June 27 at 10:30 p.m and again on June 30 at 3:30 p.m.

It is part of Vision TV's "Extreme Clergy" series, which follows pastors, ministers, priests and rabbis as they attempt to bring social justice to their respective environments.

A lean, athletic, amiable man in his mid-40s, he considers surfing an integral component of his "holistic growth."

Raised in a secular household, he credits surfing with drawing him into religion. "It enables you to reach beyond your limitations," he says.

Rabbi Shifren got hooked on the popular sport after watching Gidget, the 1959 Hollywood movie starring Sandra Dee and James Darren.

"I just got completely sucked into surfing," he says.

What he did not realize then was that Gidget, a blonde and shapely surfer, was actually modelled on a nice Jewish girl named Cathy Zuckerman, who appears briefly in The Surfing Rabbi.

'Sucked into surfing'

The film glosses over many biographical details, never mentioning that Rabbi Shifren was born into an assimilated Jewish family in the San Fernando Valley, that he served in the Israeli army and that he lived in an Orthodox commune in Israel.

Instead, The Surfing Rabbi focuses on his association with five inner-city youths who are willing to try surfing. Four are Hispanics and one is an African American.

They live in rough neighbourhoods infested by gangs, seared by violence and a drug culture and far from the ocean.

Rabbi Shifren wants to help them by ensuring that they do not drop out of school.

Rabbi Nachum Shifren

On a chilly December day, he and the students travel by bus to Malibu beach, and there they encounter the majesty of the sea.

After the rabbi gives them a pep talk and a demonstration, they venture into the cold water.

And lo and behold, the waves enchant them.

"I felt the rush," exclaims one guy.

"I felt free out there," declares a girl.

Rabbi Shifren has obviously "converted" them and done a mitzvah.

Novelist's take on Manhattan rivals Bellow, Roth, Mailer

By NORMAN RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

Bookstore shelves are full this season of sharp-looking new editions, an unusually ripe spring it seems, for hardcover novels by new and established writers. To stand out in the crowd, an author needs stand-out reviews, and it is Joseph O'Neill's Netherland (Pantheon) that has grabbed the loudest praise, both from reviewers and O'Neill's writerly colleagues.

Norman Ravvin

Wrapped in a muted and handsome, old-fashioned dust jacket – bearing a bucolic image of cricketers beneath a bower, the iconic Manhattan skyline in the distance – Netherland's advance praise includes this from Jonathan Safran Foer: "Joseph O'Neill has managed to paint the most famous city in the world, and the most familiar concept in the world (love), in an entirely new way."

Praise for Netherland has highlighted the city (New York) over love, the implication being that O'Neill's take on Manhattan rivals the great novelistic triumphs of Saul Bellow, Philip Roth, Norman Mailer and Don DeLillo. Manhattan, the centre of postwar culture and power, presents itself as the novelist's grandest challenge.

Like others before him, O'Neill makes use of the city as a stage for what Roth once called the "American berserk," the antic reality of urban life to which fiction can barely hold a candle. The stakes on this theme were upped after Sept. 11, 2001, when New York came to represent not only American possibilities, but the target of hatreds emanating from afar.

I've yet to read a post-Sept. 11 novel that rises to the expectations set by critics. The catalogue of these efforts is growing, with efforts by Martin Amis, DeLillo, Safran Foer, Jay McInerney and, however obliquely, Roth in his recent Exit Ghost. One can't help feeling that these efforts have appeared too quickly, just as the rush to memorialize the events at Ground Zero has lead to a logjam of disagreement among varied players, which include victims' families, the New York Port Authority and Manhattan real estate moguls.

O'Neill has let nearly seven years pass before grappling with the dark but recent past, and he, like Roth, approaches the quandaries of post-Sept. 11 New York obliquely. His narrator is a Dutch-born transplanted Londoner named Hans van den Broek, who finds himself living with his wife and child in the Chelsea Hotel when their apartment in lower Manhattan is made unliveable by the disaster.

The events of that crisp fall morning have blanketed the city in an "unfathomable and catastrophic atmosphere," Hans tells us, leaving his family "holed up" at the Chelsea "in a kind of paralysis even after we'd received permission from the authorities to return to our loft in Tribeca."

Hans is a detached observer of all this, but his wife is gravely changed, consumed by "fears of her own, in particular the feeling in her bones that Times Square, where the offices of her law firm were situated, would be the site of the next attack." Hans' most heightened expression of existential angst includes his concern over "whether we were in a pre-apocalyptic situation, like the European Jews in the 1930s or the last citizens of Pompeii, or whether our situation was merely near-apocalyptic, like that of the Cold War inhabitants of New York, London, Washington and, for that matter, Moscow."

Even "near-apocalyptic" is too strong a term to describe Hans' predicament. Though his wife does flee back to London with their son, Hans stays on in New York for the bulk of Netherland, musing about his quiet Dutch childhood, the strange energy of his work as an equities analyst and, more importantly, a recovered enthusiasm for cricket, the sport he learned to love as a youth.

Enthusiasm is too light a word here – love affair, great obsession, fanatical attachment would all fit – as O'Neill devotes long passages to detailed, almost philosophical evocations of the cricket life. Hans is reinitiated into a cricketer's devotions by the mysterious Chuck Ramkissoon, a businessman whose spare time is spent promoting the wonders of cricket to Americans. It is this goal, and the connection with a weekend cricket league, which draw Hans back to memories of "marvellously shorn Surrey village greens – the smell of grass when mown in May."

O'Neill is as devoted to the intricacies of cricket as Roth was to glove making in his 1998 novel American Pastoral, and as DeLillo was to the hidden world of graffiti artists in his 1997 masterpiece Underworld. These two books inform O'Neill's goals in Netherland, but while Roth and DeLillo remain focused on American life, the depiction of cricket takes Hans back to England and its colonies, where cricket is a cultural touchstone. In repeated references to the catch phrase, "That's just not cricket," Hans recognizes that the sport, with its arcane rules and code of behaviour, offers not only exercise and camaraderie but a code of ethics.

Ultimately, Netherland aims to reaffirm community, whether on the cricket field or in the privacy of family life. At the novel's end, we find Hans far from Manhattan, appreciating "horizons previously unseen," which prophesies "extraordinary promise." To its credit, Netherland is not one of the recent cynical efforts to respond in fiction to the dark events of this new century. But the reader may feel, too, that in its characters' flight from New York City, the novel dodges what it proposes as its main theme.

Norman Ravvin's books include the story collections Sex, Skyscrapers and Standard Yiddish and the novel Lola by Night. He is chair of the Concordia University Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies.

New Presbyterian statement angers groups

By BEN HARRIS
JTA

NEW YORK — Just days before it was due to consider a range of motions on the Middle East at its biennial convention, the Presbyterian Church USA released a document on combating anti-Jewish ideas. But Jewish organizational leaders say the statement is "infused with the very bias" it purports to condemn.

The document, "Vigilance Against anti-Jewish Bias In the Pursuit of Israeli-Palestinian Peace," aims to help Presbyterians advance existing church policies opposing Israel's occupation and the construction of the West Bank separation barrier, while avoiding anti-Semitic and anti-Jewish rhetoric.

"The purpose of this resource is to help Presbyterians guard against anti-Jewish bias, even as they make a strong stand for justice, and work in sustained ways for peace," the document reads.

But to some Jewish ears, the document lays blame for the conflict squarely with Israel, avoids any substantive treatment of Arab support for terrorism, and they say it's yet another church statement that appears to hold Israel responsible for the violence directed against it.

An unusually large coalition of 13 Jewish organizations – the Anti-Defamation League, the American Jewish Committee, B'nai B'rith International, and the major bodies of the Conservative and Reform movements among them – harshly denounced the document last week.

The document's release has generated fear that years of Jewish-Presbyterian dialogue following pro-divestment votes in 2004 and 2006 have yielded little fruit.

A feeling of betrayal was evident in a separate protest from the leaders of the Reform, Conservative and Reconstructionist synagogue associations, who wrote to the clerk of the Presbyterian Church, Rev. Cliff Kirkpatrick, warning the document "marks a new low-point" in intercommunal relations.

In the letter, the leaders say the statement, which replaces an earlier one that was welcomed by the Jewish community, has generated "deep suspicion" that the Presbyterians are engaging in a "bait and switch."

Presbyterian officials did not respond to requests from JTA for comment. But Rev. Charles Henderson, editor of the interfaith publication Cross Currents and a member of Presbyterians Concerned for Jewish and Christian Relations, said the document's authors were not being deceitful. Henderson shares the concerns of Jewish leaders, but thinks the church's pro-Palestinian factions were responsible for amendments to the original document.

Rabbi Eric Yoffie, president of the Union for Reform Judaism, said, "A paper that supposedly is dealing with removing anti-Jewish bias in fact becomes a paper on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. If you read it through, that's really the major theme. And it presents that conflict in a terribly one-sided way. Ultimately, the anti-Semitism part seems in many cases like an afterthought."

Particularly galling to Yoffie was a lengthy quotation lifted from a recent speech in which he urged Jews to avoid alliances with conservative Christian Zionists like Pastor John Hagee. In that speech, he asserted that they don't have Israel's true interests at heart. The Presbyterians cited Yoffie to support their opposition to Christian Zionists whose beliefs, the document says, "negatively affect" Israelis and Palestinians.

"What infuriates me here is they quoted that and embedded it in a doctrine that is so hostile to Israel," Yoffie said.

In 2004, the Presbyterians became the first Protestant church to endorse divestment from companies doing business in Israel. The vote prompted a flurry of Jewish outreach, leading the church to retreat partially in 2006 with its call for engagement with companies engaging in peaceful pursuits.

After working to help defeat several divestment motions at the recent general assembly of the Methodist Church, Jewish leaders were hopeful that the divestment push could be similarly quashed at the Presbyterian conclave, which is going on this week in San Jose, Calif.

But the release of the new document has darkened the forecast. It updates an earlier statement on the same subject, released in May, that addressed more fully Christian complicity in anti-Semitism and the tendency of Palestinian liberation theology to displace Jews from the biblical story of the Exodus.

In the liberation narrative, Palestinians are also sometimes compared to Jesus on the cross, which implicitly brands Israelis as Christ-killers, in an echo of classic anti-Semitic charges.

Israel, Jordan support Red-Dead Sea canal proposal

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Special to The CJN

AMMAN, Jordan — The depletion of the Dead Sea and the pollution of the Jordan River are common problems to Israel and Jordan.

As a result, Israel and Jordan both support the building of a $3-billion canal between the Red Sea and Dead Sea.

King Abdullah has given his enthusiastic support to the proposed canal, to be built by a group of Israeli and international businessmen and bankers.

The planned "Valley of Peace" initiative, which has been advocated by Israeli President Shimon Peres, would begin with the building of a 166-kilometre-long canal between Israel and Jordan.

The canal would desalinate the water; produce hydroelectric power; yield clean water; and create jobs and booms in tourism for Jordanians, Palestinians and Israelis. There could be a significant increase in the number of new hotels in the Dead Sea area in both Jordan and Israel, as well.

The water crisis in Jordan is apparent as one travels throughout the country.

Dieter Viewerger, a German archeologist who has been leading the excavation of a site at Tel-Zera, in the far north of Jordan, for eight years, said that the country is desperately water-poor. The Tel-Zera site, part of an ancient trade route from Egypt to Damascus via Israel, dates back 6,000 years.

The region around Tel-Zera used to be full of water and was all naturally green, Viewerger said. "There is still green here, but now the wadis are all dry, since the water is being pumped to the growing city of Irbid."

Irbid, which has a large Palestinian refugee camp, has a population of more than half a million people. Since Palestinians have the highest birth rate in Jordan, "Irbid's need for water is going to grow in the future," Viewerger added.

From the top of Tel-Zera, Viewerger pointed to the large Wadi Arab dam and reservoir that the Jordanians built. "The water in the reservoir isn't for drinking, but is for agricultural use only," he said.

Many Jordanian Palestinians come to the town of Umm Qais to look out longingly onto the view of the Kinneret, Israel's source of fresh water.

"There is no water in Jordan. I never go to the beach in Jordan, because to get to a real beach I'd have to drive to Aqaba. This is eight hours away," Ibrahim Al-Arousan said. "There is only one public beach on the [Jordanian side] of the Dead Sea, and it's not so good to swim in."

Outside the city of Salt, in Wadi ash-Shu'aib, a valley named after the prophet Jethro, there is a small stream. Jordanian families picnic in the area, and they swim in the stream. "It is a very popular place because there are so few places with water here," Mohammad Janajrah, a tour guide, said.

Current annual water consumption in Jordan is about 200 cubic metres per person, compared with 1,800 in Syria, and 7,700 as the world average. About one-third of the water used in Jordan comes from non-sustainable or non-renewable sources. Extensive pumping from the once-abundant Azraq oasis has brought it to the point of collapse. Azraq's salty brine is seeping into the freshwater aquifers and is turning Amman's water brackish.

"We don't drink Amman's tap water," said Caroline Davies, an American geoscience professor who lives in Amman. "In the summer, Amman suffers from acute water shortages. With the influx of about a half a million refugees from Iraq now living here, the demand for water has gone up."

The Jordanian Water Company (Miyahuna) has announced that it will temporarily suspend supplying a house with water if a resident who receives a warning continues to misuse water. The company sends out inspection teams to monitor water misuse. Jordanians are not allowed to wash a car using a hose or water gardens during the day.

Ayman Fana and his older brother, Christian Arabs from Egypt, came to Jordan to work in the tourism industry. "The Jordanian dinar is worth much more than Egyptian [money]. Jordan has peace with Israel… King Abdullah is a good king," Fana said. "Jordan needs tourism in the Dead Sea. It is good if this [canal] works."

However, environmental organizations in Israel oppose the canal, fearing there will be negative ramifications to changing the composition of the Dead Sea water. They say Israel and Jordan must make agriculture more efficient and increase desalination efforts in order to revive the Jordan River and resurrect the Dead Sea.

Cubs pitcher plays his best in day games

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

Jason Marquis is happy to take the hill every fifth game for the best team in baseball, be it night or day. But his numbers through the first half of the season clearly indicate that he's at his best during the daytime.

That was the case once again when he recently matched up against Toronto ace Roy Halladay in an interleague series at Rogers Centre.

The Chicago Cubs right-hander shut down the Blue Jays' offence, facing just one batter over the minimum in the first four innings, and not allowing a hit until Jays first baseman Lyle Overbay led off the fifth with a single.

By that time, he had already been staked to a 6-0 lead in a game the Cubs would win 6-2 to improve their record to a Major League-best 44-25.

"I'm a morning person," Marquis said, in trying to explain the nearly 2½ run per game difference between his seven afternoon starts versus his six under the lights. "I'm up bright and early, and now with two kids, I'm up even earlier. I think my body may be more aware at that time of the day."

He would take that one-hitter into the eighth inning before getting the hook after loading the bases on three consecutive singles. Marquis was charged with one earned run on the afternoon when Carlos Marmol walked Matt Stairs to break the shutout.

With the win, Marquis improved to 5-3 on the season, lowering his ERA to 4.24. His afternoon numbers went to 3-0 with a 2.97 ERA, a stark contrast to those at night, 2-3, and a 5.45 ERA.

In matching his longest outing of the season, he boosted his June numbers to 3-0 with a 1.96 ERA. He credits his recent turnaround with a willingness to attack hitters and taking a more aggressive approach on the mound.

Prior to this year, June had been his worst month, 5.31 ERA.

A first-round supplemental draft pick of the Atlanta Braves in 1996, the 6-1, 210-pounder grew up in a Conservative Jewish home on Staten Island, in New York City. He's now in the second year of a three-year, $21-million (US) deal that he signed with Chicago as a free agent after the 2006 season.

Marquis was 12-9 with a 4.60 ERA last year for the National League Central Division champions, wearing his favourite number 21 for the Cubs. Ironically, the last person to wear that number in Chicago was Sammy Sosa, who hit his 600th career home run off of him last June.

Marquis went 14-16 with a 6.02 ERA in 2006 for the World Series champion St. Louis Cardinals, but struggled after the all-star break, going 3-10 and being left off the post-season roster.

He became a full-time starter with St. Louis in 2004, posting a career-best 15-7 record, with a 3.71 ERA and a career-high 138 strikeouts in 201 and one-third innings for the National League champions.

Marquis started game four of the World Series that year, turning in the best performance of any Cardinals starter in the series, allowing three runs over six innings.

"I've been lucky and fortunate to be on seven or eight winning teams throughout my career," he said. "Winning makes things a lot easier, especially within the clubhouse."

The 29-year-old, who made his major-league debut against the Blue Jays while with the Braves eight years ago, is one of only seven National Leaguers who have won at least 12 games each of the past four seasons.

In doing so, he became only the sixth Jewish pitcher to win at least 10 games in four consecutive years. The others are Sandy Koufax, Ken Holtzman, Steve Stone, Dave Roberts, and Barney Pelty.

There was talk in the off-season about an Israeli team being fielded in next year's World Baseball Classic. Marquis said if it came about, he would definitely be interested in playing to represent his heritage.

Let's open up the 'hoods

By YONI GOLDSTEIN

New Views

The latest issue of Jewish Living magazine features a listing of the top 10 Jewish neighbourhoods in North America. Thankfully, the list isn't simply a predictable inventory of the 10 largest or most popular Jewish communities on this continent. The Jewish Living editors have set a more esoteric, and more valuable, standard for their index: "We have identified neighbourhoods across the continent that are growing, rebuilding, reinventing themselves, unifying their disparate parts, and exploring our traditions in unconventional ways," the author, Lisa Alcalay Klug, explains in a preamble.

"The key word that defines all 10 neighbourhoods is 'vibrant,'" she continues. "Together [these neighbourhoods] form a mosaic of diverse pieces, mixing old and young; singles and families; Reform to Conservative to Orthodox to Renewal and more. They are the new melting pots, bubbling with all the forms of self-expression that represent the Jewish People today."

According to Jewish Living, the top 3 Jewish neighbourhoods in North America are Aventura, Fla., (just north of Miami) – "the neighbourhood of choice for young Jewish families seeking luxury in a tropical climate" – Boulder, Colo., – "It's common for residents to support more than one community, attending Chabad one Shabbat and a Reform synagogue the next" – and Lower Merion, near Philadelphia – "Pop into a mainstream grocery store and you can put together a ready-made gourmet kosher meal in minutes."

The sole Canadian entry, Montreal's McGill Ghetto – "it's like New York's Lower East Side but with tree-lined streets" – comes in at number 4.

Reading this list – which admittedly consists mostly of spots I've never spent any time in, the sole exception being eighth-place SoHo/TriBeCa in New York City – got me thinking about how Toronto's Jewish neighbourhoods compare with the top 10. Why didn't Forest Hill, Thornhill, Old Spadina Village, Bayview North, or the downtown core make the Jewish Living list?

The answer's simple, actually: while as a whole, Toronto has one of the most vibrant, distinct, diverse Jewish communities in the world, the city's various Jewish neighbourhoods are highly specialized enclaves, developed specifically for one, and only one, kind of Jew.

Let's take a closer look: Thornhill is an Orthodox Jew's dream – it has an abundance of kosher food at the local supermarket, one of the largest Orthodox synagogues in the world, and even a kosher-only Second Cup, but there's virtually nowhere to turn if you're more liberal-minded. The Spadina Village in Forest Hill has terrific ambiance and a progressive shul that's perfect for modern Orthodox and young people looking to get acquainted or reacquainted with their Jewish heritage, but it's small and real estate is expensive. And downtown has great night life mixed with kitchy Jewish artifacts – the Minsker Shul in Kensington Market, the Free Times Cafe – but finding kosher dining is nearly impossible.

Each of these communities is perfect for one specific type of Jew, to the exclusion of other types. This is the Achilles heel of Jewish Toronto: the inability, and in some cases unwillingness, to mix various Judaisms together.

There is potential for one of Toronto's Jewish areas to make it into next year's Jewish Living list of the top Jewish neighbourhoods. This city, as a whole, has everything a Jew – any kind of Jew – could ask for. And there are a few signs that a sort of Jewish melting pot might be finally developing in the city – for instance, an egalitarian, open synagogue recently opened only a few blocks from my house, on the outskirts of an Orthodox epicentre.

This is a good start.

All of which is to say that Toronto has all the parts necessary to foster the kinds of Jewish neighbourhoods that are open and accessible to a wide variety of Jews. The only question that remains is whether Toronto Jews want to make that happen.

GRILLED ASIAN FLANK STEAK WITH SWEET SLAW

- 1/4 c soy sauce
- 1 garlic clove, minced
- 3 tblsp seasoned rice vinegar
- 5 c thinly sliced Napa cabbage
- 3/4 c chopped green onions, divided
- 5 tsp minced peeled fresh ginger, divided
- 5 tblsp vegetable oil
- 1 1½ lb flank steak
- 3 tblsp sugar

Prepare BBQ on medium heat. Mix soy sauce, oil, 3 tsp. ginger, and garlic in resealable plastic bag. Add flank steak; seal bag. Marinate 30 min. at room temperature, turning occasionally.

Stir sugar and vinegar in small saucepan over medium heat until sugar dissolves; remove from heat. Add remaining 2 tsp. ginger. Place cabbage and 1/2 c green onions in medium bowl. Pour vinegar mixture over; toss to coat. Season with salt & pepper. Let stand while grilling steak. Grill steak until cooked to desired doneness. Transfer to work surface. Let rest 10 min. Slice steak thinly against grain. Place steak slices over slaw. Sprinkle 1/4 c. green onions over slaw.

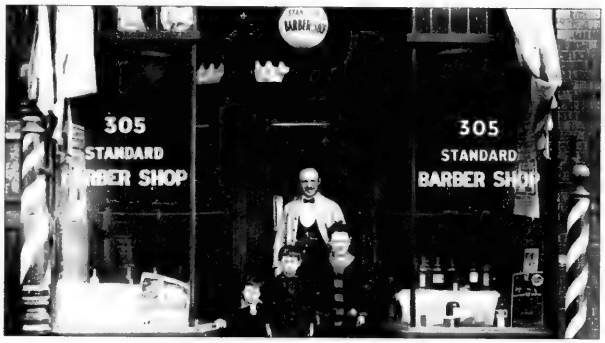
A Family Business for over 60 Years

REMEMBERING OUR YESTERDAYS



By BILL GLADSTONE

THE BARSH FAMILY OF SPADINA: Benjamin Barsh, shown with children Joe, Sam and Faygie, was music director of the Standard Yiddish Theatre and played viola with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra. The family lived in four rooms above their barber shop and welcomed many Yiddish actors – including Molly Picon, Menasha Skulnick, Moishe Oisher and Maurice Schwartz – into their home. Ben and other family members had their own orchestra, played hundreds of bar mitzvahs and weddings, and served as the "pit" orchestra at the Standard.

Wagman family reunion 'a unique event'

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Several hundred people – to the eighth generation of Ruchel and Isaac Wagman – will gather in Toronto July 3 to 6, for the seventh family reunion.

The family holds a reunion every four years in a different city.

"The first international reunion of the family was held 24 years ago" said David Picov, co-chair with Shari Bricks-Young of the Wagman family's reunion. The two other planning members are Michelle Garshon and Debbie Zeger. All four are fifth generation.

The last reunion, held in Chicago, attracted more than 400 people. The 2008 reunion will be at the Sheraton Centre Hotel on Queen Street West. Family members from across Canada and the United States, and from Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, will be in coming.

Picov said the reunion is an opportunity for cousins to make friends for life, "and that's what it's all about."

Bricks-Young described the reunions as "a unique event. Imagine the awe and the wow when more than 300 people gather in one room at one time and they are all your cousins."

Ruchel and Isaac Wagman (Wegman) were born in Bogoria, Poland, a shtetl 150 kilometres south of Warsaw. They married in 1861 and operated a bakery and general store.

After the Kishinev pogrom in 1895 and the institution of repressive measures by the Russian government of the time, the Wagman children and their families began immigrating to North America, and when they were established, they brought other family members.

Picov told The CJN that there will be three members of the third generation at the reunion. "The youngest relative is David Perkins… from Rosewell, Ga., who is three months old, and the oldest is Nettie Berkson from Los Angeles, who is 93.

"We will be marking the 150th wedding anniversary of Ruchel and Isaac with a candlelighting ceremony in which representatives from each of the eight branches, as well as one for those who perished in the Holocaust, will come up to light a candle," Picov said.

He added that, as at previous reunions, "we will have a special guest appearance from Ruchel and Isaac themselves, who will join us and kvell over all of their descendents."

The weekend will begin on Thursday with activities planned throughout the day, including a barbecue dinner and karaoke. There will be a family day at Centre Island, a Shabbat dinner and a formal Saturday gala dinner and dance. Also on the roster is a slide show, special entertainment for all ages, a golf tournament, a panoramic family photo, a family tree book and a closing Sunday brunch.

"When people talk about a family reunion," Bricks-Young said, "they speak of a gathering at a park with a potluck lunch, or meeting at Uncle Marv's house where he supplies the hot dogs and you bring your own beverages.

"At the Ruchel-Isaac cousins' club, there is so much more – a true convention of family with non-stop programming geared to all generations.

"Over the years, distant cousins have become close family and friends. The glow and the memories remain with us throughout the years," she concluded.

Volunteerism at its best

A vibrant Jewish community like Toronto's does not simply happen. It is created over time, through the ongoing commitment, dedication and passion of its volunteers.

An organization like UJA Federation of Greater Toronto does not simply become one of the world's preeminent non-profits. It, too, is the culmination of the effort put forth by its volunteers, who, year after year, month after month and day after day, rise to the occasion, taking UJA's myriad of activities and initiatives from the planning stage to reality.

Volunteerism is truly the engine that drives UJA Federation and Toronto's Jewish community.

As the chairs of UJA Federation's Campaign 2009, we are already seeing the enthusiasm and dedication of our community members who have expressed their interest in playing whatever role is needed to ensure the success of the campaign. With the campaign geared towards ensuring a strong and flourishing Jewish future for all of us by creating a new generation of leaders, the ongoing support and generosity of our community's volunteers bodes well for our children and our children's children. Our volunteers are playing a direct, hands-on role in tikun olam, repairing the world, and for that, we thank you.

Wherever I travel throughout the world, when I tell people that I'm from Toronto, they usually respond with questions. Whether they want to know more about how we're building a Jewish city through UJA Federation's Tomorrow Campaign, or how our community always seems to come together for the sake of others, Toronto has gained a very positive reputation throughout the Jewish world.

Of course, one of the main reasons for Toronto's glowing reputation is a direct result of you – our community's selfless and dedicated volunteers - who continue to roll up your sleeves and open your hearts for countless community events year after year.

Each of you, in your own unique way, personifies everything that is great about our remarkable Jewish community. It is because of your passion, vision and commitment, that Jewish Toronto has become one of the world's largest Diaspora communities - one, by the way, of only a handful worldwide, with a growing Jewish community.

With you as our backbone, standing tall and coming through year after year for the improvement of Jewish life, Toronto has become a world leader – and for this you are to be applauded. You have not merely talked the talk; you continue to walk the walk and for that I thank you.

Our connection to the land of Israel

Growing up in many different Jewish communities around the world, the one thing that was a constant was how important it is to have Israel as part of our lives. As I got older, my family and I made it a point of spending as much time as possible visiting Israel. My experiences included participating on March of the Living, going on a gap year program after high school and many other wonderful trips. Having had such amazing experiences, it felt important to spend every day sending as many people as possible to Israel. As part of the Toronto Jewish community, it is gratifying to see the numbers of young adults choosing to spend their summer or longer volunteering in Israel. Israel can change one's life.

We recently celebrated Shavuot, 50 days from Passover, the holiday that celebrates our exodus from Egypt. Shavuot was also the first day on which individuals could bring the Bikkurim (first fruits) to the Temple in Jerusalem. It is the day that we celebrate our connection to the land and to the religion. Thus, this holiday is a double celebration: one of our inheriting the Land of Israel and the second of celebrating the revelation at Sinai. As Jews we always have a constant connection to the land of Israel but especially on Shavuot.

We see that very clearly when we read the "Book of Ruth". Ruth decides to follow her mother-in law Naomi to Israel, leaving everything she knows in Moab to venture to a strange land. Ruth accepts not only a new land and people but a new religion, "Where you go I will go, and where you stay I will stay. Your people will be my people and your G-d, my G-d. (Ruth 1:16-17)

Today our connection to Israel is as strong as ever. Each year I send hundreds of young adults to volunteer, and like Ruth, leaving a familiar place and going to a strange land to give of their time and love to people they don't know. On page B3 of this volunteer recognition supplement, we recognize a young volunteer who took that time not knowing what the experience would be like and how she was rewarded for her commitment. Yes, that reward can happen anywhere but in Israel we have a connection between all of us that goes back thousands and thousands of years.

This past Shavuot was even more monumental for me. Like Ruth, I am making Aliyah, starting a wonderful journey that has taken a long time to begin. I am leaving my home, my family and wonderful friends to move to a strange and incredible land that I call home. Over 200 others from the Toronto Jewish community will be making that same journey and we wish them much success. See you in Israel!

Volunteering in Eilat: The greatest weeks of my life

By Emily Klemensberg

To say that I was excited about embarking on my seven-week trip to Israel this past May would be a major understatement. Before leaving, everyone I spoke to told me how much I would love Israel and how I would have a wonderful time. Little did I know at the time that a simple adjective like "wonderful" was not nearly precise enough to describe what I was going to go through.

After participating on the incredible Birthright Israel program, I decided to extend my trip by volunteering in the Eilat Internship Volunteer Program, funded by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. Originally, I signed up to assist English teachers in a public school called Etzion Gaver, which has the most students with mental disabilities and behavioral problems. Many of the kids come from abusive and underprivileged homes.

Emily Klemensberg and 5-month-old Djoom.

On the first day, the challenge of communication was quickly brought to my attention. For the first time in my life, I was forced to put into practice the Hebrew I was taught during my 14-year tenure at Jewish Day schools. At first, it was a challenge I had no choice but to pursue until eventually speaking Hebrew became instinctive. From that moment I realized, not only was I teaching them, but in return, they were teaching me.

Initially, this was the only volunteering opportunity I thought I would have in Eilat. However, one of the unique aspects of my program was that they gave the volunteers the ability to explore the city outside the normal tourist hotspots. After school one day, I made my way to a small hotel on the water which not only houses Sudanese refugees, but a daycare and educational facility used while the refugee parents are at work. From the moment I stepped in, I felt as if I walked into another world. First, I saw the older kids playing in the hall. That, in itself, was an amazing sight to see. I then went to a room that had been divided by a large cardboard wall. Staring at about a dozen babies – all ranging from a few months old to four years, two pregnant mothers and a third woman, I was speechless. These precious little people were either sleeping on thin mattresses that were simultaneously used as the only seating in the room, or playing with the donated and worn-out toys. I was immediately drawn to one baby in particular. Her name was Djoom. Only five months old, she was born on the way from Egypt to Israel. Holding her was unlike anything I have ever felt in my life. She fell asleep almost immediately after I first picked her up, and I was overcome with emotion and knew, immediately, that I wanted to volunteer there in the afternoons.

Unlike my volunteer teaching job where I was able to communicate using my inadequate Hebrew, here I found myself in a complete struggle to converse with these Arabic speakers. Thankfully, there was Teresa, a Sudanese refugee herself who was the only refugee who spoke English. Teresa was one of the most graceful and loving women I have ever met, yet she was able to command respect from the toddlers. I became especially close with her, to the point where she felt comfortable enough to share her survivor story with me.

As a granddaughter of four Holocaust survivors, I knew how important it was to listen to a first-hand account of the genocide she witnessed, the cruelty she experienced after she escaped to Egypt and the safe haven she found in Israel.

Saying goodbye to each person was unbearable and by far the most difficult and painful part of my entire journey. But that I was able to make a direct and personal connection to the meaning of tikun olam, made it easier to let go. To say that this was a "wonderful" experience is a major understatement. Those weeks were life altering and I can say with one hundred percent certainty that they were the best weeks of my life.

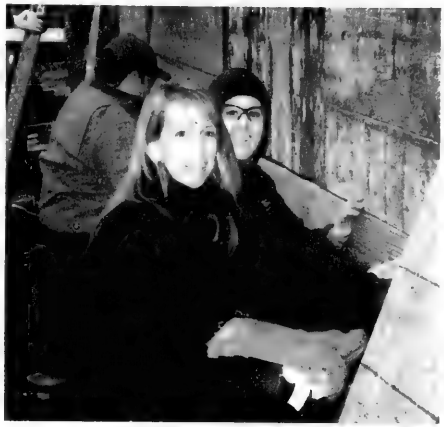
Impact Toronto lives up to its name

By Barbra Green



Just over a year ago, the Young Adult Division (YAD) of UJA Federation underwent a strategic revitalization and rebranding exercise. Today, thanks to the group's dedicated and passionate participants, they are living and breathing their new identity – Impact Toronto.

Comprised of volunteers and donors between the ages of 25 and 40, Impact Toronto provides a variety of social and networking programs, annual campaign opportunities and Israel initiatives – all of which form the backbone of this exciting division.

"Because of the diversity of our group we have a wide range of programs from grass roots volunteer days (helping with the elderly or cleaning up a downtown shul) to campaign-focused events featuring well known business, political and cultural leaders," says Ben Mogil, chair of Impact Toronto 2008 and co-chair for 2009. "At the heart of it all we are trying, and are more than ever succeeding, in offering something for everyone."

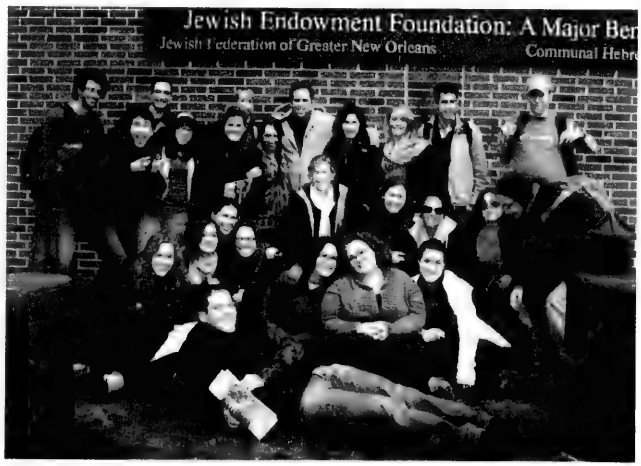
In January, through Hillel International, Impact Toronto assisted in the crucial rebuilding efforts taking place in New Orleans in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina. With hammers and paint brushes in hand, 10 Toronto-area Jewish university and college students helped make a difference in the lives of those displaced and forgotten long after the storm.

"Seeing volunteers help repair homes can bring those who have experienced the devastation, hope," says York University student and project participant Hayley Fisher.

The volunteer work hit closer to home in February with One COOL Day, an annual mitzvah-performing blitz for service projects across the community. About 150 people mobilized to help paint apartments, sort donated clothing for Jewish Family & Child, prepare food for the homeless, help with a Special Olympics bowling tournament and many other initiatives.

Conferences are yet another way for young volunteers to network, get informed and hopefully find the inspiration to take their Jewish involvement and leadership to the next level. In March, 40 members of Impact Toronto traveled to Washington D.C. for a three-day conference for young Jewish leaders across North America. Over 1,000 participants from more than 70 communities took part in the United Jewish Communities (UJC) event.

"This was a chance to expose our young leadership to not only top caliber speakers, but also to reach out to the diversity of our community," says Steven Farber, co-chair of the Canadian delegation.



More than two dozen volunteers from UJA Federation's Impact Toronto, Hillel of Greater Toronto and Hillel of London, Ontario in hurricane–ravaged New Orleans to help repair the devastation.

Volunteer Excellence: The Community Honours Its Own

The men and women on pages B4-B7 have made tzedakah and community involvement constant priorities in their lives. Their unrelenting commitment to Jewish values helps enrich the lives of so many. They received their awards at a recent UJA Federation Awards Night.

BEN SADOWSKI AWARD OF MERIT

UJA Federation created the Ben Sadowski Award of Merit in 1960, the single most prestigious acknowledgement the Jewish community bestows upon a volunteer with outstanding leadership qualities and years of involvement in the Jewish and general communities. With his unwavering commitment to people, Ben Sadowski z"l, the first president of the United Jewish Welfare Fund (predecessor to UJA Federation), embodied the definition of a natural leader. This Award is his legacy to the Jewish community.

Alan and Lorraine Sandler

Alan and Lorraine are a power couple if there ever was one. In their native Cape Town, South Africa, they had extensive experience as leaders of numerous community organizations. Arriving in Toronto in 1976, they brought their deep commitment to the Jewish community as a way of integrating in Toronto, and quickly shared their leadership skills with many and varied organizations. Alan became involved in the UJA Federation Annual Campaign as chair of the Accountants Division, Super Sunday, and the Social Planning and Community Planning Committees, and later as Federation treasurer and president. In addition, Alan was president of JIAS (Jewish Immigrant Aid Services) Toronto and has served on the Boards of USDS, UIAFC, UJC, and the Toronto Hebrew Memorial Park. Lorraine is a chair-extraordinaire – having chaired UJA Federation's Women's Campaign & Advocacy, Super Sunday, Campaign Education, Canada Israel Experience and the Continuity Committee. Currently, she is chair of the Holocaust Centre of Toronto. In addition, she has served on the Boards of Jewish Family & Child and JIAS (Jewish Immigrant Aid Services) Toronto.

"The responsibility of each one of us, taking care of one another in the broadest sense, is a Jewish value that speaks to me. When one searches for social justice collectively, in a strategic and planful manner, the vulnerable are taken care of, the community's needs and infrastructure are tended to and Jewish education is nurtured. This ethical philosophy renews our generations by building for them, modeling for them, and then allowing them to continue the process." Alan Sandler

"As Jews we are expected to not separate ourselves from our community. The building of Kehilla welcomes and speaks to inclusiveness, compassion, acceptance of diversity, study of Torah and tzedakah. The community has supported my passion for children and Jewish belonging, combined with my devotion of Israel, and allowed me to spend my creative energy expressing this. In so doing, I have become a part of this Kehilla and my life has been the richer for it." Lorraine Sandler

Past Chairs Lederman Award

This Award, named for Harold Lederman z"l, is presented to an outstanding philanthropic leader and volunteer who is also a past chair of the UJA Federation Annual Campaign. Lederman, driven by a keen social conscience and strong support for Jewish communal life, believed in the importance of continuity. His message to future generations was to be responsible, a legacy of a real philanthropic leader.

Warren Kimel

Warren has had a long and illustrious career as a Jewish community leader.

Dedicated, hardworking and generous, Warren has been on the Boards of UJA Federation, USDS, Baycrest Hospital, B'nai Brith Toronto Freedom Lodge and Beth Sholom Synagogue, the last two as president – simultaneously. At UJA Federation, Warren has served as chair of Project Renewal, the P2K Committee and the 2006 Annual Campaign. He currently chairs the UJA Federation Israel & Overseas and Lebovic Steering Committees.

"My volunteer life sets an example for my children and helps to ensure a strong and vibrant Jewish community for today and future generations."

Phil Granovsky Award for Campaign Excellence

This Award honours individuals who exemplify the best in UJA Federation campaigning. When it came to the welfare of world Jewry, few were more committed than Phil Granovsky z"l, who saw Israel and the Diaspora as an extension of his family. Granovsky's selfless legacy continues to help countless people in the community every single year.

Harvey Frisch

No stranger to involvement in the Jewish community, Harvey has had an intensive few years at the top leadership of the UJA Federation Annual Campaign. After canvassing for many years, he became the chair of the Major Gifts Cabinet for Campaigns 2005 and 2006. Little did Harvey know after accepting the campaign vice chair position for Campaign 2007 that it would become an Israel Emergency Campaign. His dedication was infectious and was later asked to serve as vice chair for Campaign 2008. Harvey also serves as vice chair, Camp Ramah in Canada, and has served in leadership positions at Beth Sholom Synagogue, She'arim Hebrew Day School and the Juvenile Diabetes Research Foundation.

"Volunteering in the Jewish community comes as second nature to me. I learned from my parents at a young age the importance of tzedakah and taking care of those less fortunate than ourselves. If you are lucky enough to succeed and take something out of the community, it is rewarding to have the opportunity to put back into the community. I am truly honoured to have been chosen to receive this year's award. It gives me great naches to be associated with a communal leader like Phil Granovsky z"l."

Gordy Wolfe Award in Jewish Communal Professional Leadership

This Award honours the memory of Gordy Wolfe z"l, the consummate professional who served as executive director of Jewish Family & Child (JF&CS) for 22 years. The Award recognizes a visionary professional communal leader who, like Gordy, has made a substantive difference in the life of Jewish Toronto.

Sandy Keshen

Sandy's active involvement within the Jewish community was sparked by her desire to get a proper Jewish education for her daughter. She started her career promoting inclusion through an early education project at Temple Sinai for children with developmental delays. After the provincial government announced that it was closing institutions in 1971, Sandy helped establish an organization to find a housing solution for Jewish people who were being transferred into the community. In 1973, Reena (meaning joy and laughter) was founded and three years later Sandy became its first CEO. Under her stewardship, Reena has grown from a small and dedicated group to a formidable Ontario organization with international renown, providing a range of support within a Jewish framework.

"Although I have been active in advocating for people with special needs within the general community for over 30 years, I am especially grateful that UJA Federation has established an Inclusion Committee. This demonstrates the commitment of the Jewish community to ensure a place and sense of belonging for everyone. To be recognized by one's peers is the ultimate compliment and I am honoured and humbled to be the first recipient of this award. It is even more meaningful to me because it is named in Gordy's honour. In tribute to him, I hope that we can all continue to learn and grow together."

Volunteer Excellence: Leadership Development Awards

The Leadership Development Awards, established to encourage young men and women to assume community leadership roles, are presented to those individuals who demonstrate extraordinary commitment and service.

Gilbert Palter

Since becoming involved with UJA Federation in 1991, Gil has been a true pioneer, helping create a number of exciting initiatives. He is a founding member of the Young Business Network, the founding chair of ATID, an initiative to develop future UJA Federation leadership, and the founding chair of the National Ben Gurion Society, launching the program first in Toronto and then across Canada. With Ken Tanenbaum, he co-chaired the Business Cabinet for UJA Federation's 2007 Annual Campaign, and together they launched the highly successful Taking Care of Business event. Gil is currently the founding chair of the Corporate Partners Initiative. In addition, he has been a member of the United Jewish Communities (UJC) National Young Leadership Cabinet and is an alumnus of both the Wexner Heritage Program and UJC's Flight II Program.

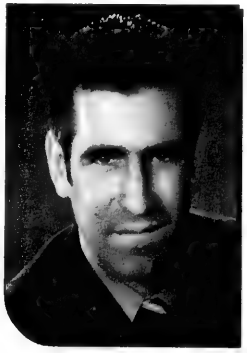
"In 1991 when Elisa and I returned to Canada and started volunteering in the Jewish community, we encountered a generation that believes every organization has to earn its right to be part of our philanthropy, unlike our predecessors who were raised with the understanding that contributing to the Jewish community is not optional. So we have focused our efforts on educating our peers about the importance of contributing to and supporting the Jewish community, ahead of all the other many worthwhile competing causes. I have received tremendous satisfaction over the years contributing to the community, especially by educating people about the critically important work done by UJA Federation and encouraging them to contribute both their time and money to the cause. I have created connections between my business and community contributions, with each one supporting and enhancing the other: doing well and doing good simultaneously. Our family motto is 'with privilege comes responsibility,' and it is a privilege to have the responsibility."

Craig Rimer

Craig has been active in UJA Federation and the Toronto Jewish community since coming to Toronto 15 years ago. Over the years, Craig has served in UJA's Annual Campaign as co-chair and vice chair of the Finance Division. Craig was a member of the executive of the Holocaust Centre of Toronto, co-chair of the Yom Hashoah V'Hagvurah Community Commemoration and a member of United Jewish Communities National Young Leadership Cabinet.

Currently, he is on the board of UJA Federation's Centre for the Enhancement of Jewish Education (The Mercaz) and on Federation's Business and Finance Committee. In addition, he sits on the Board of Direetors of Baycrest, and serves as chair of the Baycrest Finance and Audit Committee and chair of the Baycrest Foundation Investment Committee.

"Growing up in a Jewish home and attending day school instilled in me the importance of giving back. After moving to Toronto, UJA provided me with the volunteer and leadership opportunities to make a difference. It was a whole lot more than just raising money and allocating it. It was a community within a community that dedicated its time to helping the most needy, enhancing the general Jewish experience, remembering the lessons of the past, educating our children, and ensuring the continuance of a safe Israel. Now as a father, I am so much more appreciative of how important it is for these objectives to be realized."



Ken Tanenbaum

Ken began his volunteer career with UJA Federation through the ATID Program in 1992, and went on to co-found the Venture Philanthropy initiative, chair the Major Gifts Dinner, co-chair the Business Cabinet, and co-chair the Bay Street Cabinet. He has served on the Business Plan Review Committee for JTT, the Family Philanthropy Forum, and is currently serving on the Integrated Development Committee, and the Jewish Foundation Board. Ken was part of the inaugural class of Canadians to participate in the United Jewish Communities Cabinet program.

In addition, he serves as treasurer of the Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation, following three years of chairing its Finance and Investment Committee. He was active with Mothers Against Drunk Driving, serving as National chairman for two years. He continues to serve the program that he helped found between the Schulich School and the Recanati School of Business which develops export plans for Israeli businesses.

"Working with the outstanding professional team at UJA Federation and the remarkably committed and talented lay leaders in our community has been deeply enriching for me on more dimensions than I could have imagined. For every unit of energy I put into community work, I get many times the investment in return. This path of involvement and commitment was illuminated by my parents and grandparents, and my true hope is that, by our example, Jennifer and I will see our children pick up the torch and carry it for their generation as our community goes from strength to strength."

Volunteer Excellence:
Professional Advisory Committee Award of Excellence

The PAC Award of Excellence of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto recognizes the outstanding contribution made to the Foundation by professionals in our community. It also recognizes the long-term impact their contributions make to lawyers, accountants, estate planners and especially to the charitable organizations who reap the benefit of their efforts. This Award honours professionals who encourage their clients to consider charity as part of their estate planning process and who are the ardent ambassadors and champions of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto.

David Wm. Brown

David is a partner in the independent financial and estate planning firm, Al G. Brown & Associates, which was founded in 1943. He has been instrumental in developing and implementing charitable giving plans to benefit the community. In 1990, David received the Toronto Jewish Congress Leadership Development Award, has chaired the Leadership Development Committee of the United Jewish Welfare Fund and is a past co-chair of the UJA Federation Walk with Israel. He is past Ontario chairman of State of Israel Bonds and Canadian president of The Sanz Medical Centre in Netanya, Israel. David is currently a member of the Professional Advisory Committee and member of the Board of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto. He also serves as president of Associated Hebrew Day Schools and sits on the National Board of the Canadian Association of Gift Planners.

"For me, volunteering my time is another way and an adjunct to giving tzedakah. The advantage of this method, however, is that you get to interact and become friends with other people who have similar goals and aspirations. It is a wonderful byproduct of being involved."

Golda Brown

Golda became a partner in the firm of Al G. Brown & Associates in 1985. She joined her brother, David and father, Al G. Brown, after having been a teacher with a Special Education degree. Golda has served as co-chair of UJA Federation's Insurance Division and has served as a member of the Social Planning Committee. She also served as chair of Toronto Jewish Congress' work group for people with disabilities. She is a member of the Board of Directors of the Baycrest Foundation; a member of the Executive Board of Canadian Association of Family Enterprise (C.A.F.E.); a member of the Executive Board of Mekorot Institute of Torah Study for Women; a member of the Advisory Board of Torah in Motion and a former Board member of Camp Moshava. Golda is a member of the Professional Advisory Committee of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto.

"What I do does not come close to what I gain, meeting and working with the most outstanding philanthropic and caring individuals in our community. Quality of life is best measured by the depth and strength of the relationships we create."

Mac Nisker

Although Mac worked for an accounting firm in his early years, his eye was always on the stock market. In 1953, he joined the firm of Brown Baldwin Ltd. as an investment advisor. In 1964 he bought control of the firm and renamed it Brown Baldwin Nisker Ltd and was the member Seat Holder at the Toronto Stock Exchange for almost 20 years. In the late eighties, the Hong Kong Bank of Canada bought a substantial interest in his company and eventually purchased the rest of the equity. The firm is now called HSBC Securities (Canada) Inc. Until his retirement in January, 2007, Mac focused on managing the assets of some exclusive and prominent high net worth families. He was involved in both support and contributions to some of Canada's leading charitable foundations. During his career Mac was an ambassador of numerous charitable organizations. In particular, his commitment and dedication to UJA Federation and the Jewish Foundation is evident through his vision and actions in ensuring support for the future of our Jewish community.

"It is a pleasure to be associated with the Federation. It is rewarding and I am honoured to have received this award."

Special Community Achievement Award

Sid Freedman

It is through the singular vision of one man, Sid Freedman, that Toronto's Jewish community has been blessed with a community cemetery. In 1968, when he was vice president of Temple Sinai Congregation, Sid had the foresight to recognize that Toronto needed a new type of burial organization not for any particular synagogue, landsmanshaft or group, but for the totality of the Jewish community. After much exploration and work with synagogues and organizations, in 1970, Sid incorporated the Toronto Hebrew Memorial Park (THMP), and purchased the land on which Pardes Shalom now sits. Over the years, Sid guided THMP through the development and opening of Pardes Shalom and has stayed a steadfast champion as an Honorary Life President. UJA Federation is honoured to recognize Sid for his tireless dedication to the community for over 40 years.

Shem Tov Honourees

The Shem Tov Awards are presented in partnership to leaders representing the highest levels of excellence in volunteer service in Toronto's Jewish community.

LOUIS GREENBAUM
Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education (The Mercaz)

Lou has been actively involved as a volunteer in the Jewish community for many years. He is currently a member of the Executive and Board of Directors of UJA Federation, chair of the Lebovic Jewish Community Campus Development & Building Committee, co-chair of the annual Yom Hashoah V'Hagvurah Community Commemoration, and the inaugural chair of UJA Federation's Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education (The Mercaz). His active involvement also extends to his role of vice chair of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, a Board member of the Toronto Hebrew Memorial Park, and a member of the Executive and Board of the Vaughan Health Care Foundation. He is a past president and chair of Associated Hebrew Schools.

GORDON HAYWARD
JACS (Jewish Alcoholics, Chemically Dependent Persons and Significant Others)

For more than six years, Gordon has been an active spokesperson for JACS, reaching out to more than 10,000 youth, leaving them with a much better understanding of life's value. He is a regular at the JACS Thursday night outreach meeting, offering comfort to those who continue to struggle with addiction.

DR. LEON KADISH
JVS Toronto

Leon is currently the immediate past chair of the Board of Directors of JVS Toronto, chair of the Nominating Committee and member of the Executive, Jewish Community Initiative and Strategic Planning Committees. In his early years at JVS, Leon chaired the Immigrant Services Advisory Council and the Jewish Identity Task Force. In November 2001, Leon and Anat Wurtheim, now VP of Program Development, launched CanadaInfoNet, an online interactive resource for newcomers. Leon's involvement at JVS culminated in his becoming chair of the Board from 2004-2006. He has been a member of UJA's Implementation Committee, Board member of the BJCC and a member of the Finance Committee of the Reena Foundation. Currently, he is a member of UJA Federation's Community Security Committee.

DAVID PELTZ
Jewish Family and Child

David has a long history of serving the GTA's Jewish community with dedication and drive, both as a professional and a volunteer. After graduating from the University of Waterloo, he spent six years as a social worker at Huntley Youth Services. For three of those years, David reported directly to the late Gordon Wolfe, beginning a long association with Gordy and Jewish Family and Child. David has served on the Board of Directors for ten years, including a distinguished term as president from 2005-2007. He has also been a member of the board of Kehilla for ten years, including six years on the Executive. At UJA Federation, David has served on the Social Planning and Allocation Committee, and is currently chairing the Joint Management Board of Federation and Reena, overseeing the planned Reena building on the Lebovic Campus.

WILFRED POSLUNS
Baycrest

Wilfred has been actively involved with Baycrest for over eight years as a member of the Board, serving as treasurer from 2001-2003, the Baycrest Foundation Board, serving as chair from 2003-2006, and on several committees, including the Strategic Planning and Finance and Audit Committees. As chair of the Baycrest Foundation, he recruited many new faces to the Board and led a community-wide campaign to raise crucial funding to support a world leader in care, research and education related to aging and the brain.

RON PROSSERMAN
JIAS (Jewish Immigrant Aid Services) Toronto

As chair of JumpStart, Ron's vision and efforts have led to innovative networking opportunities for newcomers, increased outreach to established Canadian professionals, the creation of a new website and marketing materials, and the implementation of an Advisory Board. In the one year that Ron has been involved with JumpStart, over 150 newcomers have gotten meaningful referrals and connections towards helping them re-establish themselves in their professional field in Canada. Continuing his commitment to charity, Ron is a member of the UJA Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto Board, is involved with the UJA Annual Campaign, Just a Second Clothing Store, the Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation of Toronto and the Canadian Breast Cancer Foundation.

EVELYN RABKIN-YUDITSKY
Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living

After being introduced to the Bernard Betel Centre in 1991, Evelyn has become a spokesperson and ambassador for the Centre. Active on the Centre Board and providing leadership to the members, she chaired the Volunteer Committee, participated in the Think Tank, the Monitor (the Centre's quarterly program guide) and the Social Action Committee. She started and facilitated "Fun with Yiddish" and "Stories from the Heart." In addition, Evelyn has performed in plays to raise awareness of abuse of the elderly.

DOROTHY SHOICHET
Koffler Centre of the Arts

A past president of the Koffler Centre of the Arts (1993-2000), Dorothy has remained an avid volunteer with the Centre. Currently, she sits on the Gala Committee and the Executive Board. Dorothy is a longtime member of Women's Canadian Organization of Rehabilitation through Training and was an official NGO representative at the UN International Women's Conference held in China in 1995. In addition, she has served on numerous Boards, including Toronto Arts Council, Ashkenaz Foundation, Albert Einstein Peace Prize Foundation, Muki Baum Association for Children with Multiple Handicaps, and Friends of Habimah Theatre.

FRANK TIZEL
Jewish Camp Council of Toronto

Frank has had a long history with the Jewish Camp Council of Toronto, dating back to his years as a camper and staff member at Camp Northland-B'nai Brith, and his continued involvement with the Board of Directors. He has been instrumental in organizing and planning the third Camp Reunion, the first to be held at the camp itself. Frank has always valued the contribution volunteers make to an organization. Under his leadership, the Board began to recognize its volunteers with citations and plaques, a permanent reminder of what their involvement has meant to our community.

HELEN VALE
Reena

Helen was appointed chair of the Reena Board for 2006-2008. An avid supporter and volunteer for Reena for many years, she has served on the Reena Board since 2002 and has been a valuable member of the Reena Foundation's Gala Dinner Committee. She has also served on the Board of the Women's Auxiliary for Baycrest.

* Denotes 2007-2008 beneficiary agencies of UJA Federation

On behalf of the State of Israel, I would like to express my profound gratitude to the countless individuals who selflessly volunteer their time and talents through our many community agencies, schools, congregations and organizations. Through their efforts, these dedicated men, women and young adults help build a more cohesive Jewish community which, in turn, preserves and strengthens the quality of Jewish life in Toronto, Canada and Israel.

The willingness of Toronto's Jewish citizens to volunteer and help one another makes it a model community - one emulated throughout North America.

I thank you individually and collectively for your unwavering support of Jewish life in Toronto, the State of Israel and the Diaspora.

Sincerely,
Amir R. Gissin

Seeds sprout after 2,000 years

Israeli researchers have grown new life out of some ancient seeds found among the archeological effects at Masada, the fortress palace in the Judean Desert built by King Herod. This young date palm tree is now 26 months old and has reached a height of 121 centimetres. Israeli scientists hope the sapling will help restore a species of biblical trees.

Israel, Hezbollah reach prisoner swap

By ROY EITAN
JTA

JERUSALEM — Two years after they disappeared into Lebanese captivity, Ehud Goldwasser and Eldad Regev are returning to Israel. But it's unlikely to be a happy homecoming for the army reservists' families.

According to Israeli assessments, Goldwasser and Regev died as a result of the Hezbollah border ambush in which they were captured and which triggered the Second Lebanon War.

By a vote of 22-3, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's cabinet on Sunday approved a German-mediated deal under which Goldwasser and Regev would be returned soon.

In exchange, Israel will free five jailed Lebanese terrorists, chief among them Samir Kuntar, who is serving a life sentence for a bloody 1979 attack on the northern town of Nahariya. It also will release the remains of dozens of slain Lebanese.

Freeing Kuntar will effectively be the Olmert government's declaration that Israel is giving up on Ron Arad, an airman missing since he bailed out over Lebanon in 1986. Kuntar had long been billed as a "bargaining chip" for Arad's return.

"This is an issue of the highest moral order," Olmert said in remarks broadcast before the five-hour cabinet debate.

The heads of Israel's Mossad and Shin Bet intelligence services had argued against surrendering prisoners should it transpire that Goldwasser and Regev did not survive the July 12, 2006, ambush in which Hezbollah took them into Lebanon. The guerrilla group has refused to provide any word on their condition.

Israelis gathered last week to plead for Gilad Schalit's release from his two-year captivity at the hands of Hamas. "The time has come to decide. Return Schalit," reads the sign in the hands of the young girl in the forefront. Subsequent to the rally, the government voted in favour of an exchange with Hezbollah that will facilitate the return of Eldad Regev and Ehud Goldwasser to Israel.

CJN wins award

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Canadian Jewish News won a Rockower Award for newspaper excellence at the annual conference of the American Jewish Press Association (AJPA) in Washington D.C., last week. Founded in 1944 for English-language Jewish media in North America, the AJPA represents some 250 newspapers, magazines, journalists and affiliated organizations in the United States and Canada. The first-place award was for excellence in editorial writing for newspapers over 15,000 in circulation and for all magazines and websites. It was the 13th time in the past 14 years that The CJN has won a Rockower Award.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Ed. Director Retires

OTTAWA — Ontario's only Jewish director of public education retired last week after a 37-year career, the Ottawa-Carleton District School Board said last week. Lorne Rachlis took the job in August 2003 when the board was under provincial supervision after failing to balance its budget. It was created in 1998 out of a merger of two local boards. After almost five years of school closings and a reorganization, its budget is balanced, the board said. A member of Temple Israel Ottawa, Rachlis also served as a superintendent with the old Ottawa school board and education director of the Avon Maitland District School Board.

JCC Vandalized

KELOWNA, B.C. — Police are investigating after the Okanagan Jewish Community Centre in Kelowna, B.C., was spray-painted with anti-Semitic graffiti and swastikas on June 21, causing $500 in damage, Canwest News reported. An adjacent day care, some cars and a nearby school were also hit. An anonymous person cleaned the building by the next day, CTV News reported.

Flag Removed

TORONTO — The Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies (FSWC) is praising World Vision Canada's decision to remove the Palestinian flag in its correspondence with supporters. In a child sponsorship document, World Vision included the flag and labelled it the "Flag of Jerusalem West Bank Gaza." In a response to the FSWC, World Vision said that its "use of the Palestinian flag was not intended as a political statement or an indication of taking sides" and that it would be removed.

WORLD

Comedian Fined

PARIS — A Paris appeals court upheld charges against a French comedian for making anti-Semitic remarks. The court fined Dieudonne M'Bala M'Bala nearly $11,000 (US) for calling Holocaust remembrance "memorial pornography" at a news conference after a 2005 show in Algeria.

PM HONOURED: B'nai Brith International's (BBI) Ottawa-based president, Moishe Smith, presented Prime Minister Stephen Harper with BBI's highest honour, the Presidential Gold Medallion for Humanitarianism, on June 27 in Ottawa during BBI's board of governors meeting and B'nai Brith Canada's Annual Leadership Policy Conference. Past recipients include former Israeli prime ministers David Ben-Gurion and Golda Meir, and former U.S. presidents Harry Truman and John F. Kennedy. B'nai Brith spokesperson Frank Diamant said Harper's support for the safety of the Jewish people and the war on terror made him worthy of the award.

Hate Letter Targets Elderly Woman

BARRIE, Ont. — Police in Barrie, Ont., are investigating a letter that was received last week by as many as 30 neighbours of an elderly Jewish woman that contained racial slurs, the Barrie Advance reported.

Police were notified immediately of the letter campaign and treated it as a hate crime. However, when they investigated the purported authors of the letter – the Jewish woman's neighbours – they concluded that their signatures had been forged.

The neighbours have been embroiled in a dispute with the woman. The letter asked for help in getting the Jewish woman out of the community.

Police spokesperson Sgt. Dave Goodbrand said the letter writer's motivation is unclear.

Sharansky on tour promoting identity, freedom

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

"If you really want to defend freedom in this world, start from your identity. Start from your people, your religion."

So says human rights activist, author, former refusenik and ex-MK Natan Sharansky.

He argues that in a world now embroiled in an ideological battle between the forces of radical Islam and democracy, the only way for freedom-loving nations to emerge victorious is to strengthen their identities and not dilute their national character by allowing newcomers to subvert their culture.

Now chair of the Shalem Center's Institute for Strategic Studies – a centrist Israeli political and social think tank – Sharansky was in Toronto last week promoting his newest book, Defending Identity: Its Indispensable Role in Protecting Democracy.

In an interview with The CJN, Sharansky discussed the central theme of his book and how Diaspora Jews need to encourage their nations' leaders to stay strong in the face of challenges to democracy from those espousing radical Islam.

"In today's conflict of civilizations, the confrontation with Muslim fundamentalism, the free world has no chance to win if they will keep seeing identity and freedom as enemies – if they see it as a zero sum game, that the less identity you have, the more chance for peace," he said.

Using Europe as an example, Sharansky said that as a society, Europe is "much less protected" from Muslim fundamentalism than Israel, because of its acceptance of what he calls "post-nationalist" thought.

"For the last two generations, Europeans tried to play down and undermine [national] identity, because they believed that is the way to peace and stability… after suffering two awful world wars caused by national identity," he said. "The way they treat multiculturalism is through moral equivalence. They cannot permit that there will be one cultural centre. You must give all rights to everybody, and you cannot impose on them your principals, your norms, including the norms of democracy."

As a result, Europe now has a culture "razed" of identity and susceptible to a take-over from within.

"There is a small [Muslim] society which has no obligation to democracy, but which has a very strong identity, and Europe feels helpless," Sharansky said.

"A society without identity against a society with strong identity has no chance. Why? Because society without identity is a society where there is nothing to die for," he said, adding that the words of John Lennon's song Imagine are not words that lead to peace, despite their intent.

Natan Sharansky

"Lennon's dream… was how good to have a world without religion, nations, borders, states… where there is nothing to die for and to think that that is the way to peace," Sharansky said. "On the other hand, there are people who are saying 'We will kill you. We will [beat] you because you love life and we love death. We have such strong identity fighting for this community or faith… we are ready to sacrifice our lives.'"

The answer to those people, and to ensure democracy can survive, is to fight just as hard for freedom and democracy as identities, he said.

"I found out in my experience, that not only are freedom and identity not enemies, they are allies," Sharansky said. "When we were fighting for freedom in the Soviet Union, the KGB tried to make you concentrate only on one thing: your physical survival. And if you focused only on your physical survival, you had no chance to resist the KGB," he recalled.

Energizing at the Dead Sea

One of the most radically remarkable experiences for a visitor to Israel is a trip to the Dead Sea. Even better is a stay at one of the many outstanding hotels along its shores at Ein Bokek, some 10 to 15 minutes by car south of Masada, at the southern end of this most unusual geologic, hydrologic, marine and mineral phenomenon that has served as a restorative and recreational centre for thousands of years.

From the editor's desk

Cleopatra was known to have often visited the Dead Sea to have the benefit of its mysteriously healing and beautifying salts and minerals. Herod and his retinue of wealthy Judeans, of course, vacationed very close by, atop his magnificent Masada winter home. They, too, undoubtedly dipped their limbs into the thick sea-lake.

Since ancient times, there has been an unbroken caravan of curious, needy and simply sybaritic visitors seeking to comfort themselves in and through the mesmerizing waters of the sea.

Last month, through the co-ordination of the Israel Government Tourism Office, The CJN was invited by the Daniel Dead Sea Resort and Spa of the Tamares Hotel Group to be a guest at the hotel for two nights.

The motor journey alone was a unique visual touring delight.

Our starting point was the history-infused peak of Mount Scopus. Once through the recently opened tunnel under Scopus, we emerged into the starkly distinct beiges, browns, greys and golds of the Judean Desert.

We headed south along winding roads that traversed not only geography but the constant accompanying sensation of time as well. By the time we arrived at the Daniel Resort approximately one hour later we had descended nearly 1,000 metres to the very lowest spot on the planet – the Dead Sea – almost 400 metres below sea level.

To the many visual delights we experienced in getting to the hotel, we would soon be adding an array of new physical and inner delights from actually being there.

The view from our ninth-floor room was due east, past the far shore of the lake to the ancient hills of Moab in Jordan. At night, we stared at a round, silver-dollar full moon that hung in the darkened mid-sky almost, it seemed, tantalizingly within our grasp. Its fully formed image reflected white in a long trail across the centre of the black, unstirring lake below us.

Through the centre of the cavernous lobby, full of light and sun, we descended in the transparent glass compartments of the elevator to the hotel's spa where we would imminently experience a veritable nirvana of healing and relaxation.

There are three pools in the spa: a Dead Sea water pool and two smaller, adjacent cold-water and sulphur pools. Beside the pools are three different steam rooms.

One cannot swim in the waters of the Dead Sea. The water is simply too dense, almost 10 times that of ordinary sea water, too thick with salt and other mineral matter. The body floats but does not remain submerged. Nor indeed does the "floater" wish to submerge himself or herself. The taste of the water is awful. Moreover exposure to the eyes or the mouth can be harmful. But the warm, turgid Dead Sea waters were a soothing balm to the body and especially to arthritic knee joints.

We saw people from all over the world partaking of the magical, mineral, soupy waters of the Dead Sea, voluble, noisy proof of the fact that sufferers of rheumatic, arthritic and various skin conditions flock to the Dead Sea at all times of the year.

The healing mysteries of the Dead Sea water are the core of the hotel's attraction. But that attraction was considerably enhanced by the rich menu of nearly 20 different massages, 16 body and nine different facial treatments offered in the spa.

The mud wrap was a special experience. Pavel, the expert spa technician, covered most of my exposed body with large dollops of soft, warm, thick, black mud scooped from the sea merely metres away from the quiet, dimly lit treatment room in the spa. I lay on the treatment table for more than 30 minutes listening to the music, totally calm and relaxed, enveloped in the wondrous mud, feeling its glowy warmth in the depth of my aching joints.

A long, hot shower washed away the mud. Then, in a different room, still tingling warmly from the close, tight feeling of the mud on my body, I had a classic, Swedish massage.

The combination was exhilarating.

After a time, the exhilaration evolved into a feeling of gentle lassitude and restful inner tranquillity.

To complement the feeling of tranquillity that flowed from the spa treatments, the large outdoor, flower-shaped swimming pool offered recreation, exercise and relaxation.

The dry, hot sun, constant blue-sky, mysteriously therapeutic water and mineral-laden mud seemed to affect everyone at the hotel. For there was an overwhelmingly happy ambience throughout.

Energized by our short two-day stay at the Daniel Dead Sea Resort we headed north to climb high again through the desert and into the hills to the capital of Jerusalem.

RESCUE AT ENTEBBE: On June 27, 1976, two Palestinians and two Germans hijacked Air France Flight 139 after it left Athens on its way to Paris. The plane was diverted to Entebbe, Uganda, where three more terrorists joined the hijackers, with the complicity of the Ugandan government of Idi Amin. The captives were separated by religion. Some 105 Israelis, Jews and crew members were kept hostage. An Israeli commando force rescued the hostages on the night of July 3 and the morning of July 4. Three hostages lost their lives in the crossfire of the rescue. The elderly Dora Bloch, a hostage who had been taken to hospital earlier was killed by the Ugandan government after the rescue. All seven terrorists were killed. Yonatan Netanyahu, inset, the brother of future Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu, was the only Israeli commando killed. Seen here are the hostages as they arrived safely at Ben-Gurion Airport in Tel Aviv.

Birthright Israel alumni give back

By RITA POLIAKOV
CJN Intern

More than 60 Taglit-Birthright Israel alumni spread out across Toronto last Sunday for a tikkun olam day.

Started in the spring of 2005, tikkun olam day takes place twice a year and is sponsored by Toronto's Birthright Israel Alumni Community (BAC). It is a chance for Birthright Israel alumni to reconnect to the Jewish community, in Toronto and Israel, through various volunteer projects.

Volunteers participated in six events throughout the Greater Toronto Area, some of which included working alongside Reena clients; playing bingo with seniors; making care packages for the poor at the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living; and organizing storage units at Ve'ahavta: The Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee.

"However small, the work is going towards bettering people's lives," David Goodman of Toronto's BAC said. "The most impact will be the [project] at Ve'ahavta. The storage facility could be an amazing resource to them."

The event reinforces experiences alumni had on their Birthright Israel trips.

"When we bring people to Israel... we do a number of experiences and tikkun olam is one of them," said Goodman. "We definitely want to keep that consistent. When they come home, we want to give them the opportunity to do similar things."

Volunteers participated in six events throughout the Greater Toronto Area

Jessica Pezim, who helped out at Bernard Betel, said her desire to help the Jewish community started in Israel.

"I had a great experience on Birthright [Israel] and I wanted to come back. We did an incredible tikkun olam day [in Israel.] It encouraged us to want to do so much more."

Cayla Spagat, a trip leader who volunteered at the Bernard Betel, also emphasized the trip's importance in terms of volunteer education.

"It gives [participants] a chance to pay it forward. We're given a gift on the trip, it gives them an outlet to give back," she said. "The trip helps them understand their roots better. If you don't have some way to continue, the feeling will dwindle."

Dana Lengyel, a Birthright Israel alumni and volunteer, agreed that the tikkun olam day reinforced the principles she learned on her trip.

"Birthright [Israel] was the best trip I ever went on. I don't want to lose the friends and sentiments. I have to do my part," she said.

Lengyel worked with Reena clients, making beaded butterflies for children in Sderot.

"It's so insignificant in our daily lives, but it can brighten up a kid's day," she said. "It makes me feel happy that I can make a child in Israel happy."

Jen Weisz, who went on a Birthright Israel trip in December 2006, also made beaded butterflies at Reena.

"They're so cute," she said of their handiwork. "It's a gift, the act of giving makes people smile."

While quite a few volunteers came out last Sunday, Goodman was expecting a better turnout.

"During this time of year, it's difficult because a lot of alumni are out of town," he said.

Shira Webber of BAC, who ran the beaded butterfly activity, agreed. "It's hard right now – people are at summer camp," she said. "But we had a good turnout, [around] 20 people came."

Jewish Foster Homes Needed

Please consider fostering one of these three special boys.

THE FOLLOWING TWO BOYS NEED HOMES WHERE AT LEAST ONE FOSTER PARENT STAYS AT HOME AND CAN INCORPORATE RELEVANT PROFESSIONAL AND/OR CLINICAL EXPERIENCE INTO THE CARE OF THE CHILDREN.

15-YEAR OLD AARON NEEDS ORTHODOX HOME

Aaron is a well-liked and respectful young man who will flourish in a home where the foster parents have experience dealing with challenging youth and are able to provide a structured environment. Aaron's foster parents must be committed to helping him reach his goal of semi-independent living.

6-YEAR OLD JOSH NEEDS LONG-TERM PLACEMENT

Josh is a lovable child with an endearing smile and a dynamic and challenging disposition. As part of our permanency plans for Josh, who attends a day treatment program, we are looking for a family to provide a long-term commitment. With structure, routine and solid support, Josh will thrive.

•••••

18-YEAR OLD DAVID NEEDS SEMI-INDEPENDENT SETTING

The ideal family home for this charming young man will have separate living quarters, such as a basement apartment, where David can look after his own cooking, laundry and rent. As David makes the transition to independent living, he will benefit from some supervision and regular opportunities to interact with the family.

Jewish Family & Child provides training, ongoing support and remuneration to our foster parents. For more information about these or other fostering opportunities, please contact

Bar mitzvah boy raises awareness for Sderot

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

It's common for boys and girls to get anxious ahead of their bar or bat mitzvahs. Whether it's stage fright about singing in front of family or slipping up during the parshah, nerves can jangle.

But the only thing newly bar mitzvahed Josh Wine was nervous about was whether he could raise enough local awareness about the embattled residents of Sderot.

This year, as part of his studies at Bialik Hebrew Day School, Wine – and all students in their bar or bat mitzvah year – was obliged to pick a tikkun olam project to work on.

For Wine, the choice was clear: Sderot.

While visiting family in Israel in April, Wine and his parents, Nina and Aaron, met with Sderot resident and activist, Alon Davidi, chair of the Committee For A Secure Sderot – a grassroots organization dedicated to "[bringing] to light the ongoing lack of security and defence of the city of Sderot."

Davidi told the family about a project the residents of Sderot had embarked upon – to build a shelter-Gymboree attached to a local grocery store where their children can be safe during rocket attacks.

According to the committee, more than 6,900 Qassam rockets have been fired at Sderot over the last six years by Hamas and other terrorist groups operating out of Gaza.

Aside from causing deaths and injuries, the almost daily missile barrage has disrupted day-to-day life, triggered an economic downturn for the community and scarred the psyche of young and old alike.

"In school, we learned that Gaza has been attacking Sderot. Israel is an important part of my life and I wanted to do something," Wine told The CJN just two weeks after his bar mitzvah.

Wine returned from his Israel trip with 500 rubber bracelets, each one inscribed in Hebrew with the words "Sderot is in My Heart" courtesy Davidi, and commenced selling them at school to raise money for his mission prior to his bar mitzvah.

"All my friends think it's a great cause. And everyone at Bialik knows what's happening in Sderot now," Wine said. "My plan is to have as many people wearing these [Sderot bracelets] as possible."

As of last week, Wine said he had just 50 bracelets left after selling them at school and handing them out at his bar mitzvah.

"On the place cards at my bar mitzvah, we [wrote] that a contribution had been made to Sderot," Wine said. "It started conversation… and was good for generating awareness. It also helped [guests] to want to help Sderot more."

In all, over the course of the last few months Wine has successfully raised more than $5,000 for the project.

Total cost for the Sderot Gymboree project is estimated to be around $187,000.

Wine's donation is being handled by local philanthropist and Sderot activist, Rachelle Bronfman.

As co-executive producer of a June 15 fundraising concert by Israeli world music star Mosh Ben Ari, Bronfman was instrumental in helping raise more than $40,000 for the town of Sderot via ticket sales, she told The CJN last month.

Wine credits her with helping raise his awareness of the situation in Sderot and also with facilitating his act of chesed at the bar mitzvah.

"I see to it that every single penny is used to help Sderot," Bronfman said. "There's no administration costs. Everyone in Sderot is waiting for this project to happen."

Bronfman is passionate about helping the people of Sderot and was inspired when she heard about Wine's bar mitzvah fundraising effort. It has since become her newest pet project in aid of the committee.

"I decided this could be an amazing project where kids could individually make a difference. We'll be promoting this to the community," she said. "In one fell swoop, Josh really made a difference. If other children or parents are interested in similar projects for their bar or bat mitzvahs, they can contact me personally."

As a token of appreciation for his work on their behalf, the committee sent Wine a commemorative certificate of thanks and Bronfman presented an additional red leather bracelet with the word "Sderot" on it as a keepsake.

For more information on the bar/bat mitzvah program, contact Rachelle Bronfman at rb18@sympatico.ca

Foundation drums up excitement for 100th anniversary

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

While Jews around the world are still celebrating Israel's 60th anniversary, the country is also gearing up for a new round of festivities in 2009.

Next April, Jews around the world will begin toasting Tel Aviv-Yafo, the country's largest city and commercial centre. Israel's only bona fide metropolis will be 100 years old next year, and dozens of cultural and sporting events will be held over an eight-month span in honour of this historic milestone.

On a recent trip to Toronto, Admiral Abraham Ben-Shoshan, director general of the Tel Aviv Foundation, challenged Canadians to mark the centennial by getting involved with the foundation, a non-profit organization that bankrolls education, social welfare, heath, cultural and environmental programs to improve the quality of life in the city.

He equated the 30-year old foundation, which is funded by an international network of donors that includes Israelis, to "the right arm of the mayor," explaining that the non-denominational organization identifies social, educational or cultural projects within the city and connects them with private and corporate donors. "The foundation helps the mayor achieve beyond what the city budget can afford."

He said Ron Huldai, Tel Aviv's two-term mayor, set a goal of completing 150 projects in the fields of education, social services, arts and culture, and sports and recreation. In the last six years, this goal has been achieved with the help of supporters of Tel Aviv-Yafo around the world.

Ben-Shoshan noted that 40 per cent of Tel Aviv residents, or 140,000 people, live below or at the poverty line. "We have to take care of them."

In fours years at the foundation's helm, he said he has learned a lot about the city's social problems and the disparity between rich and poor residents. The ongoing challenge is to find ways to "bridge the gap."

He stressed that the high level of educational, health and cultural programs funded by the Tel Aviv Foundation is one of the best ways to minimize socio-economic inequities.

Ben-Shoshan pointed to the gains made by the foundation in early childhood education, noting that prior to the foundation's founding, there were few early childhood education programs for disadvantaged children. "The mayor said that we should help every child. We began renovating buildings to provide pre-kindergarten enrichment programs. Today there are 8,000 children enrolled. That represents a 45 per cent increase in enrolment.

"The children come from 8 a.m. to four in the afternoon, and we serve them hot meals."

He said another problem area identified by the mayor was the high dropout rate among high school students in the southern part of Tel Aviv. "This is a more deprived area of the city, with a dropout rate of 31 per cent."

The foundation built libraries and resource centres in all the schools. "We bought books and computers, and we hired teachers to help the students to do their homework."

Ben-Shoshan said feeding the soul through the arts was another aspect of the work. "We wanted to open the children to new experiences, like exposure to the opera. We built music centres where the students could listen to music and get enriched."

Within seven years, the initiative paid off. The dropout rate fell from to nine per cent from 31, he said.

Ben-Shoshan also touted the achievements of Hemda, a high-level science education centre that is a resource centre for 18 high schools. "The place has state-of-the-art laboratories. It is staffed by teachers trained at the PhD level."

He highlighted some of the foundation's many success stories. It has funded more than 400 projects, including 14 health centres, 15 music conservatories, numerous sports and recreational centres and parks and outdoor playgrounds, as well as social, health and nutrition programs for the elderly.

Ben-Shoshan said that one of the programs that has been very well received and needs to expand is the establishment of social clubs– right now there are two – for Holocaust survivors. (He estimated that of the 80,000 seniors living in Tel Aviv, 30,000 are survivors.)

Many of these people are child survivors who were previously isolated from other survivors, he explained. "The social connections they are making now changed their quality of life. The net effect is unbelievable."

Wretched choices

The Israeli cabinet voted on Sunday to conclude an exchange with Hezbollah to bring back Eldad Regev and Ehud Goldwasser, the two Israel Defence Forces reservists who were kidnapped by Hezbollah two years ago. It is believed however, sadly and painfully, that only the bodies of the two men will be returning to their families and to their country which they served. The men are believed to be dead.

The agreement was reached through the mediation of United Nations hostage negotiator and intelligence expert Gerhard Konrad. It is reportedly a complex, four-staged process that will also provide some information about missing Israeli airman Ron Arad, who was shot down over Lebanon more than 20 years ago, in 1986.

In exchange, Israel will reportedly ultimately release the craven and vicious Lebanese terrorist Samir Kuntar, who murdered a Nahariya man and his four-year-old daughter in 1979. Four Hezbollah terrorists and 50 Palestinians in Israeli jails will also be released.

No one should bear any illusions or utter any self-delusions about the nature of the other side. It is a terrorist group, the surrogate of the regime in Tehran, which holds a vice-like grip on the very throat of the government of Lebanon.

That there is still no definitive statement from Hezbollah concerning Regev and Goldwasser's condition speaks to the inhuman cruelty of Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah and his terrorist minions. His refusal to grant the Red Cross access to the soldiers violated every norm of international relations. But then, Israel has bitterly learned that the only norm to expect of Nasrallah is the norm of bloodshed.

The exchange is expected to take place by mid-July. The timing will be orchestrated by Hezbollah to cap its celebration of the second anniversary of the Second Lebanon War. To be sure, the occasion will be a hysterical festival of hatred.

Israel will have to grit its teeth at that time in the face of imagery that will surely infuriate and enrage. And the criticisms in Israel of the exchange will all be valid: once again, the Jewish state negotiated with terrorists; the agreement will encourage other kidnapping attempts by terrorists; and the military might of Israel was exposed as being impotent in these circumstances.

Though the vote was 22-3, the debate in Israel's cabinet was said to be emotional. In the end, of course, the need to bring the soldiers back to their families carried the day. The promise that no IDF soldier will be left on the field of battle remains sacrosanct.

This promise, this belief in the sanctity of life is the elevating quality and the timeless, eternal value that gives Israeli society its strength and resilience. And it is precisely this quality and this value that distinguishes the Jewish state from the cruel enemies it fights.

Israel had wretched and harsh choices. But in the end, it had to bring the soldiers home.

25 years ago in The CJN

The Israeli government decided to restore the old Jewish quarter of Hebron, despite opposition from western governments – including the United States – and from Israeli peace groups. The impetus may have come from the murder of Aharon Gross in the central Hebron market.

Jewish prayer at Queen's Park

It warms the heart to hear that the government of Ontario will be instituting a rotation of opening prayers in the legislature as a token of respect for and appreciation of the various faith groups in this province ("Jewish prayer to be part of Queen's Park rituals," CJN, June 19). I propose that the Jewish prayer be as follows: "Dear Master of the Universe, open the hearts of the honourable members of this legislature who are entrusted with the governance of the province of Ontario. Allow them to understand that true equality and justice for faith-based groups rest not on mere tokenism, but rather on a solution to the longstanding unfairness in faith-based educational funding in this province – a situation that sets Ontario apart from all other democratic jurisdictions in the world. Grant the honourable members the insight and wisdom to remedy this situation speedily and in our day. Amen."

Defending Israeli policy

Michael Helfield's letter ("Ceding the Golan," CJN, June 26) in response to my own letter, makes essentially moot points. Israel is talking to Syria and Hamas. Whether Helfield likes it or not, this is the case, and as far as many of us are concerned, this is a good thing. I find it to be beyond chutzpah that someone is criticizing me for criticizing Israel (which I regularly do on issues with which it transgresses moral boundaries), when, in this specific case, I am defending the actual policy of the Israeli state. I take serious issue with being called by implication, as it were, "anti-Semitic," and am disturbed that The CJN, a publication that is supposed to represent the entire community, would publish this. As I say, I'm the one defending existing Israeli policy here.

Jews and guns

Many CJN readers have family and friends living in the United States and enjoy taking holidays in a number of American cities now beset by gun violence, such as Washington, Chicago, Cleveland, Orlando or Phoenix, to name but a few. Every year, some 12,000 American civilians are shot.

After Chief Justice Antonin Scalia announced the U.S. Supreme Court's ill-advised and closely contested (5-4) decision declaring that home ownership of handguns for self- defence is now an official constitutional right, an American Jew, California Senator Dianne Feinstein, immediately denounced this latest bit of American gun meshugas.

It is also salient that half of the dissenting judges were Jewish, namely Ruth Bader-Ginsburg and Stephen Breyer. Even though the National Rifle Association keeps funding chimera-like branches such as Jews for the Preservation of Firearms Ownership, most Jews are uncomfortable with heavily armed civilian populations, perhaps as an offshoot from the days of the pogroms. Many would agree that the heavily armed settler movement poses a unique threat to Israeli democracy, and that the assassination of prime minister Yitzhak Rabin by an armed fanatic and the massacre of Muslims at prayer perpetrated by Baruch Goldstein were low points in Israel's history. Most Jewish physicians and public health workers know that guns stored in a person's home are far more likely to result in the suicidal death of the owner or his teenage son, a family homicide, or the death of an inquisitive child than they are to be used in one of those incredibly rare instances of a successful defence of the home or family members.

It is now open season on all jurisdictions in the United States that have sane gun control, and, not coincidentally, substantial Jewish populations, cities such as New York, Chicago, San Francisco, and Washington D.C. America is now being gripped by an epidemic of violence, and things are about to get a whole lot worse. Regardless of what your readers think of Toronto's Mayor David Miller, they should get online and sign his petition for a national handgun ban, at www.toronto.ca/handgunban.

I am trying to locate my "long-lost" family in Montreal. My late mother's eldest brother, Lazarus Teitlebaum, immigrated to Canada, settling in Montreal, when he was a teenager. I am trying to find his descendants. I have copies of his three daughters' marriage details from the synagogue records. Sarah married Oscar Soltânov in 1929, Tilly married Victor Marcus in 1930 and Ethel married Sam Segal in 1939. Tilly and Sarah had sons who would hopefully still be alive. I'm coming to Canada in July, and it would be so lovely to meet my Canadian family. If anyone has any information about them, I would be delighted.

Brutal attack on youth reignites French Jews' anger

By DEVORAH LAUTER
JTA

Angry and frightened Jewish youth gathered in the 19th district of northern Paris last Monday evening, June 23, to show support for a 17-year-old Jewish boy who was brutally beaten with metal bars while on his way to synagogue the previous Saturday evening.

Hospital officials said June 23 that Rudy Haddad was temporarily out of a medically induced coma and was "doing better."

But his improved condition did little to quell anger among French Jews over the latest shock to their community.

Angst has intensified in areas such as the 19th district, where inter-ethnic violence between Muslims and blacks of immigrant origin and the Jews living among them has grown more frequent.

The tensions continue despite a general decline in the number of anti-Semitic attacks since the period between 2000 and 2004, which saw a sharp increase.

To many, the June 21 incident was an unexpectedly violent yet anticipated result of such a divisive atmosphere.

The incident, which has grabbed headlines here and renewed debate about the surge of inter-ethnic violence, also has raised new questions about whether the French authorities are doing enough to protect the Jewish community.

While French officials were quick to condemn the attack, most fell short of identifying the crime as anti-Semitic, saying the police first needed to complete their ongoing investigation.

On June 24, Paris police were still looking into possible motives for the beating. Five teens, aged 14 to 17, have been questioned. The Paris public prosecutor on the same day opened a probe into the "anti-Semitic character" of the attack.

The probe will determine if Haddad's unidentified attackers are guilty of "attempted murder aggravated by an anti-Semitic character" and "group violence with aggravating circumstances," Prosecutor Jean-Claude Marin said at a news conference, the AFP news agency reported.

Marin said Haddad was beaten in circumstances related to a string of fights pitting young Jews against young blacks that took place that afternoon and evening.

The prosecutor said investigators believe Haddad was targeted because he was a member of a Jewish band of youths and not necessarily because he was "a person of Jewish origin."

French President Nicolas Sarkozy told reporters while visiting Israel last week that he was "particularly shocked by what happened to a young French boy, on the pretext that he was wearing a kippah," AFP reported.

In an initial presidential statement June 22, Sarkozy denounced the attack but did not draw such conclusions.

The daily France-Soir reported June 23 that police sources believe Haddad was involved in a dispute between Jewish and black boys and was attacked two hours later, when he was alone. Various reports cited between 15 to 30 young blacks attacked.

Chief Rabbi Gilles Bernheim

Police confirmed that Haddad had been held for questioning with three friends in 2007 for involvement in an inter-ethnic dispute.

Yet to many in the Jewish community, especially in the poor, multi-ethnic 19th arrondissement, where the incident took place, few doubted that Haddad was targeted because he was wearing a kippah and was an identifiable Jew.

On June 24, France's newly elected chief rabbi, Gilles Bernheim, shifted his stance on the anti-Semitic nature of Haddad's attack.

The day before he had told the French media that it was "probable" but "not certain" that Haddad was beaten because he was Jewish. But that morning he told French Radio J, a Jewish station, that the incident was "something vile and notoriously anti-Semitic."

While Jewish leaders in the 19th district were discussing the possibility of an organized response to the incident, 150 Jewish youth and some adults spontaneously met near the scene of the crime on June 23 for a second consecutive evening to protest the attack.

"It was senseless, and it could just as well have been me because I'm Jewish," said David Sebban, 17, who spoke with his hands clasped before him, visibly angered and saddened.

As he spoke, a crowd of young Jews rushed to testify of their growing fears for their security in the neighbourhood. Some said they would like to take revenge on the next group of "Arabs" they crossed, referring to Muslim immigrants of North African origin.

"When I go out, I go out with a big group, and if someone calls us a 'dirty Jew,' we fight them," said David, 15, who declined to give his last name.

Most of the kippah-wearing boys and observant girls spoke soberly of increasing tensions in the neighbourhood, which includes the largest Jewish community in Paris.

Though no official statistics exist, community leaders estimate that 25,000 to 30,000 Jews live in the 19th district, while roughly 200,000 live in Paris and its suburbs.

The district had the largest recorded number of anti-Semitic incidents within the French capital in 2007. Last year, 29 incidents were recorded there, compared to 15 in 2006. This contrasts with two or three reported incidents in areas closer to central Paris in 2007.

"We don't want to go out of the house anymore," said a petite Helena Sitbon, 15, who spoke as she leaned against her friend, nervously playing with her gold Star of David charm necklace.

Sitbon said that since June 21, she has been calling her girlfriend to come pick her up from the house, because she is afraid to go outside alone.

"Before we were afraid, but now it's much worse. Where are we?" she begged to know, as those around her nodded and called for unity among their Jewish "brothers and sisters."

Officials and community leaders have noted a recent rise in inter-ethnic skirmishes among neighbourhood youths. They often take place on Saturdays, when many of the neighbourhood's low-income Jews gather between Shabbat morning and evening services at a large, nearby park and are more easily identifiable.

Haddad's violent beating is a reminder of the 2006 anti-Semitic killing of Ilan Halimi, who was kidnapped and tortured before his body was left near railroad tracks just outside Paris.

The latest incident has prompted some to question the French government's response to the ever-present threat of anti-Semitism in French society. Some Jews in the 19th district expressed their frustration June 23 with officials and the French media for declining to identify the June 21 incident as clearly anti-Semitic.

"The government makes an effort," said Joseph Cattan, 60. "But if everything they've done until now still hasn't worked, it means they need to do more."

Yet CRIF, the umbrella organization of the Jewish community, and the International League Against Racism and Anti-Semitism thought the government's swift and firm condemnation of the attack was appropriate, due to the sensitivity of the case.

"I think their reaction was sufficient," said Marc Knobel, a CRIF representative and a researcher on anti-Semitism in Europe. "It was quick, and it shows that those in power take this very seriously. They showed their solidarity, and reminded everyone that hurting a Jew is the same as hurting France. There is nothing as powerful as saying that.

"If it was not a question of anti-Semitism, then Sarkozy would not have reacted immediately."

Knobel was among many community leaders who warned that though they believed Haddad was attacked because he was recognized as a Jew, the government was right to exercise great caution before publicly announcing any motives for the crime. Every reported anti-Semitic act further frightens the Jewish population, which has become more insular since this decade's overall rise in anti-Jewish violence.

"We saw a rise in anti-Semitic violence since 2000, which discredited our country," Knobel said, adding that acting without precaution would be irresponsible and "dangerous."

Other Jews said that police authorities and newspapers such as the daily Le Monde tended toward a purely gang-related explanation for the attack, because they were ashamed of their failure to ensure the safety of the country's Jewish population.

"They'll try to do everything to turn this into a common offence," said Rabbi Michel Bouskila, the 19th district Jewish Community Council president. "If we say it is anti-Semitic, it means they have failed. It says the government hasn't done anything."

Some of the adults gathered around a tree-shaded intersection in the rue Petit, beside a kosher cafe, said they were aware that many of the country's non-Jews accused them of "overreacting" to the threat of anti-Semitism.

"In the press, they don't talk about so many of the daily anti-Semitic incidents that happen, because they're not important enough, and because we're so used to it, we don't report most of them," said Patricia Tahar, 56, a mother of two. "It's only the big, violent attacks that make it into the press, so of course the French don't understand why we are scared."

'They wanted to kill my son,' mother says

PARIS — The mother of a teen victim of an alleged anti-Semitic attack in Paris says her son "doesn't remember anything."

Corinne Haddad, whose son Rudy, 17, was beaten and put into a coma for motives French prosecutors believe are linked to his Jewish identity, spoke out June 25 for the first time since the incident.

She told the French daily Le Monde and other media outlets that her son was "not a hoodlum."

"They wanted to kill my son," she told journalists.

Many in France are debating whether Rudy was attacked because he was wearing a kippah or whether the violent beating was the result of gang-related activity.

France's public prosecutor conducting the investigation into the matter told reporters he believed the answer lies somewhere in between and was a result of inter-ethnic group violence "aggravated by an anti-Semitic character."

The five teens held for questioning since the June 21 attack were released June25 but will be recalled for further testimony in the case.

The five, aged 14 to 17, have been labelled "assisted witnesses" by the Paris judge, which puts their status between suspect and witness, news reports said.

Various reports cited between 15 to 30 young blacks attacking Rudy.

Corinne Haddad told reporters that her son was "doing much better."

"Physically he has bruises all over his body, his arms and his face. He has stitches on his head and suffers from a lot of pain from his head," she said. "He is weak, but the doctors say that he'll make it.

"He doesn't remember anything, absolutely nothing. He asked, 'Did I dream?' He saw the bruises on his arms and asked, 'What's this?' He hasn't seen his face yet."

The day of the attack, "Rudy was going to synagogue, I'm certain," Haddad said. "I think he was alone. They wouldn't have left him, the others, they wouldn't have abandoned him like that.

"My son is not a hoodlum. I'm an education counsellor in high school. I work with youth. I taught him moral values. He has friends of all religions, of all races."

Haddad is from the northeastern Paris suburb Pantin and was known to regularly spend time in the 19th district of Paris, where a large community of observant Jews live.

Angst has intensified in areas such as the 19th district, where inter-ethnic violence between Muslims and blacks of immigrant origin and the Jews living among them has grown more frequent.

Haddad said she was aware of fights at the Buttes-Chaumont park in the 19th district, "but I thought they were little incidents."

"Rudy never talked to me about big fights," she said. "Anti-Semitic insults, yes, but nothing very serious.

Opinions

I give, therefore I am

Charity is strange, because people are naturally selfish. People daydream about new cars and jewelry, not about old people in soup kitchens. Yet, people give charity. Why?

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

We give because we love. Humanity is one big family, and it's instinctive to love your family. A few weeks ago, I visited a foster home in Be'er Sheva for troubled teens. Immediately, feelings of compassion stirred in my heart, as if these kids were long-lost relatives.

Love dilutes our instinctive greediness, and motivates us to share with others.

But love is only part of the charity story. Giving charity transforms us into true human beings.

Man is created in the image of God. Being in the image of God is a large burden. It means that we're expected to emulate God the creator and become partners in creation. As Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik put it: "When man, the crowning glory of the cosmos, approaches the world, he finds his task at hand – the task of creation. He must… repair the defects in the cosmos… Man, the creature, is commanded to become a partner with the Creator in the renewal of the cosmos."

Man is driven to fix the world, to be a true partner in creation. Giving charity is an existential need. Or, to put it in other words: I give, therefore I am.

Existential charity doesn't stop at the recipient. World-fixers want to inspire everyone to join them in their mission.

My friend Peter fled Hungary in 1957. Peter had received a visa to go to Vancouver, but when the train from Quebec City stopped in Montreal, he and two friends decided to jump off. Frightened they might get caught by police, they hid in a broom closet.

Late at night, they ventured back into the station and a volunteer from Jewish Immigrant Aid Services was waiting on the platform. He had seen the boys jump off the train, but couldn't find them, so he waited at the station to make sure they had a place to live and some pocket money.

A few years later, Peter tracked down the volunteer and went to visit his small walk-up apartment. There he met the man's widow. The volunteer had died a short time earlier.

Peter wanted to give this woman of modest means some sort of a gift. He insisted that it was simply to honour her husband.

To this, the woman replied: "You want to honour my husband? Then do as he did".

From that day onward, Peter has devoted himself to community work. What Peter does today was inspired years ago by that selfless volunteer, one of God's partners in creation.

And like his anonymous benefactor, Peter can say: "I give, therefore I am."

Obama gets Zionism – why don't our youth?

True, at the annual meeting of AIPAC, the legendary American Israel Public Affairs Committee, in Washington, D.C., the most powerful American politicians tell some of the most powerful American Jews exactly what they want to hear. True, at the meeting in June, Barack Obama overstated his commitment to a united Jerusalem, and then backtracked, causing great controversy. True, during the heat of a presidential campaign, anything one says that is positive about one candidate is perceived to be an endorsement of him, regardless of the writer's intent. Still, it's worth focusing on Obama's remarkable riff about Zionism – and challenging Jews in the United States and Canada to learn at least this from America's Democratic presidential nominee.

Gil Troy in Montreal

Early on in his address, Obama recalled the influence of a Jewish counsellor of his at a summer camp the young Barack attended in the early 1970s. Obama said: "I first became familiar with the story of Israel when I was 11 years old. I learned of the long journey and steady determination of the Jewish people to preserve their identity through faith, family and culture. Year after year, century after century, Jews carried on their traditions, and their dream of a homeland, in the face of impossible odds."

Obama explained that as a young man cut off from his roots, not knowing his father, this quest to return and this deep sense of rootedness moved him. "So I was drawn to the belief that you could sustain a spiritual, emotional and cultural identity," Obama proclaimed. "And I deeply understood the Zionist idea – that there is always a homeland at the centre of our story."

There are three powerful ideas embedded in this short paragraph. Obama offers a compelling "holy trinity" if you will, explaining some of the ways Jews have maintained our identity for thousands of years, despite adversity. Obama talks about "faith, family and culture." He speaks about one's "spiritual, emotional, and cultural identity." I could add history, the land, and tradition as well. I talk about national and historical identity, too. But what's important is that Obama recognizes Judaism's multi-dimensionality. Judaism is not "just" a religion. Jews are a people sharing a common past, certain cultural traits, enduring family values, a binding faith, an interconnected fate in the present, and, we hope, an inspiring and glorious future.

Second, in this speech and elsewhere, Obama talks about the common modern quest for roots, for an identity. He understands that there's more to life than making money and spending money. True success, true fulfilment, comes from knowing who you are – having a deep, enduring, historical identity.

Both the United States and Canada are remarkable countries, welcoming immigrants throughout the world. But both countries, particularly with today's modern consumerist popular culture, encourage a kind of historical amnesia, a disconnect from our Old World past. True, Canada is officially multicultural and more sensitive to those concerns than the United States, but the lure of the "I," of the here-and-now of modern culture, overrides those rhetorical and ideological differences, enticing all of us to jettison our historical identities.

Finally, Obama appreciates the value of having a homeland as an anchor, as a repository of our past, our values, our story – and our future. We need to imagine sometimes what it must have been like for our grandparents and great-grandparents who were cut off from that homeland. We need to imagine sometimes what it must be like for kids like the young Obama, who, while welcomed into the American heartland, know that they are different, know that they have another identity and wish to reconcile it all.

We need to ask, "Do we always remember to keep our homeland – the homeland of Israel – 'at the centre of our story' as modern Jews?" Have too many of us, in the comforts of North America, forgotten how lucky we are to have Israel as an identity anchor? How many of our well-educated, sophisticated 40-year-olds speak as eloquently as Obama did about the power of the Zionist idea historically – and to us personally? And if Obama is willing to say "Yes we can" to our Zionism, how come so many of our youth are not?

Israel: from 60 to 120

The recent Israeli President's Conference, convened and masterminded in Jerusalem by Shimon Peres, was an extraordinary event. Subtitled "Facing Tomorrow" – or in Hebrew, simply Hamachar, Tomorrow – it followed the festivities for Israel's 60th anniversary and celebrated the country's myriad accomplishments in many domains. World leaders, presidents and high-ranking officials of many nations gathered in respect and friendship.

But the conference was more than simply congratulatory. Beyond the exhilaration of the moment, beyond the hoopla of a birthday gala, it was a gathering of brain power to look toward the future – as the presenters took to repeating – from 60 to 120.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

Most impressive were the open and in-depth discussions about the problems that Israel faces in this new century. While security remains an ongoing concern, it was the soul of the country that many of the participants – writers, political scientists, lawyers, professors, politicians – addressed, on many levels and in different realms. Without diminishing the complexity of what was discussed, I would say that two themes emerged as central: poverty and solidarity.

At the start of the conference, writer Amos Oz recalled a news report in the 1950s about a little girl who said she went to bed hungry at night. The country, Oz remembered, was shocked. Hunger? In Israel? A hungry child? How could that be? How could we allow it? The Knesset, the media – simply everyone, as Oz remembers it – became preoccupied with resolving the problem of poverty in Israel, a crushing poverty that sent children to bed with empty bellies.

Today, Oz noted with sadness, many go hungry, but no one feels shocked. The gap between the haves and the have-nots keeps widening, and the ethos of care – the sense of responsibility for the have-nots – seems to have diminished. The solidarity that defined Israel in the 1950s – an Israel far less materially endowed than today's – seems to have given way, in more affluent times, to special interests and self interest.

This dual focus – responsibility for eradicating poverty and its attendant problems, and reinvigorating a sense of social solidarity – was echoed throughout the three-day conference, from many angles and by many speakers, from educators and philosophers to politicians and high-ranking government officials. Indeed, it was reiterated by Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, Defence Minister Ehud Barak and Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu at the closing session of the conference.

To be sure, Israel in its second half-century is different from Israel in its first decades. Then, it was easier to maintain the sense of cohesion and belonging in a small and more homogeneous population, especially with the very creation of the state in living memory of most of its inhabitants. Today, Israel is blessed and challenged with a booming population, and one of increasing diversity. Not only have Jews from a vast array of cultures made aliyah, but Israel is home to foreign workers separated from loved ones by thousands of miles, and it's a haven to refugees from genocide and persecution in places such as Darfur.

None of the conference participants suggested that renewing social solidarity was an impossible goal, a pipe dream, a child's idyll. Rather, the responsibility for one's neighbours was seen as integral to the deep ethos of the country and profoundly Jewish. While it may sound like an ethereal goal compared with the more practical and tangible problem of poverty, it's the ethical commitment that underlies resolving other concerns.

Many tourists visit Israel without ever facing the country's poverty head-on. Dazzled by the country's spiritual, natural and physical richness, and awed by its progress in so many industries, most visitors never venture into an overcrowded classroom, an inadequate apartment, or foreign workers' quarters. And most countries, celebrating a significant milestone with international dignitaries and other invited guests, would not draw attention to such things.

But this conference demonstrated that Israel is not like most countries. At 60, Israel can rightly revel in its achievements – the creation and maturation of the state itself, against great odds; its inventiveness in areas such as agriculture, high tech, renewable energy sources, medicine; and its literary and cultural production. At the same time, its highest office encourages and fosters open, public and transparent discussions of problems and challenges that need to be solved.

In hosting, Peres brought honour to the office of the president and established his legacy for generations to come.

Sharansky says be prepared to fight

Sharansky spent nine years in prison before finally being released and making aliyah to Israel in 1986.

"In order to resist the KGB, you had to feel there are things which are more important than your physical life. This could be the history to which you want to belong, community, faith… these are things that if you feel them very deeply, then your own physical survival is not the most important thing. The survival of that people, or community or that faith is more important to you."

When asked about Israel and its current identity, Sharansky said he thinks Israelis should reject any "post-Zionist" arguments that say the country should belong to all of its citizens and not just be a Jewish state.

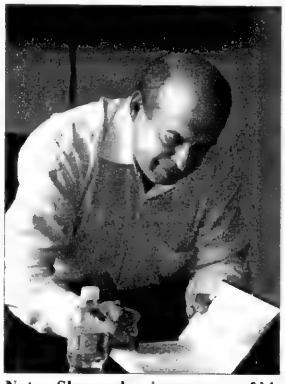
"The only way to protect freedom in this part of the world, to keep Israel a democratic country among others, you need passion, devotion and commitment of national identity," he said.

Asked what Diaspora Jews can do to help Israeli identity and themselves by extension, Sharansky responded they should resist all "attempts to delegitimize Israel. Today, it's very popular this idea that Israel should be a state of all its citizens and not be a Jewish state. And it's an extremely dangerous idea. It will bring the triumph of [Muslim] fundamentalism."

Sharansky argues that ever since the 1993 Oslo peace accords, the peace process between Palestinians and Israelis has been tainted and consistently collapses due to the failure of western leaders to aggressively promote a sense of democratic identity in Palestinian civil society.

"The fact that they have such a leadership, a big share of that blame is on the free world – on America, on Israel, on Canada as well. Because the idea of Oslo was to find a strong dictator to… keep the Palestinians under control," he said.

"So when we try to bribe and build by giving more and more money to create one of the most primitive, cruel and corrupt dictatorships [under former Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat]… the Palestinians' only choice after 15 years of this dictatorship was either to support their own noble terrorists – who maybe want to kill all the Jews, but are at least taking care of them – [while] we constantly, systematically refused to support those democratic dissidents who are in Palestinian society. We didn't think they had enough power to be supportive. As a result, we helped dangerous forces to become more powerful."



Natan Sharansky signs a copy of his new book last week in Toronto.

Sharansky called the current, fragile truce between Israel and Hamas a "demonstration of our weakness," saying that Hamas wasn't even acknowledging the agreement as a truce, but rather as a short-term strategic manoeuvre to buy time to get more weapons for a renewed struggle against Israel.

"We will have to fight, unfortunately," Sharansky said.

"I do believe in coexistence and peace with Palestinian society by encouraging building civil society. I don't believe that we can negotiate that peace with those who ideologically and practically are not ready to accept our existence as a right or a fact, and are ready to sacrifice all their lives to destroy us."

In the meantime, for Sharansky, the best way to shield the democratic world from those who identify with tyranny is to be as prepared to fight and die for freedom.

Would he consider returning to political life to help Israel maintain its identity?

To this, Sharansky smiled, shook his head and quipped, "I was nine years in prison, I was 10 years in Knesset. So no, not back to the Knesset."

Royal Military College appoints another Jewish principal

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Joel J. Sokolsky, the incoming principal of Royal Military College of Canada, Canada's only military university, has big plans.

"I want to raise its profile within Canada by inviting personalities from the worlds of business, scientific research and the arts to spend time at RMC as visiting scholars," said Sokolsky, the school's current dean of arts, in an interview last week.

Joel Sokolsky

Sokolsky, whose appointment takes effect Aug. 1, hopes to expand student and faculty exchanges as well.

His appointment was announced in May by Defence Minister Peter MacKay during convocation ceremonies at RMC, which was established by an act of Canadian Parliament in 1874.

The college was opened two years later, and since then, its graduates have distinguished themselves in the Canadian Forces.

A political scientist, Sokolsky has had a long association with RMC, having started as a faculty member in 1986.

Born in Toronto in 1953, he holds a BA from the University of Toronto, an MA from the School of Advanced International Studies at Johns Hopkins University and a PhD from Harvard University. He then did post-doctoral studies at Dalhousie University.

The recipient of several scholarships and awards, he is an expert in Canadian and U.S. foreign and defence policy, contemporary maritime strategy and international security relations.

The author and co-author of a number of books, monographs and articles, his works include Sea Power in the Nuclear Age: The United States Navy and NATO, 1949-1980 and Canadian Defence Policy: Decisions and Determinants.

He has also taught at Dalhousie University, Duke University and Bridgewater State College, and has served as a consultant to the Canadian government in defence policy, U.S. foreign and defence policy and modern naval strategy.

His wife, Denise, is an artist.

The Sokolskys have three children, Jared, Mark and Rachel.

Sokolsky was hired as RMC's acting dean of arts eight years ago and was named dean in 2001.

The son of Leonard and Rose Sokolsky, he is RMC's second Jewish principal after John Cowan, the current principal.

Asked whether RMC would have selected a Jewish principal 50 years ago, he replied that Canada has matured into "a more tolerant and welcoming country."

RMC has been part of this evolution, he noted.

"Our predominately civilian academic faculty, the military staff and our undergraduate officer cadets and graduate students increasingly reflect the diverse and rich character of Canadian society today," he said.

"At RMC, I have only encountered an attitude of respect and civility toward individuals, regardless of background. This spirit, combined with a dedication to scholarship as an essential component of professional military development, has made RMC a most rewarding and enjoyable place to pursue an academic career."

Although RMC is a military university, it offers degrees in social sciences and humanities, apart from those in science and engineering.

"All undergraduate officer cadets take a core curriculum that includes the sciences, social sciences and humanities," Sokolsky explained.

Expert in Canadian and U.S. foreign and defence policy, contemporary maritime strategy and international security relations

In recent years, RMC has established a writing centre and added a degree in psychology to its roster of degrees.

As principal, Sokolsky wants to build on Cowan's achievements and enhance RMC's role as an incubator of new Canadian officers.

He encourages high school students to consider studying at RMC.

"We provide an excellent undergraduate education, and upon graduation, a commission as an officer in the Canadian Forces," he said.

"Even if you do not pursue a career in the military after your initial commitment, this is a great place to start. You will serve your country and the world while acquiring experience, knowledge and skills that will be invaluable in later years.

"Our graduates have gone on to be leaders in a wide variety of professions in the private and public sectors."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

A GPS for the Jewish soul

By RABBI DEBRA LANDSBERG

Without the aid of satellites, microwaves or the U.S. Defence Department, our rabbis developed the earliest GPS (global positioning system).

Unsurprisingly, it was designed for a radically different kind of navigation than the one you might find in a rental car. Why? Our rabbis weren't wrestling with spatial geography, other than the direction of Jerusalem. What our rabbis urgently needed to do was impress on the Jewish world a GPS for cultural, historical and ultimate navigation. A GPS that – rather then simply saying, "Approaching exit on the right" – calls out Jewish time and space.

The rabbis constructed time as the key to raising consciousness beyond the immediate. They transformed the simple calendar into an intricate device for a Jew to locate herself in time, space and head space. A date approaches this summer, for example, when Jews are to recall the destruction of the first and second temples in 586 BCE and 70 CE. It's a challenge for most of us to remember what we were like as a younger person only 10, 20, or 60 years ago. For an entire people, the challenge is even more formidable.

Tisha b'Av dictates that every year, we must look unsparingly at our reflection in the days of yore of the Jewish nation and see that the destruction of the Second Temple was wrought by sinat chinam (senseless hatred) among Jews. Tisha b'Av demands of me – a liberal woman rabbi – that, for one day at least, I must examine my core beliefs by a yardstick beyond the radically modern values we live our lives by: egalitarianism, social justice, and pluralism.

I must ask myself where these values fit in the scheme of embracing Klal Yisrael, including all those who do not embrace me and those who denigrate the very essence of my beliefs. The prevention of another devastation caused by sinat chinam requires painful choices and comes with no guarantees. Nonetheless, having a day in a calendar that constantly calls us to account is the necessary discipline required for Jews not to lose their bearings.

In truth, we all have at least a fleeting sense of the ideas located within the calendar: repentance, thanksgiving, communal destruction and redemption. However, without setting aside the time, it's hard to internalize such abstractions. We need time to reach into our hearts and minds to locate our unqualified honesty, humility and communal reflection. It requires a determination to transform simple ideas into the stuff of our souls. Jewish time, if you allow it, will do the work of moulding and forming consciousness.

The Jewish calendar – based in Torah and detailed by the rabbis – includes about 260 such purposeful days each year. From every Shabbat to Sfirat HaOmer to the Three Weeks to the Ten Days of Repentance and onward, Jews live in defined and defining time.

With all of that said, at this moment we are at an eerily quiet time in the calendar. We have long completed our seven weeks counting up to Shavuot, and we are weeks away from the count between the 17th day of Tammuz and Tisha b'Av. Our GPS is giving few directions or guidance.

Yet, it is in this emptiness that we can perhaps renew our ability to embrace the calendar. We can, at our pace and best suited to our needs, roam the Jewish world. We will not get lost or fall off the map. Rather, we may find that our Jewish journey becomes the destination. A few practical suggestions: go to urj.org/torah and subscribe to 10 Minutes of Torah, or explore myjewishlearing.com or www.hartmaninstitute.com.

The daughters of Zelophehad

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

In the Torah readings coming up, we meet an unusual family. They are unusual in the sense that they are a family of five sisters who find themselves in what they consider to be an unfair situation.

Unfairness is not part of the covenant as they understand it, and so they decide to express their concern. This makes them astounding sisters. Introduced in text as the daughters of Zelophehad, these sisters innovate Judaism and teach us about the complexities of covenant, leadership and community. What makes them so astounding is that they didn't intend to change the nation. They simply intended to address a question.

Just before the nation approaches Israel, as the portions of the land are being allocated, these women come before Moses with a plea for their family. Their father died without leaving any sons. With no sons, there will be no inherited land portion given to the family, and the father's name will subsequently disappear.

The daughters proclaim their father's innocence of any crime, saying that justice would determine that they, the daughters, inherit the intended land portion, even in the absence of male family members. Their plea is for justice on a personal level, since on a national level, it makes no difference whether any single family inherits or not, since these are tribal land affiliations. The question is only a question of justice.

Moses brings their case before God, who not only affirms their rights, but consequently changes the inheritance laws of Israel for all time. And immediately afterward, God tells Moses that he will die before entering the land of Israel. Moses asks that God designate the next leader who can bring the people into the land, and Joshua is named.

These two events, occurring one right after the other, bring the strands of covenant to the forefront. The entire discussion begins with a plea for justice. Zelophehad's family will have no future without a grounding element. The women have rightly understood that the grounding element must be the land of Israel. They are correct.

Moses has a designated family tribe, Levi, and he has left sons. There is no grounding question. However, he, as leader, is concerned with the grounding of the nation. His statement that God must designate the person to come after him is to understand that land alone will not suffice. Leadership is essential. By designating Joshua, God has stated that leadership must come from shared history and vision.

The final step occurs when God states that Joshua must continuously consult and follow the words of Eleazar the priest. Jewish spirituality is to inform everything.

Yet these fundamentals of covenant began with the appearance of five women, sisters, speaking on behalf of their father. The midrash in Exodus Rabbah speaks of a parable of a king who had one daughter. He loved her greatly, and as she grew, her expressions of love grew, so that the king began to call her his sister, and even later, he called her his mother. The daughters of Zelophehad began as daughters, but they presented their case as sisters and ultimately guarded the direction of justice and covenant as matriarchs.

With these ingredients – justice, land, leadership and spirituality – everyone is ready to move forward. It all began with women who had the courage to speak on behalf of justice.

The birth of western civilization

By ALEX GROPPER

The end of the Bronze Age was a cataclysmic event in the history of the Mediterranean – archeology has provided us with ample evidence of the swath of destruction that brought it about.

The fall of the Bronze Age saw the end of a system that had taken almost 2,000 years to establish itself. Some have even compared it to the fall of the Roman Empire at the start of the Middle Ages. As with the fall of Rome, some scholars saw the end of the Bronze Age as being succeeded by its own Dark Age.

Past Forward

Recent excavations are changing this picture, however. In his excavations in south-eastern Turkey, one of my fellow board members at the Canadian Institute for Mediterranean Studies, Prof. Tim Harrison of the University of Toronto's department of Near and Middle Eastern civilizations has found some exciting new evidence of cultural continuity. Some scholars are now looking here for clues to the origins of the enigmatic Sea Peoples, one of the major agents of the mass destruction, amongst whom we find the Philistines of the Bible.

It is fascinating that the earliest evidence we have of Philistine pottery in Israel is identical to the last stages of Mycenaean pottery on the Greek mainland. A number of years ago, the eminent Israeli archeologist and recognized authority on the Philistines, Trude Dothan (dubbed by some as Mrs. Philistine) told me of the remarkable similarity of the floor plan of the earliest Philistine temple in Israel at Tel Qasile (now on the grounds of the University of Tel Aviv) and a Philistine temple on Cyprus. They were virtually identical to a late Mycenaean shrine at Mycenae on the Greek mainland.

The Mycenaeans were responsible for the destruction of Troy, according to many scholars. This raises some intriguing questions about the relationship between the Philistines and Mycenaeans, and whether the Philistines were involved in the Trojan War.

If this is the case, we have two of the most important formative events in the history of western civilization occurring at roughly the same time – the Exodus from Egypt and the Trojan War. It also pits these two cultures in a life and death struggle much earlier than hitherto believed.

It was out of the events surrounding the end of the Bronze Age that western civilization would be born some three centuries later in the Mediterranean. The eighth century BCE saw key elements emerge that would become the foundation of what we now call western civilization, including the birth of Greek culture as exemplified by the emergence of Homer around 770 BCE, as well as the first Olympics, which legend says were held in 776 BCE.

Halfway across the Mediterranean, in Italy, legend places the founding of Rome in 754 BCE. It was also at the end of the eighth century BCE that the Greeks would establish their first colony in Italy on the island of Ischia in the Bay of Naples (Naples being another Greek colony that was established shortly thereafter).

Opposite Italy, in North Africa, the Phoenicians established the colony of Carthage, which would be engaged in a life and death struggle with Rome for control of the Mediterranean some five centuries later. The Phoenicians were closely related to the ancient Israelites and both spoke dialects of the same language – Canaanite. The Phoenicians of Tyre were allies of Israel. One of their kings, Hiram, provided Solomon with builders and material to construct his Temple. One of their princesses, Jezebel, was married to Ahab, son of Omri, king of the northern kingdom of Israel. She was the archetype of the evil woman whom the prophets condemned.

The eighth century was also a high point in the prophetic movement and witnessed the careers of such great figures as Isaiah, Micah and Amos, and this movement would play an important role in establishing the moral foundation of western civilization. But it was another Phoenician invention, the alphabet, that made possible the transmission of these lofty ideals to future generations.

Jewish genetics

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The Internet has been criticized for being a worldwide waste of time. And far too often, those criticisms are valid. But used properly, the Internet can be a critical tool for joining communities and perhaps even saving lives. This is particularly true for people searching for information about Jewish genetic illnesses who can meet others also looking for answers and support.

The best place to start is at the Center for Jewish Genetic Diseases website. The centre has supplied online information and web links about genetic diseases more common among Ashkenazi Jews, including Bloom's syndrome, Canavan disease, Familial Dysautonomia, Fanconia Anemia, Gaucher disease, Mucolipidosis IV, Niemann Pick disease, Tay-Sachs disease and Torsion Dystonia. [nfjgd.org/] You'll find more information at the Chicago Center for Jewish Genetic Disorders [jewishgeneticscenter.org/] and the Canavan Foundation. [tinyurl.com/4n4xdx]

Once you have read through all the websites, you may want a personal connection. An excellent way for someone trying to learn more about a rare Jewish disease is by meeting others who are facing similar challenges. You can join that worldwide community through e-mail lists such as the one for individuals concerned with Gaucher disease and similar genetically based diseases. To join the list, you will need to verify your identity as well as explain your interest in the community. [tinyurl.com/4lhqog]

Like most North American Jews, I am of Ashkenazi descent and was curious about why this background is so often associated with genetic illnesses. Writing in Moment magazine, Beryl Lieff Benderly pointed out the discomfort felt by many whenever a new genetic illness is associated with Ashkenazi Jews. "Scientists have not discovered so many 'Jewish' genes through any evil conspiracy or nefarious plot, but simply because we Ashkenazim are a geneticist's dream of a research population. Highly inbred, bound by intense loyalty, often identifiable by names or culture, geographically concentrated, densely organized into countless voluntary associations, well educated, health conscious, and numerous enough to provide experimenters real statistical power, we are easy to reach and rally whenever scientists need volunteers." [tinyurl.com/55ld5r]

Sephardi Jews also carry genetic disorders but as Dr. Gideon Bach of Jerusalem's Hadassah-Hebrew University Medical Center explains, the way these diseases appear is quite different than in the Ashkenazi population. "The high-frequency genetic disorders specific to Ashkenazim are different from those of the surrounding populations [Poles, Germans]. Sephardim, however, tend to share hereditary diseases with their host population. This is believed to result not from intermarriage, but from natural selection. Kurds and Kurdish Jews, for example, have a genetic predisposition toward thalassemia, an inherited blood disorder. Crippling though thalassemia can be, it protects healthy carriers against a severe form of malaria, and may thus have been genetically selected." [tinyurl.com/4arxr8]

Speaking of thalassemia, several years ago, Montrealer Stanley Diamond discovered that he is a carrier of a mutation of the beta-thalassemia gene. [thalassemia.org] The gene doesn't affect carriers themselves but could be a "ticking time bomb" for descendants who marry other unsuspecting carriers. Since beta-thalassemia is so rare among Ashkenazi Jews like Diamond, there is a good chance of misdiagnosis – unless families at risk are contacted. As an expert in genealogy, he has spent years tracking down and warning other carriers. [tinyurl.com/4hn27n]

Although the list of genetic illnesses is formidable, there have been some successes since Tay-Sachs came into the Jewish consciousness in the 1970s. [tinyurl.com/5cgl8e] In January 2005, Ha'aretz reported that the "Jewish disease" has been almost completely eradicated. Hadassah University Hospital geneticist Prof. Gideon Bach said that accomplishment can be attributed primarily to the fact that the general public in Israel is advised to carry out genetic tests to diagnose the disease before the birth of the baby. In the event an unborn baby is diagnosed with Tay-Sachs, the pregnancy is usually terminated. As well, Bach credited the work of screening conducted among haredi Jews to determine whether prospective couples would be likely to produce children with genetic illnesses. [tinyurl.com/3n4lur]

Next time, a look at Jewish genetic screening.

Winnipeg man in life support controversy dies

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Sam Golubchuk, the man at the centre of a legal battle involving the question of who has the right to make end-of-life decisions for medical patients, died in hospital June 24 of natural causes while still on life support.

The death of Golubchuk, an 84-year-old Orthodox Jew, means that the legal battle in his case over whether doctors have the right to remove a patient's life support against a family's wishes and religious beliefs will not be decided ultimately in court.

At Golubchuk's funeral, Dr. Joel Zivot, a critical care specialist who is Jewish, came forward to say that he had contacted Golubchuk's children and agreed to care for Golubchuk in his remaining days after three doctors at Winnipeg's Grace Hospital had refused to do so.

Zivot told those in attendance: "After I heard other physicians had concerns about treating Mr. Golubchuk, I called Mr. Kravetsky [the family's lawyer], and I told him that I wanted to meet with Mr. Golubchuk's children, and I met with them… I told them that it was my obligation as a physician to honour the wishes of my patients… There are doctors who believe that it is a duty to care for our patients. I was honoured and privileged to care for him [Mr. Golubchuk] in the last few days of his life."

"Percy Golubchuk and Miriam Geller [Golubchuk's children] called me to ask me to be a pallbearer, and I am honoured to be one," Zivot added.

Last November, Golubchuk's children won a temporary injunction to prevent doctors at Grace Hospital from removing their father from life support against their religious beliefs, and the issue was to be decided in court in September.

Three doctors resigned rather than follow the court order, on the grounds that they were unnecessarily inflicting pain on an individual so close to death.

Neil Kravetsky, the lawyer for the family, said that while Golubchuk's fate wasn't sealed by a final court ruling against the hospital, in essence, the World War II veteran won his case.

"Mr. Golubchuk won. No one took him off life support. He died when his time had come, not when a doctor succeeded in pulling him off. He went on to live another seven months after he was supposed to be at death's door… Sam went to his maker when his maker was ready," Kravetsky said.

Golubchuk's daughter, Miriam Geller, said, "The final decision was God's decision, not what the doctors wanted."

Kravetsky, who spoke at the funeral and was also a pallbearer, added: "Sam Golubchuk in his life was a fighter who fought for his country and for democracy… He believed that one of the most important things was the right to freedom and the freedom to choose. I believe that Sam Golubchuk fought for democracy in his life and he fought for democracy in his death."

Kravetsky said that there "are hundreds of thousands of people who will remember the name Sam Golubchuk."

Lawyer Martin Glazer read out a letter from Dr. Leon Zacharowicz, a neurologist who had intended to be an expert witness at the trial, which was set for September.

In it, Zacharowicz said that Golubchuk "was said to be a stubborn man, and he remained stubborn to the very end. He would not simply roll over and die. He fought on, until his last breath, until the sepsis from bedsores acquired at Grace Hospital overcame him, apparently, in an anti-climax to a heroic struggle. But in his life and in his death, [he] was and remains a hero."

Pallbearers carry the casket of Sam Golubchuk.

Zacharowicz added: "In Europe, Sam Golubchuk didn't flinch in battle, and he didn't flinch in his battle [with the hospital]…He worshipped only one God."

Kravetsky said of Golubchuk's children, "They were very dedicated to their father. They would spend hours with him [in the hospital]. They loved him right to the end. We should all have children like that."

Rabbi Avrohom Altein, who also eulogized Golubchuk, said, "It is one of the oddities of life that Mr. Golubchuk, who was by nature a quiet, reserved, and humble person, who didn't seek the limelight spent so much of the last part of his life in the limelight.

Rabbi Altein added that Golubchuk was always committed to his principles.

"When Sam went into the army at age 16, despite wartime conditions he refused to eat non-kosher meat. He would give non-Jewish soldiers his meat so he could trade for something kosher," he said.

Kravetsky said he hopes Golubchuk's experience will have a lasting impact.

"Maybe, as a result of this case, the government here will legislate a bill as to how end-of-life decisions are made. Israel has legislation on this subject, and I'd like to see it," he said.

6 year-old Josh needs special foster home lovable child has dynamic personality

Six-year old "Josh" is a lovable child with a dynamic and challenging disposition. He is quite energetic and loves to play outdoor sports. He has many passions, including cars and music.

Josh is a fun-loving youngster with an engaging personality. He needs a loving Jewish foster home.

Josh enjoys school and receives extra support in the day treatment classroom he attends. He is in good general health, sleeps and eats well. Josh has been diagnosed with ADHD and has some learning issues. Although he displays some challenging behaviours, these can be managed with routine and structure.

This terrific little guy likes to please others and is loving and caring. Josh enjoys one-on-one attention. He needs foster parents who will make a long-term commitment, be accepting of his needs, and be patient and consistent in his care. Josh should live in a family where at least one foster parent stays at home and can incorporate relevant professional and/or clinical experience into his care.

Jewish Heritage Centre of Western Canada updates cemetery project

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Genealogical Institute of the Jewish Historical Society, which has since been renamed the Jewish Heritage Centre of Western Canada (JHC), began photographing gravestones in all the Jewish cemeteries in Manitoba 12 years ago.

In late May, JHC volunteers were back at work updating that pictorial record.

"The first time, it took us a year to take the photos and organize them into albums," said Lynn Roseman, co-ordinator of the first cemeteries project who has volunteered to lead this latest round.

That first effort required 656 rolls of film, and totalled more than 30,000 photos including two prints for each photo. (Second copies of the photos were made for the trustees of the cemeteries.)

Thirty-five volunteers put in about 1,200 hours of their time on the project, and it took more than a year to take the photos and organize them in easily accessible albums.

With digital cameras this time, Roseman noted, the photography is much quicker with fewer volunteers.

"We completed photographing all the headstones at the Shaarey Zedek Cemetery [the largest Jewish cemetery in Winnipeg] in two days," she said.

"We started the project originally for genealogical purposes," said Louis Kessler, past president of the JHC, one of the original organizers of the project.

"Headstones can provide valuable genealogical information. This is especially so for Jewish people whose parents' and grandparents' names are written in Hebrew on the stones."

Another aspect of the project, Kessler noted, concerns preserving the stones. He points out that a couple of years after the project was completed, more than 100 headstones were vandalized at the Hebrew Sick Cemetery.

"Because we had the photographic records, it was much easier to replicate the damaged headstones," Kessler said. He said the JHC receives about 1,000 requests a year from all over the world directed to the headstone photographs.

He added that in the winter, the photographic record allows people to view family headstones that are otherwise inaccessible because they are buried under the snow.

Roseman said her team photographed Jewish cemeteries in Morden and Brandon last fall. Brandon, she said, has had four Jewish burials in the last decade, because the Jewish community numbers just a few individuals.

The photographers also took pictures of the Jewish headstones at Temple Shalom's cemetery inside Chapel Lawn Memorial Gardens.

Many of the Reform congregation's members are in mixed marriages, and the congregation made arrangements outside of the Jewish community so that couples in mixed marriages could be buried together.

Still to come for the JHC photographers are the Bnay Abraham, Hebrew Sick and Rosh Pina cemeteries, which, Roseman estimated, will take one day each to photograph.

"We believe that this was the first project of its kind done by a genealogical society anywhere," Kessler said. "We know many individual cemeteries have been photographed, usually by the cemetery administrators, but we know of no society that has previously attempted such a large scale, comprehensive gravestone photography project."

Since November, minimal brain function

Golubchuk fell in June 2003 and suffered a brain injury, but he could still understand speech and communicate. Since then, he had been cared for in a nursing home, but he went to Grace Hospital's emergency ward last October suffering from pulmonary hypertension and pneumonia.

In November, the hospital took the position that Golubchuk had minimal brain function and that the decision to remove him from life support ought to be made solely by treating physicians, not the courts. But a court ruling in February that extended the November injunction until a trial said that since doctors are not infallible and can make mistakes, a patient's family has the right to seek redress through the courts.

The February ruling said that until the trial, the hospital must provide Golubchuk with antibiotics, blood transfusions and CPR if necessary.

The case sparked a nationwide debate on whether doctors or family members have the right to make the final decision to remove life support in end-of-life cases.

Montreal mikvah reopens to converts

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Immersion ceremonies for Jewish converts have resumed at the Mikveh Israel in Cote St. Luc after months of negotiations between Montreal synagogue rabbis and Rabbi Itche Gurary, the mikvah's manager since its inception 27 years ago and the man who put the ban into place.

Rabbi Michael Whitman, of the Orthodox Adath Israel Poale Zedek Anshei Ozeroff synagogue, and Rabbi Lionel Moses, of the Conservative Shaare Zion Congregation, were among those praising Rabbi Gurary last week.

"He's devoted himself to it, and its largely because of him that this agreement has come to be," Rabbi Whitman said. "The whole community owes a debt of gratitude to [him] for his selfless service."

Such comments were few and far between back in February 2007, when Rabbi Gurary officially banned immersions for all Jewish converts, a policy that was actually put in place in September of the previous year.

While Orthodox converts had alternative mikvahs to choose from locally, non-Orthodox converts were obliged to seek ritual immersions outside the city, usually in Ottawa.

At the time, critics said Rabbi Gurary's real aim was to keep out non-Orthodox converts. But Rabbi Gurary insisted that the policy was related to maintaining the mikvah's cleanliness.

According to Rabbi Whitman, the deal struck with Rabbi Gurary entails two "guidelines."

The first is that conversion immersions will always be considered a secondary priority at the mikvah, compared to its first priority, which is to serve women for ritual immersion at night, and that conversion immersions must not interfere with the facility's maintenance.

The second guideline is that the mikvah, while allowing converts from all Jewish streams to use its facilities "as a courtesy to the community," is not thereby giving such conversions any form of religious sanction or imprimatur.

The mikvah "will not take responsibility for any of the conversions done there," Rabbi Whitman said. "They are only under the auspices of whoever does that conversion. The mikvah itself is not in the conversion business."

Rabbi Whitman said while Mikveh Israel, in any case, never gave official sanction to conversions before the ban, the agreement with Rabbi Gurary was a "clarification" of the issue.

Rabbi Whitman estimated that Montreal has about 100 conversions a year among all streams of Judaism.

He praised Rabbi Gurary for being "very, very helpful" in finding a resolution to the matter.

Asked what he thought made Rabbi Gurary reconsider the ban, Rabbi Whitman said, "I think it was the process of speaking together and seeing what was best for the community and the mikvah, the process of discussing it over a long period of time."

Rabbi Whitman, who also heads the Rabbinical Council of Montreal, also praised one of his own congregants, Louis Drazin, whom he said played a pivotal role in negotiations. Another key figure was Rabbi Mordecai Zeitz of the Orthodox Congregation Beth Tikvah in Dollard des Ormeaux, he said.

Rabbi Moses said he was "ecstatic" about the ban coming to an end.

"All of the parties involved have all been exceedingly helpful in getting this all back together," he said.

"And it's working. We just had a meeting of the Montreal Board of Rabbis, and the update is that everyone is satisfied.

"So kudos to Rabbi Gurary and Rabbi Whitman and Rabbi Zeitz, and all the others who have helped make this happen."

He said everyone is "delighted" with the "new operating principles."

"I think it's wonderful."

Reached by phone, Rabbi Gurary said he was not prepared to comment, other than to say "Baruch Hashem" about the dispute being over.

"Whatever Rabbi Whitman said, that's good enough," he added.

Schulich gives $2 mil to Dalhousie

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — A Halifax family that built a reputation for integrity, educational pursuit and cohesiveness has had its name memorialized on a Dalhousie University building.

The Goldberg Computer Science Building was officially named late last month for a family whose matriarch and patriarch came to North America in the early 1900s and moved to Halifax in 1912.

Seven children of Joseph and Sarah Goldberg succeeded in the medical, dental, legal and business communities, spawning grandchildren and great-grandchildren who have carried on the tradition of hard work and success.

A $2-million gift to the university – endowing four $39,000 renewable scholarships, two based on academic excellence and two on community service, plus 18 one-time $5,000 scholarships – were funded by benefactors Seymour Schulich of Toronto and his wife, Tanna Goldberg Schulich. Tanna is a granddaughter of Joseph and Sarah Goldberg, whose oldest son Meyer, Tanna's father, left school after Grade 7 to assist his mother in the family business after the passing of Joseph a few years earlier.

"The motivation for this gift to Dalhousie, from which eight Goldbergs have graduated, and other Goldbergs attended, was the admiration the family has in this community and the close-knit relationship of the Goldbergs," Seymour Schulich said at a press conference prior to the announcement of the naming.

"It's inspiring to me to see that family relationship… I grew up in Montreal, and my family was not anywhere near as close as the family into which I married."

"With the cost of providing a university education much higher than what students pay in fees, this is a debt that should be paid to assist the university to provide those educations," he said.

Goldbergs travelled from Florida, Boston, Toronto and Washington to celebrate the naming, as well as the 65th wedding anniversary of Leonard and Miriam Goldberg. Leonard, 90, a retired dentist and Dal graduate, is the only surviving offspring of Joseph and Sarah.

He said education meant so much to his mother. "I know how proud she would be to see her name connected to Dalhousie in this way."

Students travel to Uganda to build a school

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Hillel of Greater Toronto continued to promote the importance of tikkun olam with a recent trip to Uganda to build a school in a town there.

Ten students from across the Greater Toronto Area travelled to the Ramogi Village near the town of Tororo in eastern Uganda.

This is the second time in as many years that Hillel, the American Jewish World Service (AJWS), a group that grants funds to non-governmental organizations with the aim of alleviating poverty and disease in developing countries, and the Uganda Orphans Rural Development Program (UORDP) have organized a trip for Canadian students to come to the town to build a school.

Meyer Mechanic, a third-year economics student at York University took part in the trip last month from May 12 to 29.

The 21-year-old, who is on the Hillel board as the city-wide student chair, spoke to The CJN about his experience.

"We were there to work with the developing community there. The town has about 600 people, and we went down to build a school, kitchen and latrine, as well as interact with the community, learn a little about the problems facing it and experience something totally different," Mechanic said.

"When we first got there we wound up playing with the children, we wound up interacting freely with the community right away. We had work to do in the morning, and [we learned] about the community in the afternoon. Sometimes we had off time and we would play with the kids, talk with the adults and just really tried to experience the community and figure out what was going on."

In addition to bonding with the members of the community in Ramogi, Mechanic said he also bonded with the participants on the trip.

"The students came from all over the GTA, and it was an amazing show of diversity. We had students of all walks of life and from all different campuses."

The group worked toward a common goal – to improve the quality of life for the village children by giving them access to a new school.

"School is free in Uganda – it is just a matter of where the schools are, so the fact that there is a school there now, allows more kids to go," Mechanic said. "There are now two schools there [in Ramogi Village] because Hillel built a school there last year."

And the trip participants, along with local builders, worked hard to reach that goal.

"There was physical labour involved. We were moving bricks, we were wheelbarrowing, we were plastering, painting, digging," he said, adding that when the two-week trip was over, the school was built, painted and decorated, but the construction of the kitchen and latrine were still underway.

For Mechanic, the most meaningful aspect of the trip was the practice of Jewish values.

"One of the greatest mitzvot there is to provide others with an education. We were able to experience that by giving them a school, and they were able to give that to us based on what we learned on the trip," said Mechanic, who took a year off from his studies at York last year to study at a yeshiva in Jerusalem called Or David.

"Just being there was rewarding. You see smiles on kids' faces, you see the smiles on people around you... You really know that you're helping out there, you see what you're doing and they appreciate it. When you walk into the school and you know it is going to be used in the future, that is a fantastic feeling."

Obituary

Zaionz was a 'stalwart of the community'

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Longtime community leader and activist Charles (Chuck) Zaionz died on June 18 of a stroke. He was 71.

Zaionz was born in Toronto and attended Harbord Collegiate. He became a chartered accountant, going into business with his younger brother, Bernie.

His son, Rafi, and community activist Moshe Ronen, who considers himself Zaionz's protegee, described him as "an armadillo – hard on the outside, soft on the inside."

Charles Zaionz

Zaionz's wife, Ruth, said her husband first became involved in community work when some cousins, who had fled to Argentina to escape the Holocaust, disappeared during the dark days of the Argentine junta. A military dictatorship was in power in Argentina from 1976 to 1983.

Former national Canadian Jewish Congress president and Liberal MP Irwin Cotler, in a note to the family, said that Zaionz was "one of the first to take up the struggle against the Argentine authorities on behalf of the disappeared and indeed was the reason that Congress and myself became involved in this struggle."

He praised Zaionz as "a stalwart of the community – a committed, involved person and a person of honour and integrity."

Cotler added that "he was somebody you could always count on. He was always there to do that which had to be done, without ever seeking any recognition – only the satisfaction of the mitzvah itself."

That was only the beginning of years of Zaionz's community involvement.

He was fiscal chairman of the Board of Jewish Education (now the Mercaz). Rabbi Irwin Witty, the late director of the Board of Jewish Education, recognized his financial genius, Ruth said.

Zaionz was a board member of Associated Hebrew Schools; chairman of CJC, Ontario region; chair of the CJC national executive; an officer of Toronto Jewish Congress (predecessor of today's UJA Federation of Greater Toronto); and a founder of Shaarei Zion Congregation, a small, now defunct Orthodox synagogue in the Leslie Street and Finch Avenue area.

Zaionz was also an avid supporter of the creation of Or Haemet Sephardic School.

Zaionz introduced Ronen to the organized community. As head of the controversial Jewish Students Network, Ronen said he was seen as somewhat of a gadfly. "We were anti-establishment, and we weren't prepared to submit to what the community wanted to do, like supporting Soviet Jewry or Ethiopia."

As soon as Zaionz became regional chair, he appointed Ronen as chair of the Israel Affairs Committee. "He really cared about us [young people]. He respected us, and saw us as the future," Ronen said.

This appointment launched his career with the Jewish community, said Ronen, who went on to become CJC regional chairman, chair of the national executive and eventually national chair of CJC.

Zaionz was "in community politics for the right reasons – not for the glory," Ronen mused.

People didn't see the soft part of him. "He always had integrity and honesty – and it cost him," Ronen pointed out.

At the shivah, Zaionz's co-workers talked about how tough he was, always asking pointed questions and expecting prompt and accurate responses.

Manuel Prutschi, who was executive director of the CJC, Ontario region, when Zaionz was chairman, described him as very intelligent and a quick study. "You didn't have to take a long time explaining an issue to him and having him work out strategies to deal with it," Prutschi said.

To say that Ronen was devoted to his family is an understatement. His brother, Bernie, said that they were always part of each other's lives, sharing the good times and the bad.

But it was as a grandfather that Ronen shone, "glowing when the family was in his house, at his table," Ruth said. Son Rafi noted that "the grandchildren's wishes were his command" and called him "a zaide second to none." Daughter Ilana Winkler agreed with the description – "he was the be-all and end-all of zaides," she said.

Zaionz is survived by Ruth, his wife of 41 years; brother Bernie and his wife Hedda; son Rafi and his wife Ellen; daughter Ilana and her husband Richard Winkler; and grandchildren Yoni, Benny, Sammy, Zach and Maya.

1948...They Were There

Habonim member served in Israeli army, air force, navy

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Ben Ocopnick, a Canadian who risked life and limb for Israel in the 1948 Arab-Israeli war, could well be one of its most unique volunteers.

Now 83, he may have been the only North American machalnik to have served in all three branches of Israel's armed forces – the army, navy and air force – during the momentous struggle for Jewish statehood.

Yet remarkably, he was not just a soldier. Prior to taking up arms for Israel, Ocopnick played a role in the Aliyah Bet campaign, which moved "illegal" Jewish immigrants from refugee camps in Europe to Palestine, past the British blockade. And once the war ended, he became a professional fundraiser for Israel in Canada.

All in all, he spent some four decades working tirelessly on behalf of Israel. "I would do it again," he said the other day as he recalled his multi-faceted experiences. "The adventures I had you couldn't buy."

Born in Montreal and raised in Toronto, he was a member of the Habonim Zionist youth movement when duty suddenly called.

In 1946, he was introduced to Habonim's official emissary, a kibbutznik from Maayan Tzvi, who was in Toronto recruiting young, able-bodied individuals like himself to work on the ships carrying Holocaust survivors to Palestine in contravention of British policy. "He said, 'We're looking for reliable guys to sail the boats.'"

A Canadian air force and army veteran, he was certainly not a seaman. But Ocopnick was a dedicated Zionist, and that was good enough for the Habonim representative.

Before leaving Toronto, Ocopnick, an only child, told his parents, Daniel (a World War I vet of trench warfare) and Lilly, that he was going to New York City to work for the Zionist movement. In actual fact, he boarded a Haganah vessel, the Ulua, bound for Marseilles, France.

"It was a terrible crossing," he said. "The Atlantic was stormy. It took us 14 days to reach Europe."

Once in Marseilles, Ocopnick and his fellow crew members outfitted the ship with bunk beds. They had been assigned to pick up a group of 700 young Jewish women in Treleburg, Sweden, who had been saved by Count Folke Bernadotte, a Swedish diplomat, during the Holocaust.

He will never forget the emotional moment when he greeted these women and led them to the ship that was supposedly heading to Panama but was really on its way to Palestine.

En route, the Ulua picked up an additional 700 passengers. As it approached Haifa, the British authorities ordered it to turn back. The Ulua, disregarding the command, was rammed by several British naval vessels and was swarmed by British sailors.

During an altercation, Ocopnick was struck on the head. Carrying no identity papers, he was deported to a British detention camp in Cyprus, along with the refugees. "Conditions weren't bad," he remembered. "The Jewish Agency made sure we were properly fed."

He remained in Cyprus for about two months, until he was shipped to Palestine under the terms of a British immigrant quota system. In Haifa, he linked up with the Haganah. After a while, he was ordered back to Canada to recruit fighters for the nascent state of Israel.

Shortly afterward, in early 1948, he joined the first wave of Canadians who had volunteered to fight in Palestine, which was plunged into an Arab-Jewish civil war following the passage of the 1947 United Nations partition plan.

"I was gung-ho to go," he said. "I was a Zionist. It was time Jews had a place of their own."

He arrived in Palestine shortly before the Arab invasion in mid-May, carrying a false British passport in the name of Chaim Navitsky. "We were taken from Haifa to Tel Aviv by armoured buses, then given a bit of training and a Mauser rifle."

Having been trained as a wireless air gunner in the Canadian air force and a foot soldier in the Canadian army before his demobilization in 1945, he was not exactly a neophyte when it came to war.

Dispatched to a base in Rehovot, Ocopnick was placed in the Givati Brigade. In his baptism of fire, he participated in battles that culminated with the capture of two Arab villages, Basheet and Abashuha.

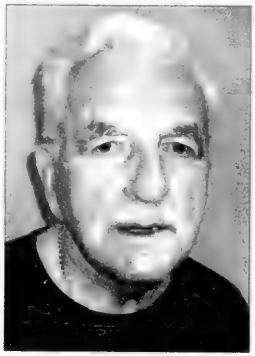
His regiment, which contained 36 Canadians, eventually captured the town of Latrun. Left unconquered, however, was Latrun's strategic police station, which sat astride the road to Jerusalem and was manned by Jordan's Arab Legion.

During the third and final battle of Latrun, when Ocopnick and his fellow Canadians were held back in reserve, the Israeli attack force largely consisted of virtually untrained Hungarian and Romanian Jewish Holocaust survivors from camps in Cyprus who had not even taken the safety catches off their rifles when they went into battle.

The Arab Legion mowed them down mercilessly as hundreds were killed in a catastrophic defeat.

In retrospect, Ocopnick thinks that the newcomers should not have been deployed. "It was a big mistake sending them in," he mused. "Israel was not prepared for this battle."

Shortly after the Latrun debacle, during which a young Israeli officer named Ariel Sharon was badly wounded, Ocopnick was transferred to the navy.



Ben Ocopnick today

In one historic incident, he was a gunner on a vessel that fired on the Altalena, an Irgun militia ship that was illegally transporting weapons and ammunition in defiance of the Israeli army. In another instance, he shot down an Egyptian Dakota aircraft coming in to bomb Tel Aviv. It crashed into the Mediterranean Sea in a plume of black smoke, to the applause of Israeli civilians clapping and shouting on the shore.

With the help of a friend, Ocopnick joined the air force as an assistant flight controller. Based in Be'er Sheva, he held that position until the War of Independence wound down in early 1949.

After being discharged, he considered settling in Israel and living on a kibbutz. But having had a change of heart, he returned to Toronto, where he received $100 for services rendered to Israel.

He worked in his uncle's shoe factory for a time, but then he found a job as a United Jewish Appeal fundraiser. Subsequently, he got married. He and his wife, Sheila, have three children.

Later, he was hired by the United Israel Appeal. When he stepped down in 1986, he had risen to executive director of UIA's Ontario region. In this capacity, he visited Israel on numerous occasions. He returned to UIA as a part-timer, but in the wake of quintuple bypass heart surgery, he retired permanently.

He has great memories of his days as a fighter in Israel. "It was a wonderful adventure for a young, single man. I had the opportunity to do something for the Jewish people, and that was it."

Ocopnick seized the day, and the rest is history.

Israel to 'change paradigm' with Diaspora communities

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

For decades, Diaspora Jews have channelled funds to Israel to support its survival. Now it seems that Israel is prepared to reciprocate.

Last week, in a speech to the Jewish Agency's board of governors meeting in Jerusalem, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert announced that it was time for Israel to "change the paradigm of relations between the State of Israel and the Diaspora."

Olmert said the time has come for Israel to take a more prominent role in the Diaspora-Israel partnership, stressing that world Jewry faces "a serious crisis... Precisely at a time when the State of Israel is flourishing, the Jewish People outside Israel meets unprecedented challenges."

Among other things, those challenges include increased assimilation and intermarriage rates, as well as a decrease in Jews' self-identification as Zionists, he noted.

"The old paradigm of the Diaspora as benefactor and Israel as beneficiary may no longer continue. For the past 60 years, Israel has been the project of the Jewish People. For the next 60 years, the Jewish People will need to be the joint project of Israel and Jewish communities around the world," he said.

Israel's main goals, Olmert said, should now be "to strengthen Jewish education in Jewish communities, including the study of Hebrew; increase awareness regarding Jewish culture and heritage; instil Jewish values; and deepen the links between world Jewish communities and the State of Israel," and for Israel to assume greater responsibility for the Jewish future worldwide, since Israel is now the home to the world's largest Jewish population.

Olmert also suggested that it may be time for the Jewish Agency for Israel to change its name and mission to the Agency for Israel and the Jewish People.

Linda Kislowicz, executive vice-president of UIA Federations Canada – the Canadian arm of the Jewish Agency – attended the speech in Jerusalem and told The CJN that Olmert's remarks signaled a change in Israeli government policy.

"It's a very broadening position for the government in its work with the Jewish Agency," she said. "Canadian and U.S. [Jewish] communities will benefit accordingly. But it's hard to know what this will mean without further details."

The assumption among agency board members was that Israel's new help would include increased funding for a revamped organization.

The Jewish Agency is running a deficit this year of roughly $25 million (US), and expects a budget shortfall of $45 million in 2009.

Hit by the sinking U.S. dollar, rising Israeli inflation and the global economic downturn, the Jewish Agency is trying to reinvent itself as a leaner, more efficient organization and trying to adapt its mission for 21st-century realities: tight budgets, dwindling aliyah and increasing disaffection with Israel among Diaspora Jews.

Last week, the agency's board of governors took a first key step in its new direction by establishing a steering committee to draw up a master plan for boosting Jewish identity abroad and connections between the Diaspora and Israel. The committee will consist of government and agency officials.

In his speech, Olmert specifically mentioned promoting programs focused on bringing Diaspora youth to Israel, including Birthright Israel and Masa.

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Canada-Israel Committee, said that while Olmert's remarks were certainly welcome, he was unsure whether they signified anything new.

"It's not clear how this represents a departure from the past," he said. "There have been different waves of promotion going both ways over the years. Programs like Masa or Birthright are just the other side of the coin. There's always been a healthy dynamism [between Israel and the Diaspora]."

Fogel added: "I think his remarks were just an affirmation of this relationship. Perhaps, in part, his comments are a signal that the Diaspora communities are valued for what they contribute to Israel."

Amir Gissin, Israeli consul general for Toronto and Western Canada, agreed that the time was right for Olmert's remarks.

"It's time for Israel to review the way it views its partnerships with the world Jewish community," he said.

Gissin added that in his view, when compared to other Diaspora communities, Canada's Jewish community is in good shape, saying that it has its "priorities right." He singled out both the Montreal and Toronto communities for diligence in "maintaining Jewish heritage and identity" in the Diaspora.

"All in all, in Canada you will find a strong support and commitment to Jewish education as a means to ensure heritage and [support] for Israel. This is the way it should be, and this is the interest of Israel also," he said.

Richard Pearlstone, chair of the Jewish Agency's board of governors, said Olmert's remarks reflect a new reality in which identification with Israel is seen as the glue that binds Jews worldwide and in which a wealthier Israel can afford to contribute to the Diaspora-Israel relationship.

Cotler briefs UK parliament on Jewish refugees

LONDON — Former Canadian justice minister Irwin Cotler last week told a joint session of the United Kingdom's House of Commons and House of Lords that the plight of Jews from Arab countries must be addressed for there to be lasting peace in the Middle East.

"The pain and plight of 850,000 Jews uprooted and displaced from Arab countries – not only a forgotten, but a forced exodus – has been expunged and eclipsed from both the Middle East peace and justice narratives these past 60 years," he stated. "This is a story that has not been heard. It is a story that has not yet even been told. It is a truth that must now be acknowledged."

Irwin Cotler

Cotler's address was convened by Labour MP John Mann and Lord Anderson of Swansea, in co-operation with Justice for Jews from Arab Countries (JJAC) and the Board of Deputies of British Jews.

Speaking to an overflow crowd, Cotler said Arab countries and the League of Arab States must acknowledge their role in launching an aggressive war against Israel in 1948 and the perpetration of human rights violations against their respective Jewish nationals.

Cotler cited evidence from a report titled Jewish Refugees from Arab Countries: The Case for Rights And Redress which documented for the first time a pattern of state-sanctioned repression and persecution in Arab countries – including Nuremberg-like laws – that targeted Jewish populations. The results were denationalization, forced expulsions, illegal sequestration of property, arbitrary arrest and detention, torture and murder.

Cotler called on the U.K. government to use its influence to ensure that any reference to Palestinian refugees is accompanied by a similarly explicit reference to Jewish refugees from Arab countries.

"Simply put," Cotler concluded "the exclusion and denial of rights and redress to Jewish refugees from Arab countries will prejudice authentic negotiations between the parties and undermine the justice and legitimacy of any agreement. Let there be no mistake about it. Where there is no remembrance, there is no truth; where there is no truth, there will be no justice; where there is no justice, there will be no reconciliation; and where there is no reconciliation, there will be no peace, which we all seek."

Israel Briefs

Palestinians violate truce

Palestinian terrorists continued to violate the cease-fire in the Gaza Strip, firing two mortar shells last Friday morning. No casualties or damage were reported. The previous day, a rocket struck the southern kibbutz of Gevim. No one was hurt. Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni called for a military response to the violation of the week-old cease-fire. Al-Aksa Brigades, an armed wing of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' Fatah faction, claimed responsibility for the attack. Israeli defence officials, who suspended imports into Gaza after two separate shelling attacks Tuesday, had said they would reopen the Gaza-Israel border crossings Friday if there were no more shellings.

Tuesday's attack, claimed by Islamic Jihad terrorists, wounded two people in Sderot.

Israel lobbies IAEA

A top Israeli official secretly met with ambassadors involved in efforts to halt Iran's nuclear program in Vienna. Aaro Abramovich, the director general of Israel's Foreign Ministry, went to the headquarters of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) in Vienna to lobby for stronger action to thwart Iran's nuclear program. Meeting with ambassadors to the IAEA, Abramovich presented them with Israel's concerns about the Iranian program. The visit was the first senior Israeli briefing of IAEA member ambassadors in several years.

Rare Iraqi books saved

Some 300 rare and valuable Jewish books from Iraq have ended up in Israel. The books, from a collection confiscated by Saddam Hussein's secret police, include a 1487 commentary on Job and a volume of biblical prophets printed in Venice in 1617. The Iraqi secret police confiscated and stored a large number of Jewish books. Many were damaged in the beginning of the 2003 U.S.-led war in Iraq during the bombing of Iraqi government buildings. After the war, many of the books were sent to Washington's Library of Congress, and some made their way to private dealers, who bought them from thieves. One private dealer, Mordechai Ben-Porat, who was born in Iraq, sent an emissary to Baghdad, who shipped the books to Israel directly. Eventually, U.S. authorities discovered his activities and barred further shipments. Ben-Porat then smuggled in the remaining books.

These books are the remnants of a once large and vibrant Iraqi Jewish community, numbering 130,000 Jews in 1948. Soon after Israel's creation, Iraqi Jews began to suffer discrimination and fled the country en masse. At present, Iraq is believed to be home to less than 30 Iraqi Jews.

Iran sentences 'Israeli spy' to death

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEHRAN — A court has sentenced an Iranian man to death on charges of spying for Israel, Iranian media said on Monday.

Monday's report identified the convicted as Ali Ashtari, a 45-year-old tradesman in electronic merchandise who supplied military, security and defence centres across the country with electronic devices.

Iran state television quoted an unnamed official as saying Ashtari relayed sensitive information on military, defense and research centers to Israel's Mossad intelligence officers.

The material reportedly included information on Iran's Atomic Energy Organization. The official also said Ashtari, who was arrested in 2007, tried to create a link between Iranian experts and Israeli agents. Ashtari has 20 days to appeal.

"I apologize to the Iranian people and to any organization which has been damaged because of my acts and I request Islamic clemency," the semi-official Fars News Agency quoted Ashtari as telling the court in Tehran.

Ashtari said he had accepted a loan of 50,000 Euros from Israeli agents as he had been in financial straits, Fars reported.

The sentence comes at a time of increased tension between Israel and Iran and speculation of a possible Israeli attack on the Islamic Republic's nuclear installations.

Israeli government spokesperson Mark Regev said Israel has no knowledge whatsoever of this case.

"Ali Ashtari, who had been accused of spying for the Zionist state and charged with engaging in espionage for [Israel's] Mossad intelligence service, has been given the death sentence," the ISNA news agency said.

Ali Ashtari

Iranian media said Ashtari was put on trial Saturday.

The ruling against Ashtari was the first time since 2000 that an Iranian court sentenced an Iranian citizen on the charge of espionage for Israel.

A closed-door trial in 2000 found 10 Iranian Jews guilty of spying for Israel and sentenced them to prison terms ranging from four to 13 years. The convicts were later released, before serving out their full sentences.

Ashtari's conviction comes amid renewed demands for the international community to step up diplomatic pressure on Iran over its nuclear activities.

Israel, along with the United States and many western countries, claims Iran's nuclear program is intended to produce weapons. Iran denies this, saying its program is for peaceful purposes, including electricity production.

With prisoner swap approved, soldiers' families hope for closure

But while Olmert for the first time publicly endorsed the spymasters' assessment that the soldiers should be considered "killed in action," he disagreed with the view that Israel must hand over only the bodies of slain Lebanese in the trade.

"From our earliest days, we are taught that we do not leave men behind [who were] wounded in the battlefield, and that we do not leave soldiers in captivity without attempting to rescue them with all our abilities and powers," Olmert said, according to a transcript of the cabinet session.

"A nation which concedes in order to ensure life, save its wounded, bring home its dead, is a nation which creates unbreakable bonds of mutual obligation."

Arad remains a mystery, Olmert said. Hezbollah has said repeatedly it knows nothing of his whereabouts and, as part of the swap, is required to present a report on its efforts to find out what happened to the airman.

"On the other hand, we know what happened to Udi and Eldad," Olmert said.

Hezbollah, which called the 2006 war its "divine victory" despite its expulsion from southern Lebanon and the devastation wreaked on Beirut, claimed the vote in Jerusalem as another coup.

"All Arabs and Muslims are experiencing historic moments," exulted an anchor on the Shiite's Iranian-backed Al-Manar television station. Kuntar's brother, Bassam, described the deal as a "vindication for the resistance."

Hezbollah had originally demanded the release not only of Lebanese prisoners but of hundreds of other Arabs held in Israeli jails.

The deal is to be implemented within two weeks to allow for Israeli President Shimon Peres to formally pardon Kuntar and for the public to lodge any High Court petitions against the release.

Protests are expected to be muted. Smadar Haran, who lost a husband and four-year-old daughter to Kuntar's rifle, held a news conference to say she would support the swap.

"Samir Kuntar is not my private prisoner," she said. "He's the nation's prisoner."

Arad's relatives, for their part, have been reticent. Though they cancelled a planned meeting with Olmert where he wanted to explain his government's decision-making, few expected them to mount a campaign against bringing Goldwasser and Regev home.

The missing reservists' families welcomed the cabinet vote, though they declined to accept that their loved ones were dead.

Goldwasser's wife, Karnit, voiced hope for closure.

"I'm so very tired. I'm drained from within," she told reporters. "I need a couple of days just to digest this all, to figure out how it's going to end."

The swap finds Olmert at a low point in his administration, beset by a corruption scandal and trying to prod peacemaking with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas while preserving a Gaza Strip truce so that another soldier, Gilad Schalit, can be recovered from Hamas.

The exchange for Goldwasser and Regev, the prime minister hinted, will be a dress rehearsal for the prisoner releases Israel will have to approve allowing Schalit – who is thought to be alive – to come home after more than two years in captivity.

"I hope that the Israeli public will know to draw the necessary conclusion from this so that it will be more prepared and mature for the next time, which already lies in wait for us," Olmert told his cabinet.

"Sooner or later, we will be back here in order to be tormented yet again."

A breath of Canada in Jerusalem

By MARK ELLIOTT SHAPIRO
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — A great place to get a cool breath of Canada in Israel is at the biannual Jerusalem Conference on Canadian Studies.

The theme of this year's 12th annual gathering, which took place from June 16 to 19, was "Responding to the Challenge of Diversity: Canada, Israel and Beyond." Organized by the Israel Association for Canadian Studies (IACS) and the Hebrew University of Jerusalem's Halbert Centre for Canadian Studies, it offered sessions on a variety of subjects in many fields, including education, health care, law, literature and sociology.

Canada's ambassador to Israel, Jon Allen, represented the Canadian government at the conference, and guest speakers included Liberal members of Parliament Bob Rae and Irwin Cotler, as well as filmmaker Simcha Jacobovici.

Jacobovici's Northern Justice, a documentary about the administration of justice in the Northwest Territories, was screened at the event. The film, produced and directed by Jacobovici, is a sensitive study of the interfacing between the Canadian justice system and the country's aboriginal citizens.

Jacobovici recalled how his lighting the candle in the Havdalah service marking the end of the Shabbat set off the smoke detector in the Pond Inlet motel room where he, his wife and infant daughter were staying. That brought Pond Inlet's fire brigade to their room, and the brigade's members thus participated in the the family's Havdalah ceremony that Saturday night.

After the screening of Northern Justice, Cotler recalled a visit to Ottawa by a group of Inuit law students shortly after his appointment. He told them that, as a Jew, he was also the member of an aboriginal people who still lived in its aboriginal homeland. To explain his view of the relationship that should exist between Canada's justice system and its aboriginal citizens, he related the following parable to the students: A group of yeshiva students came to their rabbi and said to him that they loved him. Whereupon he asked them whether they knew what hurt him. They couldn't understand his question; after all, they had just declared their love for him. No, he told them, if they did not know what hurt him, then they did not really love him.

Rae, the keynote speaker at the conference's opening session, commented on decision-making at the government level. When you are in a position of power, he told his audience, you rarely are faced with a choice between a very good option and a very bad one. Instead, in the vast majority of cases, you must choose between a terrible alternative and one that is even worse.

One of the most moving events of the conference was an evening at the Israel Museum dedicated to the memory of Arie Shahar, who, together with Ben Natan and Ralph Halbert (a major donor to Canadian studies in Israel), founded the IACS and was one of its leading figures.

The IACS is one of the oldest of the 27 national and multinational associations for Canadian studies around the globe. Canada has 6,000 to 7,000 ambassadors who are on its payroll with very little cost to the Canadian taxpayer, said Cornelius Remie, president of the International Council of Canadian Studies.

Since their salaries are paid by their universities, a stunning cost-effectiveness ratio is at work, noted Remie: every dollar Canada invests in Canadian studies associations around the world produces 10 to 13.

Two years ago, an IACS grant was awarded to an Israeli master's student for a study concerning the mating patterns of pine beetles in western Canada. The pine beetle is a major threat to Canada's forests and thus to its lumber industry, according to Allen Zysblat, associate chair of the IACS academic committee.

Rocker's latest release is spiritual and God positive

By SHAYLA GUNTER-GOLDSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Josh Nelson's music is difficult to categorize. It's faith-based, spiritual and God positive, yet it's mostly straight-up rock.

And Nelson, while professing a desire to be a positive role model for Jewish youth, is simply a rocker at heart – a very talented rocker.

The Josh Nelson Project's debut CD release, Lift, is unique new Jewish music, unlike any most of us have ever heard before.

"I want to push the envelope of what Jewish music has been and what it will continue to be," says the 30-year-old Nelson, who has been making music for years.

He began playing piano at age six, guitar at eight, drums at 11 and double bass at 13, and was performing in clubs in his native New Bedford, Mass., at 14.

Nelson went on to earn both bachelor and master's degrees in music, and is now close to completing his doctorate.

He got his academic credentials while touring and recording with Jewish musicians, including Craig Taubman, in the United States. He also played with Yom Hadash (New Day), the band he formed with his brother Jon.

Yom Hadash produced several albums and toured heavily. It was a formative experience for Nelson, however, the musical direction was a group effort and left him feeling like he needed something more.

"So much music inside me needed to come out," he says. "I had to branch out on my own and express what was in my heart."

That desire to express himself has manifested itself in Lift, a hard-rocking release that will at times have you joining in on air guitar. The CD, however, does have its tender and moving moments with some stunning and poignant ballads.

Emotions run high on the album. The title track Lift, with its compelling Middle Eastern sound and rhythm, communicates that faith can provide hope and direction when we are broken.

The heartbreaking I is an expression of Nelson's grief over the tragic death of his younger brother Jeremy. Then the listener is snapped out of the melancholy with Positive Change, a funky, sexy and danceable track that suggests we "have immense power to effect change on a deep and important level in other people," Nelson says.

'I want to push the envelope of Jewish music'

With the song Seven, Nelson conveys his love of Shabbat and reminds us how it can help us start over, slow us down and clear our heads.

The stunning track L'dor Vador (From Generation to Generation) is a haunting anthem to our history and our future as the Jewish people.

"We are words and we are stories, we are pictures of the past. We are carriers of wisdom, not the first and not the last," the lyrics say.

All the tracks on Lift were composed, arranged and written by Nelson, with several drawing on traditional liturgy for inspiration.

Nelson finds it fascinating to compose melodies for existing text.

"Everyone has his or her own unique experience with spirituality," he says. "For example, the opening track Yih'yu L'ratzon, taken from Psalm 19:15, translates to 'May the words of my mouth and the meditations of my heart be acceptable to You, O God, my Rock and my Redeemer.'

"This text reaches beyond the act of prayer and speaks volumes about the power of the human voice. It expresses that every word we say over the course of a day has the ability to have a positive impact or effect on the people we meet."

Nelson is aware of how his music can do just that for his audiences – in large part the Jewish youth for whom he performs at concerts through organizations such as the North American Federation of Temple Youth (NFTY), United Synagogue Youth (USY) and the B'nai B'rith Youth Organization (BBYO), as well as at synagogues.

His goal is to be a positive role model for youth, and he loves his involvement with them. Nelson will be in Toronto for the Union for Reform Judaism biennial convention in November 2009, performing and serving as musical director for the event.

"For me, music is really a chance to take a risk and do something that is different. I'm not afraid to make music that expresses who I am and what I believe. My music is definitely rock, and definitely spiritual. It's an expression of the way I observe the world," he says.

Lift is available through iTunes, Amazon.com and other online sources. It will be at major music retailers and Judaica stores soon. For more information, visit www.myspace.com/joshnelsonproject or www.joshnelsonproject.com.

Ben Stein makes the case for 'intelligent design'

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The CJN

Ben Stein, an actor, game-show host, economist and a former Nixon speechwriter, has made a movie about intelligent design – the theory that certain features of the universe and of living things are best explained by an intelligent cause.

After reading about a 2005 court case in Pennsylvania in which a federal judge barred a Pennsylvania public school district from teaching intelligent design, Stein wanted to know more about the theory.

"I thought this is strange. Why would a court of law be telling people that they can't study a variety of evolutionary explanations? What's a court doing here? What's that all about?" said Stein while sipping camomile tea at the Royal York Hotel in Toronto recently. He was in town promoting a documentary about intelligent design that he co-wrote and narrates, Expelled: No Intelligence Allowed.

Stein thought a movie about intelligent design would give him the opportunity to discuss "how Darwinism led to social Darwinism and how that led to Nazism and the Holocaust.

"I always wanted to talk about that," Stein said.

But his executive producer, Walt Ruloff, wanted to look at the belief in an intelligent creator of the universe, so Stein thought: "I'll just investigate this and talk to some mainstream scientists. They'll straighten us out – they'll have all the answers and we'll go on and do the movie about the Holocaust."

When Stein spoke to mainstream scientists, he found their answers less than satisfying. "They didn't know how life started, why the cell was so complex, where gravity, thermodynamics, laws of fluid motion or physical laws that govern the operation of the universe came from," Stein said.

"Well, if they don't know those incredibly basic things, then how can they say Darwinism explains much? Darwinism doesn't seem to explain much at all."

Stein's research on intelligent design proponents – those who question Darwin's theory – brought him surprising results. Scientist Richard von Sternberg had been expelled from the Smithsonian Institute for publishing an article by Stephen Meyer arguing that we're products of a higher intelligence. This was not an isolated case. Many others who were shunned for their beliefs were interviewed for the film.

What did the those who do not support intelligent design say? Richard Dawkins, an evolutionary biologist at Oxford University and a prominent atheist, told Stein, "On the whole they aren't scientists," but admitted that he's "pretty hostile to rival doctrines."

Philip Pettit, a political philosopher at Princeton, said intelligent design is not "a research program," because every theory in hard science must be falsifiable by natural evidence – there must be the potential for the theory to be demonstrated wrong in the natural physical world, and it can't be proved that the world was not created by a higher intelligence. Daniel Dennett, a philosopher of science at Tufts University, dismissed intelligent design as propaganda.

"Darwinists couldn't explain about the creation of the universe and the creation of life – huge subjects. They could just repeat their same old Darwinian orthodoxy – that it all happened by accident," Stein said.

"I didn't find any of them particularly inspiring. I just thought they were cocky and arrogant, and were asking us to take it on their word because they're the boss. 'Meet the new boss, same as the old boss' – as the Who sang in their song [Won't Get Fooled Again].

They just seemed to be saying, 'We're in charge, shut up!'"

Stein wondered why it is that a "theory that isn't threatening anyone with anything makes people so fearful? But it does."

Mainstream media in the United States attacked his film on a "scale never seen before outside of [attacks on former president Richard] Nixon or [president] Mr. [George. W.] Bush. Intelligent design seems to drive people the craziest of anything," Stein said.

"We were just trying to understand the limits of freedom of speech and the limits of Darwinism. If people want to disagree with us, they are free to disagree, but the vituperative nature of their disagreement is stunning."

ISRAELI TOURISM REACHES NEW HEIGHTS AS 300,000 VISITORS ARRIVE IN MAY

Every visitor to Israel these days comes back with the same report: the Israeli economy is booming and the hotels, restaurants, museums and tourist sites are bustling with tourists.

Israel's Ministry of Tourism confirms that the country has received record numbers of visitors this year. About 300,000 tourists arrived in May, an increase of 60 per cent over May 2007 and five per cent above the figures for 2000, Israel's record year for tourism.

Tourism officials say the country is on target for 2.8 million tourists in 2008, and are planning to welcome 3.3. million in 2009.

The ministry is continuing its wide-ranging marketing efforts in North America and key European countries, and increasing efforts in Central Europe (especially France) and Asia. As it works to expand and develop new aviation routes into Israel, it is also facilitating construction of 3,000 new hotel rooms and bringing back another 4,000 rooms into use. It is also working to improve the standard of services in many areas across the tourism infrastructure.

Recognizing the potential of incoming tourism as a lever for economic growth, the ministry's goal is that the country will receive five million tourists in 2012 – a level of tourism that is projected to support 220,000 employees and generate an income of 43 billion NIS.

"Increases in tourism have a positive effect on economic growth and the numbers of people employed in the workforce," said Tourism Minister Shaul Tzemach. "With the continuing growth pattern, this contribution will be felt in all aspects of the tourism industry throughout Israel, with an emphasis on the periphery where many tourism enterprises are located."

U.S. President George W. Bush and his wife, Laura, were among Israel's visitors in May. The presidential couple celebrated the state's 60th anniversary and toured Masada with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and his wife, Aliza.

Group of plays performed in Toronto's oldest hotel

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

The Gladstone Variations is a site-specific theatrical work that groups together four half-hour plays set in Toronto's oldest hotel.

A critical favourite at last year's Toronto Fringe Festival, The Gladstone Variations returns to the Gladstone Hotel this month.

Audiences can see two of the plays at a time and, if they wish, return later for the other two. What is unique is that the audience gets to move around the hotel following the plays' actions.

"The plays were written for the hotel, and the audience follows the actors through rooms, stairwells and various hidden passageways around the hotel," says Julie Tepperman, co-founder with Aaron Willis, of Convergence Theatre, and the writer of one of the plays.

"There was a huge demand for the play at the Fringe last summer and people lined up for hours," she said. (Due to the natural restrictions of the venue, and moving the audience around, capacity is limited to 72 people.) "The hotel really was happy to have us back again. I felt it would be a shame to just let it die," Tepperman said.

As the audience moves around the hotel, guided by "wranglers," sometimes they unwittingly become part of another play as the other audience sees them walking though their "stage" as ghosts in their own play.

This naturally takes a lot of experimentation with stage management and timing as the plays converge with one another. This was honed over the 11 performances at the Fringe last year.

"It's a lot more polished now," Tepperman says. "It's an imperfect piece of theatre that has the potential to be more perfect each time."

The four plays, by different writers, are inspired by the historic building on Queen Street West, and all of them deal in different ways with old ghosts and how the past and present collide.

Tepperman says the hotel gives off an eerie vibe that influenced the plays' themes. "It's creepy. You sit in the Melody Bar and see people there who've never really left. It's the merging of two worlds, past and present," she says.

In Tepperman's play I Grow Old, the main character, Harry Kraft, returns to the Gladstone Hotel 60 years after he and his baseball team, the Lizzies, went dancing there one evening in 1925. He requests his old room and struggles to hold on to the last strands of his memory and face the ghosts of his past.

I Grow Old was inspired by an event in the life of her grandfather, Harry Tepperman, who died of Alzheimer's recently at Baycrest just shy of his 94th birthday.

As a teenager, Harry used to play baseball for the Lizzies, a team out of Central Technical (High) School. One Saturday, Harry and his friends snuck out of shul to drive to a game in Peterborough. On the way there, he switched his window seat with his best friend, Ben Wetstein, in return for a stick of gum.

"Not long after, they were in a tragic car accident where Ben was killed," Tepperman says. "Growing up, I found it sad and eerie. Had he not traded seats for a stick of gum, it would have been he who was killed and I wouldn't exist.

"I always sensed this accident had a tremendous impact on his life and wondered if secretly he blamed himself for the accident as a result of driving on Shabbat -- he never rode in a car on Shabbat again."

This isn't the first time Convergence Theatre has been involved in site-specific plays. In 2006, Convergence produced AutoShow, in which seven plays were performed simultaneously in seven cars in a parking lot, where the audience moved from car to car.

"There's something very exciting when an audience can chose their own perspective," she says. "The idea of being part of it creates an adrenalin you don't get from sitting in your seat."

The Gladstone Variations runs at the Gladstone Hotel, 1214 Queen St. W. July 14 to Aug. 3 at 7 p.m. Monday matinée on July 21 and 28 at 1:30 p.m. No shows on Saturday. Tickets for each of the two variations are available from 416-504-7259 or www.artsboxoffice.ca. Limited tickets are available at the door, one hour before showtime. The venue is non-wheelchair accessible and audience members have to climb stairs and stand.

Romspen co-founder builds communities, preserves past

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

Sheldon Esbin's grandfather emigrated from Poland and Esbin's father was a tailor.

From this humble background, Esbin grew up to become a businessman who builds communities and preserves the past. Not just involved in the financial side of building, he puts his hands and heart into his work as well.

He describes the company he helped create, Romspen Investment Corp., as Ontario's leading non-bank commercial mortgage lender.

The company's investors have received a double-digit yield on their investments since the company's inception, a higher return than from most traditional investments, Esbin said.

Romspen partners put their own money into each mortgage. "What distinguishes us from other funds is that my partners collectively are the largest financial investors in the fund." That, he said, ensures the money is invested wisely.

Over the past 40 years, Esbin, 68, and his partners have attracted some 1,500 investors. He said multimillion-dollar investments aren't uncommon.

Recently, the company, of which Esbin is president, decided to pool all the mortgages they have handpicked in the Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund, which currently consists of some 115 mortgages.

For the past 15 years, Romspen's management has been putting together groups to buy or develop real estate. "We make sure what we build stands the test of time and that people are proud to own," Esbin said.

Building, it would seem, is in his soul.

A founding member of Solel Congregation in Mississauga, he played an integral role in helping to build that house of worship. Originally, some 17 shul members met in a municipal facility. Through fundraising – a series of bingo games in the early 1970s that drew up to 500 people for each game – they were able to raise enough money to build a shul.

When he's not putting up new buildings, Esbin spends his time building tables, chairs and cabinets in his home woodworking studio.

Sheldon Esbin

"I'd be out there building and fixing, and it would sometimes catch the eye of my neighbours. People would occasionally ask me for my card because they needed things fixed," he said.

In the works on a more corporate scale are a Chinese mall, which he is building in Markham, Ont., and a condominium on Bloor Street in downtown Toronto. The latter, a 19-storey building called the Museum House, is across the street from the Royal Ontario Museum. Esbin and his wife, Carol, are buying a unit in the building. "It's about pride of ownership. That sandwich looks so good I ate it myself," Esbin said.

Esbin collects antiques and historical artifacts, of which he has several thousand. His personal art collection includes sculptures by Rodin. The preservation of the historical home Spadina House, in Toronto, is another passion.

"When you hold that, you're holding living history," he said of his vast collection of historical pieces, culled from book fairs, flea markets and garage sales. A standout item of memorabilia for him is a rare pre-Confederation governmental promotional pamphlet published to attract Irish immigrants to Canada.

He boasts of owning some 4,000 rare knick-knacks, including restaurant menus dating back to the 1940s. The oldest item he owns dates back to 1790; it is a North American travel guide with the mention of "Torento" – either an early spelling of Ontario's largest city or a perhaps a typo.

"The fun is in the chase. Once you have it, you are a custodian of that," Esbin said. "You are conserving it for future generations. That's a responsibility."

Esbin supports Empower 50, part of York University's Power of 50 Family Campaign. With funding from the campaign, the Azrieli Foundation has edited, published, distributed and archived a series of Canadian Holocaust survivors' memoirs.

'I cannot emphasize enough how important it is to give back to community'

Esbin is also a Baycrest Circle of Honours donor. The Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care has a special place in his heart, as a grandmother and two of his aunts spent their last years there. As well, he is a North York General Hospital Chairman's Circle and Cornerstone Society donor.

"I cannot emphasize enough how important it is to give back to community. I am so blessed that my grandfather decided to stop in Toronto from Poland. I never had to experience war. I lived with all of this opportunity," Esbin said.

"My father was a tailor and happened to be able to give an education to his three sons, and we were able to prosper. Something is wrong with you if you're not grateful for that."

"But the things I am most proud of are not where I'm writing a cheque, but being involved in meaningful things," he added.

This builder and investor in brick and concrete structures says that it was building a family that has brought him the most meaning.

He has a daughter, Candice, and two grandchildren, J.B., 5, and Maya, 7. "It is really a special thing to bring children to this world, to watch them grow, and it's really an amazing thing to be a part of that. There really is nothing like it," he said.

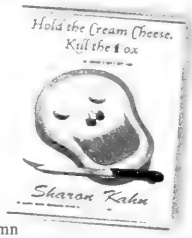
Jewish women solve mysteries in modern crime fiction

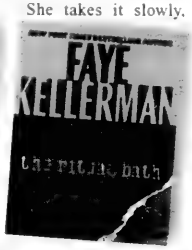
By DOROTHY LIPOVENKO
Special to The CJN

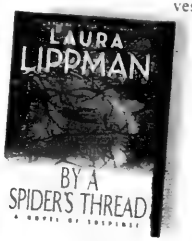
Let's face it: Jewish women have what it takes to be good detectives. Nosey and nudgey? That's curious and persistent turned on its head. Worrywarts? Keeps our radar alert for trouble. Most important: we sure know when something doesn't smell kosher.

So it comes as no surprise that, you'll pardon the expression, one can almost make a minyan from the number of Jewish women solving mysteries and murders in modern crime fiction.

An entire sub-genre of Jewish female sleuths has taken root, and flourished, on whodunit bookshelves. Smart and funny or tough and vulnerable, these women are as different in character and lifestyle as there are recipes for kugel. From religiously observant to circling Judaism's fringes, what they share is a connection to the criminal justice system as private investigators, police detectives or work involving police.







So to juice your summer reading with twists of tension, sides of humour or plots as thick as barley soup, herewith a primer.

The Molly Blume series by Rochelle Krich will keep you turning pages and scarfing mandelbrot on Shabbat afternoons. Molly, a Californian from an Orthodox family, writes a police blotter column that launches her foray into crime-solving – and while she's fasting on the 17th day of Tammuz, no less.

Krich writes smartly, and at least two plots are probably off-beat for crime fiction: a rabbi's daughter runs away with a man she meets online and Molly must find her; in another, the murder of her best friend years ago haunts Molly, who stands her ground against a hard-bitten detective who closes the case when certain pieces of Kabbalah-linked evidence suggest otherwise.

Bonus points for Molly's large and likeable family who appear throughout the series, especially Bubbie G, a tender neshamah and Holocaust survivor with whom Molly has a special bond. Try to read the series in sequence because its debut, Blues in the Night, sets up a storyline (can you say shidduch?) that unfolds deliciously with each successive book.

Far from the lights of Los Angeles is the Ruby-the-Rabbi's-Wife mysteries by Sharon Kahn. Ruby is a widow who lives with her dog Oy Vay in small-town Texas, where her husband was the temple rabbi before his untimely death. Kahn deftly uses food – matzah balls, lox, chopped liver – as entrees to murder and mayhem at the temple, the local bagel bakery and even on a train ride through Canada's Rockies.

A relentlessly curious Ruby is teamed with a recurring cast of temple characters (a nudnik new rabbi, a busybody with food issues) for a breezy, fun read with surprising plot twists. What works particularly well is e-mail between Ruby and her friend Nan in Seattle; their online conversations are witty and amusing, alerting Ruby to danger or ironing out kinks in Ruby's sleuthing. A word of caution: the books' cover art will make you hungry.

Nina Fischman could be Ruby's younger sister. But she's not. She's the creation of Marissa Piesman, who has taken New York Jewish female angst at being 30-something and single, attached it to a legal mind that represents poor souls in Housing Court and given it a smart mouth that belongs to Nina.

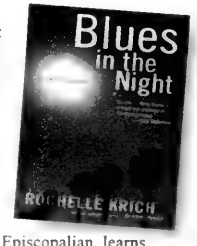
Think Perry Mason's brain in Rhoda Morgenstern's head. With New York as a backdrop and namedrop (Zabar's, Riverside Drive), Nina gets her start as a gumshoe thanks to her sharp, elderly mother with whom she enjoys a good kibbitz and an even better rapport. When old women in neighbourhood apartments start dying unexpectedly, Mrs. Fischman gets suspicious and Nina is sufficiently intrigued to start snooping around.

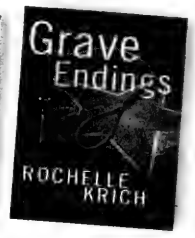
Nina would be the first to admit she's a lox, bagel and cream cheese Jew, but Piesman messes with Nina's head (and heart) by throwing an observant Jewish district attorney into the tumult of Unorthodox Practices, the kickoff novel in the series.

From Los Angeles to New York and back: Krich delivers another crime series with one heck of a twist. Homicide detective Jessica Drake, tough, empathetic and raised Episcopalian, learns that her mother is secretly a Holocaust survivor. Jessica shadow boxes with Yiddishkeit but ultimately goes for it, finding in rituals some relief from the tension of her work.

She takes it slowly, lighting Shabbos candles, eating by their flame, ignoring a ringing phone to keep reading in the stillness at the table. When she looks for kosher challah in the supermarket, you can't help but cheer her on to the finish line.

While Jessica grapples with her new identity, Tess Monaghan has no such difficulty. Yes, Tess is Jewish (her mother was a Weinstein) and she'd be the first to tell you so, but that's about the long and short of it. A self-employed private investigator in Baltimore, Tess has won her creator, Laura Lippman, a slew of literary awards. Tess is sharp, quick-thinking and quite fearless. The plots move along briskly, and Tess' love of her hometown shines through so often you'll feel like you know Baltimore like the back of your hand. While Tess' Jewishness is not germane to the series, it does have a starring role in By a Spider's Thread, when an Orthodox Jewish businessman hires Tess to find his missing wife and children.





No primer would be complete without mention of the Rina Lazarus/Peter Decker mysteries by Faye Kellerman. This popular and prolific series had me hooked from the get-go with the mikvah murder mystery. The first few novels kept up a tantalizing storyline involving Rina, a young widow with two sons in yeshiva, and Decker of the Los Angeles Police Department. But as time went on, I found Rina increasingly annoying, and some of the plotlines seemed way off the charts. But there's at least one good made-for-TV movie in the bunch.

Canada to become member of Holocaust Task Force

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Canada is one year away from full membership in an international group dedicated to commemorating the Holocaust.

Canada was granted "liaison" status recently by the Task Force for International Co-operation on Holocaust Education, Remembrance and Research, said Jason Kenney, secretary of state for multiculturalism and Canadian identity. Canada had enjoyed "observer" status and Kenney expects that within a year, Canada will be granted full membership. The task force consists of 25 member countries, including France, the United States, the United Kingdom, Israel, Austria and Germany. The United Nations, the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) and the Council of Europe are permanent observers.

"We're delighted to be at that table," Kenney said in a telephone interview, adding membership underscores the government's belief that it ought to take steps against Holocaust denial and anti-Semitism.

Members are required to implement "national policies and programs in support of Holocaust education, remembrance, and research," states the task force website. In addition, "the task force also encourages appropriate forms of Holocaust remembrance."

Kenney said Canada already has an educational program on tap – "the commemoration of the St. Louis incident."

Announced only a few weeks ago, the commemoration is slated for Halifax's Pier 21 where the passenger liner carrying more than 900 Jewish refugees docked in the summer of 1939, shortly before World War II broke out. The Canadian government refused to permit the ship's Jewish passengers to disembark, as did the United States and Cuba, its original destination. The ship sailed back to Europe, where an estimated one-third of the passengers were killed in the Holocaust.

Kenney said the federal government would also work with the provinces, which possess jurisdiction over education, to develop curricula that address Holocaust education.

Trestman trods sidelines in mentor Bud Grant's old stomping grounds

By HARVEY ROSEN
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — Following the Winnipeg Blue Bombers' 19-16 pre-season victory over the Montreal Alouettes on June 19, a pair of Montreal scribes and I sauntered into the over-crowded visitors' dressing room just as new head coach Marc Trestman bellowed to the throng who were in various states of undress: "Curfew tonight is 1:30 a.m."

One player, who no doubt wanted to go to the library to do some early-morning research, retorted "Why not 2:30?"

Trestman managed a fixed glare and pronounced: "There's something terribly wrong with that idea!" and headed back to the coach's quarters.

It's a new role for the Jewish mentor, who grew up in suburban Minneapolis and distinguished himself as a student, high-school athlete and later as three-year quarterback of the Golden Gophers at the University of Minnesota. In his senior year, he played at Moorhead State and returned to U of M to obtain a degree in political science.

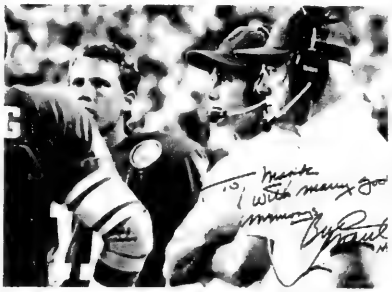
Eager to play in the NFL, Trestman determined in 1978 and 1979 that his best shot would be to make it as a defensive back with the hometown Vikings. Twice he had to face the stark reality that he would not become the next American football idol.

At that juncture, he headed to Florida to pursue a law degree at the University of Miami. Not ever seriously considering trying to stay in football as a coach, he nonetheless responded positively when he was asked by the athletic department in 1981 to volunteer as the quarterback coach of the Hurricanes.

It didn't hurt his resume when in 1983 he was called to the Florida bar and Miami's football team captured the national college championship Orange Bowl.

It wasn't Perry Mason's office that took notice and asked him to join the law firm. Rather, Hall of Fame coach Bud Grant wanted to hire the then 28-year-old.

I reminded Trestman that as he paced the sidelines opposite where Grant himself had trod so many years ago for the Blue Bombers, not to mention the gridiron, where he made highlight-reel catches. I wanted to know how important that initial call from the football legend was.



Marc Trestman, second from right, was 28 years old when his mentor Bud Grant, right, hired him as offensive back coach with the Minnesota Vikings.

The trim, 6-3, freshly-minted head coach answered: "He meant everything to me, because he was the guy who saw in me something I didn't see in myself, and he hired me to coach in the National Football League.

"It's something I never saw coming. He saw it in me growing up playing basketball against his son and I was in training camp a couple times. He's the guy who got me started at the professional level, and I still talk to him on a regular basis. There's always something wise he has to say to me."

Between 1985 and 2005, Trestman served as quarterbacks coach or offensive co-ordinator with the Vikings, Buccaneers, Browns, 49ers, Lions, Cardinals, Dolphins and Raiders. But the intense and cerebral coach knows full well he has much to learn about the Canadian game.

"Every day is an adjustment," he said. "We've had so many different situations come up in the last two weeks with challenges, taking a point, whether or not to take a safety. There has been a lot of things come up, but we're doing good. I think we've been on top of just about everything."

I asked starting Alouettes' QB Anthony Calvillo, who played until early in the second quarter, how much of an advantage it might be for him now having the opportunity to play under a coach with so much seasoning as a quarterbacks' tutor.

The 35-year-old responded: "I just like the fact he's brought some new ideas to this league. Whenever you get a fresh face with new ideas, I think it's definitely going to benefit us, because we're going to be running things that haven't been run up here. I think that's an advantage for us.

"He's a very intelligent man. He makes sure that we're prepared for every single game. He's going to have a lot of plays for us. It's going to challenge the quarterbacks on this team, and our whole offence, because our whole playbook is pretty wide open."

Trestman, 52, left the NFL in 2004 and moved with his family to Raleigh, his current home, to be the offensive co-ordinator and quarterback coach for the North Carolina State Wolfpack.

His family consists of wife Cindy and two daughters, Sarah Anne, 15, and Chloe, 13. As for his ethnicity, he is proud of who he is, but feels that it has never been an issue growing up, or made mention of by management, owners or playing personnel.

He finds the most satisfaction in working with young athletes from various backgrounds and all walks of life. He stresses more than anything that football is a very cerebral game and that the players have to have more than athleticism. What counts most is intelligence and the character of the individual. Without it, you'll never make it, he believes.

What also counts is making it to the Grey Cup, especially in 2008, since Montreal just happens to be hosting the national event.

The five people you meet in Maui

ALMOST FAMOUS
By Jacob Medjuck

You have to assume that Heaven is paradise, and you have to assume that paradise is Maui.

I was there last month for the Maui Film Festival, and it is paradise.

If the apples of Eden were forbidden fruit that brought knowledge, then the free-flowing pineapples of Maui will make you foolish. Without exercising appropriate judgment, I experienced what nearly became my first pineapple-induced diabetic coma.

Mitch Albom wrote a lovely book, The Five People You Meet in Heaven. His character meets five people who lead him to reflect on his life.

Well, I spent six days in heaven last month, and I'll tell you who showed up: John Lasseter.

This digital pioneer is the new Walt Disney (sans any interest in Nazis). John is the CEO and brains behind Pixar Animation Studios, the dreamers who brought us Toy Story, Monsters Inc. and The Incredibles. I spotted him wandering down the road and stopped him for what became my first of five reflective conversations. It turns out he wasn't even in Maui for the festival. He was just there with his family, vacationing.

"We love to snorkel," he offered, whispering. "You know, Finding Nemo."

A mogul, hero and family man – and also very funny. A wonderful start. I invited him to the screening of my film that night. Putting things delicately, I mentioned that Summerhood is a film for the whole family, but perhaps not to watch with your whole family – i.e., there's kissing aplenty.

He was thrilled that I'd done animation work for Disney and DreamWorks, and we had colleagues in common. But in declining politely, he presented "vacation" in a way I hadn't thought of before.

"It's a lot like your Sabbath," he explained. (I was being lectured on Shabbat by Walt Disney. Amazing. Simply amazing. In Hollywood, even the gentiles are Jews.)

"No phones, no computers, no interruptions," he said, lifting up his trademark Hawaiian shirt – a splashy style he maintains even at the office – to reveal no cellphone.

"Just nature and family this weekend."

He made a valid point. When it comes to cellphones and other wireless technology, just because we "can" all the time, doesn't mean we "should" all the time.

I propose that chivalry is not dead, it just needs redefining: the new "open a door for a lady" is "leave your phone at home" when going on a date.

Despite my insatiable need to be available and connected, being "disconnected" is blissful, too. That night, I unplugged from the grid – and I met real human beings. I left my Star Trek gear at the hotel, and it was liberating. And this we knew already thousands of years ago. Remarkable. Nice job, Ten Commandments. Honour every form of the Sabbath I shall.

My film went on to win the audience award for best feature comedy, and I'm certain the feature will filter up to Mr. Lasseter through the cult following I hope to develop within his ranks. But the lesson I learned from him was more rewarding than any compliment he could offer.

When the people you pattern yourself after reveal the behavioral blueprints of their success, it's a gift that informs the rest of your life. And that's something you generally learn only from hindsight, in eternal Paradise. If you'd prefer an earlier taste, head to Maui. There's more gold in the people than buried in the sand.

I think I also met Dennis Quaid, James Bond, some lady who survived an avalanche after being buried alive for 18 minutes, and a good masseuse.

But I can't be sure, on account of all that pineapple.

So, as your own vacations approach, make the most by taking the least with you. Unplug. And make that clear to your friends, relatives and workmates before you go, so no one is anxious or hurt.

You'll be more refreshed for everything and everyone that you'll come back to.

BBQ ONION & SMOKED GOUDA QUESADILLAS

- 6 tblsp olive oil, divided
- 2 tblsp water
- 1/3 c chopped fresh cilantro
- 2 c packed coarsely grated smoked Gouda
- 1 lb. onions, peeled, halved, thinly sliced
- 1/3 c bottled BBQ sauce
- 8 lg. flour tortillas

Preheat oven to 300°F. Heat 3 tblsp oil in large nonstick skillet over high heat. Add onions; sauté 5 min. Add BBQ sauce & 2 tblsp water. Stir until onions are coated, about 2 min.

Place 4 tortillas on work surface. On each, sprinkle 1/4 of cheese, then 1/4 of cilantro, 1/4 of onions. Top each with second tortilla and press to adhere.

Brush skillet with 1 tsp oil; heat over medium-high heat. Add 1 quesadilla; cook until cheese is melted, about 2 min. per side. Place on baking sheet in oven. Repeat with remaining quesadillas and keep warm until needed. Cut each quesadilla into quarters.

Essential to keep hydrated

FITNESS CORNER
By Felyce Zomparelli

We have waited all winter for the opportunity to be outdoors. During the summer months, we love to take our exercise outside. However, whether you are walking, biking, playing tennis or doing any other outdoor activity, it is more important to hydrate yourself during this time.

This year, the weather forecasters are predicting a hotter than usual summer, and I wanted to take this time to remind you of the importance of keeping your body hydrated, especially during and after exercise.

Your body can absorb about 500 millilitres of water an hour, and you require about two litres a day, but if you drink too quickly, most of that water is not absorbed. Therefore, you should not drink huge amounts all at once, but rather drink a little less more frequently.

In addition, you really need to be drinking before you are thirsty, which is easy to say but not easy to do.

And during the summer, you lose more water just sitting, because of the heat. Sweating, which is one of the ways your body loses water, is also one of the ways your body cools itself.

When you exercise, you lose about 500 millilitres to a litre of water, depending on how hard you work, or really, how hard your body has to work to keep you from overheating. Keeping yourself hydrated is important during exercise, not only for the obvious reasons, but also to help keep you limber. When you allow yourself to get dehydrated, even to the smallest degree, you run the risk of having muscle cramps during and after exercise.

Muscles, like all other parts of your body, need water, and when they get dehydrated you get stiff, and your body does not recover well from the exercise.

So remember, it's important to drink water before, during, and after you exercise or engage in any physical activity.

'Truce' shows Hamas' true colours

According to Reports
By
PAUL MICHAELS

Canadian media paid substantial attention to last week's news that Israel and Hamas had reached a truce. The reporting reflected a mix of optimistic and pessimistic, but ultimately skeptical, attitudes among Israelis and Palestinians that the truce would hold.

The National Post's Matthew Fisher captured this in his June 23 article, "Gaza truce is welcome respite," in observing that "Almost nobody on either side of the Israeli-Palestinian divide believes that the current truce in the Gaza Strip between Israel and Hamas is anything but a brief pause in a long war."

Yet, as Fisher noted, both sides are weary of a conflict that seems to have no resolution. So what does Israel gain? According to Fisher, the feeling "that life is safer and therefore better for [those] living in communities bordering Gaza who have been terrorized for years by rocket and mortar fire by Hamas and other armed factions in the small Palestinian territory."

However, soon after the truce was brokered, a small number of Qassams were launched from Gaza into Israeli southern communities, including Sderot. Accordingly, the terror had not been stemmed, only significantly lessened. And these violations of the truce threatened to unravel it.

In her June 21 Globe and Mail article, "Gazans hope truce lasts enough to resupply," Carolynne Wheeler wrote: "Few in impoverished Gaza think the truce will last for more than a few weeks; they are steeling themselves against the recklessness of renegade militant factions likely to break it with rocket fire."

She added that Israeli officials warned "there will be no second chances" if the ceasefire is broken this way.

Yet when Islamic Jihad launched Qassams into Israel on June 24, Israeli officials decided to only restrict the flow of goods into Gaza by keeping its border crossing closed.

The CBC's Peter Armstrong reported on The National that evening that members of Islamic Jihad told him earlier in the day that the group would not interfere with the ceasefire. However, shortly after Armstrong's discussion, rockets struck southern Israel, wounding two civilians. Islamic Jihad took credit.

While Armstrong reported that Hamas called "for all militant groups to exercise self control," the next day Hamas defiantly declared that it would not assert authority over Islamic Jihad or any other radical faction offering "resistance" to Israel's "occupation." This prompted some Israeli analysts to observe the irony that, while Hamas claims to be in control of Gaza and wants to be taken seriously as a governing authority capable of assuring economic well-being for its restive population, it refuses to act responsibly when the first violation of a ceasefire it agreed to occurs on its territory. In short, Hamas has signaled why it should not be trusted – despite assertions by some western journalists that the radical organization is amenable to reform.

In "France sends mixed messages to Israel" (Winnipeg Free Press, June 24), Samuel Segev discussed not only French President Nicolas Sarkozy's warmth toward Israel, as revealed in his recent visit and speech to the Knesset, but also the fact he is also warming up relations with Syria. Syrian President Bashar Assad is scheduled to arrive in Paris on July 13 to take part in Sarkozy's "Mediterranean Union." In response to Sarkozy's decision to invite Assad to attend a military parade on the Champ Elysses on July 14 for Bastille Day, Segev noted that former French president Jacques Chirac "decided to boycott the parade to protest against Assad's invitation." Segev continued: "Chirac believes that Syria is very much implicated in the assassination of his friend, former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafiq Hariri, and that Sarkozy should not have invited Assad to Paris before the assassination mystery is solved."

BRIDGE OF STRINGS AND LIGHT: Israelis watch a fireworks display during the inauguration ceremony last month of the Bridge of Strings at the western entrance to Jerusalem. Designed by Spanish architect Santiago Calatrava, the $70-million (US) landmark anchors one end of a light railway line that will carry travellers into downtown. The intra-urban line will connect with the bus station to form an integrated transit hub that will relieve traffic congestion in the city. Calatrava has designed more than 40 bridges around the world, including an almost-completed pedestrian bridge across Venice's Grand Canal.

Wax Hitler beheaded

JTA

BERLIN — A man was arrested for beheading a wax figure of Hitler in Berlin.

The 41-year-old man was one of the first visitors to the new Madame Tussauds in Berlin, which opened to the public for the first time last Saturday.

Police arrested him while he was still in the exhibit area, according to the German Press Agency. He was released after being charged with damaging property and inflicting bodily harm against an employee.

Reportedly, a scuffle ensued Saturday morning when two museum employees tried to grab the man as he lunged for the wax model. Shouting "no more war," he managed to tear off the head, eyewitnesses said. The damaged figure, which cost about $300,000, was removed from public view.

German-Jewish journalist Henryk Broder, known for his biting commentary, told the Deutsche Presse Agentur news agency he was glad that "an attack on Hitler had finally worked."

But unlike the real Hitler, this one could be restored – if the damage is not too great, museum spokesperson Natalie Ruoss told DPA. Repairs could take up to two months, according to a museum employee.

Iran has resumed bomb work: report

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEHRAN — Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said on Monday his country would not stop enriching uranium and rejected as "illegitimate" a demand by major powers that it do so, the Islamic Republic News Agency reported.

Ahmadinejad's comment came as a British newspaper, quoting intelligence reports received by western diplomats, reported Monday that Iran has resumed work aimed at producing a nuclear bomb.

Mahmoud Ahmadinejad

The remark was Ahmadinejad's first comment on the dispute since Iran delivered its response last Friday to a package of incentives offered by world powers seeking to curb its nuclear activities. "They offer to hold talks, but at the same time they threaten us and say we should accept their illegitimate demand to halt [enrichment work]," Ahmadinejad told reporters in Malaysia, where he was attending a summit of eight developing countries.

"They want us to abandon our right [to nuclear technology]," he said.

The United States, China, Russia, Britain, France and Germany demand that Iran suspend its enrichment work before formal talks can start on their revised package, which includes help to develop a civilian nuclear program. Iran, the world's fourth-biggest oil exporter, says its nuclear activities are peaceful. The United States and its western allies suspect they are a cover to build nuclear weapons.

Tehran has repeatedly refused to stop producing enriched uranium, which can be used as fuel for power plants or, if refined much more, can provide material for nuclear weapons.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Allocations Record

HAMILTON — Hamilton's Jewish federation will allocate a record amount in the coming year. UJA Federation of Hamilton said it will distribute $1.15 million after its best-ever fundraising campaign. Exact amounts will be announced at the end of the summer, but recommended grants include a 15 per cent boost to Jewish day schools. The federation said that allocation requests from affiliated agencies totalled $1.3 million, and that even at that level, many would run operating deficits.

Director Takes Leave

WINNIPEG — The midwest regional director of B'nai Brith Canada has taken a leave of absence after he was charged with assaulting a bailiff who was trying to seize a van at his home. Alan Yusim asked for "a temporary leave of absence to deal with this matter" and it was granted, a B'nai Brith spokesperson told the Winnipeg Free Press. Police said a man, 54, was charged with assault and dangerous operation of a vehicle after a bailiff, 56, was dragged several feet by a van when her arm got caught in its window. Yusim claims he was assaulted and was the victim in the incident, the Winnipeg Sun reported.

Jews Named To Order

OTTAWA — Six Jews were named in the Order of Canada announcements last week. Winnipeg's Gail Asper was promoted to an officer of the order for arts advocacy, fundraising and business endeavours. New members of the order include Judith Chernin Budovitch of Fredericton for volunteerism; former Nova Scotia lieutenant-governor Myra Freeman; Norman Levine of Toronto for his work in pediatric dentistry; University of Toronto historian Michael Marrus; and abortion rights advocate Henry Morgentaler.

Sderot Kids At Camp

MONTREAL — Ten boys age 12 and 13 arrived in Montreal last Thursday to attend a one-month Chabad Lubavitch-run day camp that's being held at United Talmud Torahs' St. Laurent branch. They were among some 70 children, aged 11 to 14, from the besieged southern Israeli town who arrived the previous day at John F. Kennedy Airport in New York on their way to 10 Chabad day camps in the eastern United States and Montreal. Another 50 children were scheduled to fly into Los Angeles to attend Chabad camps on the U.S. West Coast.

WORLD

Police Patrols Added

PARIS — France's interior minister announced more police patrols for an ethnically diverse area of Paris after the gang beating of a Jewish teen there. A week after the violent beating of Rudy Haddad, 17, in the northeast district, Michele Alliot-Marie visited on June 28 to make the announcement. The French justice minister also announced a plan to fight gang activity.

Hate Charge Dropped

GRAND FORKS, N.D. — A judge dismissed charges against a University of North Dakota student accused of drawing anti-Semitic graffiti after the state attorney said there wasn't enough evidence to try him. Spencer Garness allegedly used ice cream to write an anti-Semitic slur on a dorm elevator, one of a series of anti-Semitic acts that freshman Scott Lebovitz said led him to leave his dormitory in April. In February, a swastika was found on a wall near his room. He said he was the target of anti-Semitic taunts for months. Garness and other students said Lebovitz misjudged the actions, which they said was teasing among friends.

Hitler Statue Unveiled

BERLIN — An exhibit of Adolf Hitler in a bunker was unveiled at a Berlin wax museum amid criticism. Berlin's new Madame Tussaud's waxworks on the famed Unter den Linten Avenue in the former East Berlin, which opened to the public officially on July 9, unveiled the Hitler figure July 3 despite protests from politicians and historians. As promised, the model of Hitler is depicted not as an intimidating figure, but in his last days, holed up in his bunker as Allied forces approached. The museum also depicts people who resisted the Third Reich.

New Rabbis Ordained

WARSAW — A Warsaw yeshiva ordained the first rabbis in Poland since World War II. Nine rabbinical students received smichah June 29 from the Chabad Lubavitch Yeshiva of Warsaw. It opened in 2005 as the first post-Holocaust yeshiva in Poland.

U.S. Jewish Groups Praise Presbyterians

WARSAW — U.S. Jewish groups are praising the Presbyterian Church for deciding not to "over-identify" with either side in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Spearheaded by the umbrella organization the Jewish Council for Public Affairs, the Jewish groups issued a statement June 27 in support of some of the stands taken last month by delegates to the 218th General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.).

In addition to a motion barring the church from adopting positions that identify too much with one side, the delegates also approved a motion endorsing the Amman Call, a document adopted at a 2007 church gathering in Jordan that calls for the right of return of all refugees. It also struck down language that would have permitted the church to move ahead with divestment from Israel without further approval from the General Assembly.

The Jewish groups, including the American Jewish Committee, the Anti-Defamation League, and the Reform, Conservative and Reconstructionist movements, expressed concern about the church's support for the right of return.

Durham synagogue celebrates coming of age

B'Nai Shalom V'Tikvah marks bar mitzvah

By SHAYLA GUNTER-GOLDSTEIN
Special to The CJN

It was not your ordinary bar mitzvah celebration.

Perhaps it was the entertainment – traditional Hindu dancers from the Devi Mandir Temple and a choral ensemble from Dunbarton Fairport United Church in Pickering. Maybe it was the hundreds of guests from many different faith groups and the multicultural buffet dinner afterward. Or it could have been the honoured guests who did the candle-lighting – members of the community and congregants from St. Paul's United Church in Ajax, where the simchah was held.

This was the coming-of-age celebration for B'nai Shalom V'Tikvah – the little synagogue that could – in Durham region.

The shul's recent bar/bat mitzvah celebrated the fact that the congregation has brought Judaism to the forefront in Durham Region, and served to thank those involved in helping them get to this milestone.

It was about outreach, too. "We've moved from infancy through adolescence," says B'Nai Shalom V'Tikvah president Ron King. "Our identity as a Jewish group is like a young person entering adulthood. We are finally more established and more aware of our strengths. Now we need to spread our wings and have a stronger voice in Ajax/Pickering."

The shul's Rabbi Jerry Steinberg led the Sunday afternoon service, sharing the pulpit with Rabbi Danny Gottleib of Thornhill's Temple Kol Ami, and Rabbi Sharon Sobel, executive director of the Canadian Council of Reform Judaism (CCRJ), both of whom were instrumental in helping the congregation find its way for 13 years.

Cinema as portal to peoplehood

From the editor's desk

The gravity of Jerusalem's profound pull upon the hearts of most visitors is its massive historical, religious, esthetic and spiritual weight.

Often overlooked, however, by the emotional brio that the city evokes is that it is a perpetually driving turbine for much of the country's cultural expression too.

And at the heart of that cultural expression is a quite remarkable institution: the Jerusalem Cinematheque.

Situated near Sultan's Pool in the Hinnom Valley, a mere stone's throw to the south and east from Moses Montefiore's Windmill in Yemin Moshe, is the Cinematheque. It is by far the city's most famous and most beautiful film screening centre. The Canadian Jewish News visited the Cinematheque last month as the guest of the Jerusalem Foundation. It is one of the many transformative, city-building projects co-founded by the legendary Lia van Leer and funded by the foundation.

But "city-building" in this case defines itself to a wide horizon. The Jerusalem Cinematheque is a modern-day portal to peoplehood. For it has many aspects to its mission in addition to being a breathtaking centrepoint for the viewing of movies. It houses the film archives of Israel; it is an educational and research centre; it is a meeting point for individuals from diverse Israeli ethnicities; it is a library; and not to be overlooked, it is a restaurant whose view is toward the inspiring walls of the Old City.

It is a very busy place, even in the morning hours of a midweek day when we visited. Technicians and various other professionals were preparing for the 25th annual summertime Jerusalem Film Festival. This year's festival begins today, July 10, and runs until July 19. The opening, in the scenic theatre erected in the Sultan's Pool, will be attended by nearly 7,000 guests. The festival should attract several thousands.

The younger, "winter" festival, the annual Jewish Film Festival usually held around Chanukah, will be marking its 10th year this coming December.

But preparations for the midsummer film festival comprised only one part of the many hive-like activities that morning in the impressive, sleek building built into the side of the valley.

Ilan De Vries, the thoughtful, soft-spoken general director of the Cinematheque, of the Jerusalem Film Festival and of the Israel Film Archive, which is housed in the Cinematheque, explained the import of some of the activities.

"At the beginning of the 1980s, Cinematheque became the home of the national film archives of Israel," he said. "Today, some 35,000 films are located here – 65 per cent of the material is Israeli and Jewish-themed, 35 per cent are classics."

The entrance to the Jerusalem Cinametheque

The archives are a repository of rare historic films, among which is the first film ever shot in Jerusalem and the precious Nathan Axelrod film archives, which document the very early days of the creation of the Jewish state.

But the nature and the scope of the archives is quickly growing. Film archivists from other parts of the world, especially of late, from Europe, are calling upon the Cinematheque regarding the increasing numbers of films being found that chronicle Jewish life in eastern Europe at the turn of the 20th century. Among the rare films found in Russia is footage from the Mendel Beilis trial, the infamous blood libel that was immortalized in the novel The Fixer by Bernard Malamud.

A large number of films about World War II and films made during the war is now surfacing in various archival caches throughout Europe. German film archivists recently gave a copy of a Nazi propaganda film that documented Jewish life in the Warsaw Ghetto prior to the uprising to the Cinematheque's archive.

The many films being discovered in the dark, forgotten storerooms of Europe need to be retrieved and, if necessary, restored. The Cinematheque is the only place in Israel that can reliably restore and protect the material.

These precious archives then become an instrument for the Cinematheque's educational mission. In conjunction with the Ministry of Education, the Cinematheque schedules educational programs more than 300 days a year. One of the more compelling recent programs is an initiative called I AM YOU ARE, which brings Arab and Jewish youth together to make films about their respective identities.

"The Cinematheque attaches great importance to these joint productions," De Vries told us. "The place is about culture, not about politics. Unfortunately, however, the Palestinian participants have to be somewhat circumspect about their participation. Not all of their peers are accepting of it."

The electricity that flows through the Cinematheque is not only that which powers the film projectors and popcorn machines. It is the excitement and sense of purpose that sizzles in the corridors of the place. The people who work there are guides to the countless numbers of individuals who seek to explore – through the now timeless and possibly eternal medium of film – who they are and who they might yet become.

Visitors should be aware of Cinematheque. It is now part of the profound gravity of Jerusalem. —MBD

Israel seeking Canadian business investment

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Ten miles wide at its narrowest, barely a speck on the map when compared to its much vaster neighbours, endowed with few natural resources, home to only 7.3 million people, Israel manages to punch far above its weight when it comes to matters of the economy and trade.

In fact, says lawyer and investment expert Uriel Lynn, Israelis' "buying power has increased tremendously in the last 10 years, especially the last five years."

Israelis are hungry for the type of services provided by North American companies, particularly in the financial services sector, and they've got the money to pay for it.

Lynn, who serves as president of the Federation of Israeli Chambers of Commerce, was in Toronto recently to make his pitch for more Canadian business interest in Israel.

A former Knesset member and governor of state revenue, Lynn said "in terms of population, we are about equal to Austria and we are growing. We are larger than Denmark and Norway."

Israel's buying power has moved up as its economy has blossomed in the last few years, corresponding to economic reforms advanced by former Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. "Many of the restrictions that were artificially burdening the economy were lifted and the real economic and business energy of the people was more free to move on," Lynn said.

"Israel is a very interesting market. It's a big market. It has substantial buying power. It is a country with a lot of innovation, entrepreneurial spirit and it's really a country on the move."

Lynn had a personal role in the reforms as well. As governor of state revenue, he was responsible for a number of changes to Israel's tax system, including the cancelling of inheritance tax, property tax and capital gains tax on the sale of residential apartments.

The success of the reforms are apparent in the statistics: Israel's economy has grown an average of five per cent per year for the last five years and the country's GDP has swollen to more than $28,000 (US), "a little below the average European Union country," he said.

That has left Israelis with formidable purchasing power and "we would like for North America to take a greater share of Israeli buying."

In particular he would like to increase imports from North America and import a little less from Europe.

As he sees it, "North American products cost less and will encourage more business co-operation between North American and Israeli companies.

"We'd like to see capital markets increase," especially the presence in Israel of banks, investment bank and, large auditing firms. The Israeli economy today is dominated by five big banks and "we'd like to see more competition," Lynn said.

The country's consumer market would benefit from the presence of foreign banks, he added.

Lynn dismissed concerns that foreign businesses might be deterred by the country's security concerns. "Security is a consideration but it's not a deterrent. We are proving that our economy is growing very nicely without having peace with our neighbours. We are not dependent on our neighbours' economies because we are integrated into the world economy."

While in Canada, Lynn addressed a group of lawyers involved in trade and another group brought together by the Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce. He believes Canada's financial sector, and businesses in the transportation and infrastructure sectors, as well as high tech industries could find good opportunities in Israel.

"I'm just trying to lay down a framework for the opportunities that exist," he said of his Toronto visit.

Some Israeli economic factoids, courtesy of Lynn:

• In 2001 and 2002, GDP declined by .6 per cent and .9 per cent respectively. In 2006 and 2007, gross domestic product grew by 5.2 and 5.3 per cent respectively;

• Unemployment in 2002 stood at 10.5 per cent; in the first quarter of 2008, it was 6.3 per cent;

• Israel's population jumped from 3.9 million in 1980 to 7.2 million in 2007; GDP grew from $50 billion to $165 billion; GDP per capita in the period soared from $8,050 to $28,800;

• In 2003, taxes, including payroll deductions and other mandatory charges, stood at 723 shekels for a worker with two children and a salary of 5,000 shekels. The 2008 estimate will be 321 shekels on a 5,000 shekel salary. As a percentage, the tax take will drop from 14.5 per cent of income to 6.4 per cent;

• Israel is ranked first of 55 countries in expenditure on research and development, second in funding for tech development and venture capital investment, third in entrepreneurship and fourth in skilled labour;

• Direct foreign investment in Israel was $10.2 billion in 2007, up from $5.1 billion in 2000;

• In 2007 Israel recorded a trade deficit, with $75 billion in imports versus $74 billion in exports. In 1980 it operated a larger deficit, with $11.2 billion in imports versus $8.6 billion in exports;

• Israel enjoys a trade surplus with Canada. In 2007, exports were $715 million and imports $434 million. Israel's main exports were jewellery, machines and chemicals while its main imports were machines and mineral products;

• From 1999-2005, Israeli companies invested $7 billion Cdn in Canada. In 2005 alone, $1 billion Cdn was put into real estate, including residential, commercial and industrial properties.

Where futility meets hypocrisy

The G-8 members of industrialized nations who met in Rusutsu, Japan, this week were expected to severely condemn Robert Mugabe and his newly installed government in Zimbabwe. Indeed, they were expected to somehow forcefully demonstrate their displeasure at the 84-year-old's recent brutal usurpation of power.

As of this writing, however, the G-8 summiteers had not yet convened.

But the 53-state membership of the African Union (AU) did meet last week in Sharm al-Sheikh, Egypt. They dealt with Mugabe less earnestly than a parent might deal with a five-year-old child for confabulating a fib. They refused to formally rebuke or chastise him. They refused any reference to Mugabe in their official closing statement. Only Kenya dared to criticize the president of Zimbabwe.

On June 29, Zimbabwe's electoral commission confirmed an overwhelming victory for Mugabe in the runoff election that was held two days earlier. Mugabe won 85.5 per cent of the votes, according to the government commission, thus extending his 28 years of absolute power in that beleaguered, impoverished country. Of course, he was the only candidate in the race. Opposition leader Morgan Tsvangirai, who won more votes than Mugabe in the original balloting three months earlier in March, had withdrawn from the race because of the blatant, brutal and murderous intimidation against his supporters.

African leaders are unwilling to confront Mugabe or the ugly truth of his megalomania. For in confronting Mugabe, they must also confront their own questionable records and the truths about their own respective embraces of democracy and democratic institutions.

The docility of their response to Mugabe is noted with profound sadness, for it legitimizes an illegitimate result. It also lends authority to the notion that the gun and the truncheon complement the ballot box. It also evokes the further observation that the AU response is saturated in the reek of hypocrisy. For swift, indeed, is the condemnation by members of the AU when it is directed at the government of Israel.

Heading into the G-8 summit Canada's prime minister, Stephen Harper, and U.S. President George W. Bush had called for sanctions to be imposed on Mugabe's government. They are to be commended for their principled positions, even though, as these words were being written, sanctions against Zimbabwe seemed to have fallen off the agenda.

The net effect of the world's inaction in relation to the recent "election" of Robert Mugabe is to brazenly demonstrate the futility of the hope that justice can coincide with an international system of collective security.

It is a sorry meeting point where futility joins hypocrisy.

Rabbi Reuven Bulka, spiritual leader of Congregation Machzikei Hadas in Ottawa (and today co-president of Canadian Jewish Congress), told the fifth world conference on smoking and health that smoking is "a destructive suicidal act, and thus forbidden by Jewish law." It is contrary, he said, to repeated halachic injunctions to guard one's health.

End-of-life decisions

As an intensive care physician, it is with great sadness that I have observed the legal circus surrounding the case of the late Sam Golubchuk unfold in the media ("Winnipeg man in life support controversy dies," CJN, July 3).

End-of-life decision-making in the intensive care unit occurs each and every day. The issue of when the suffering and burden of a particular treatment becomes too great for a patient to bear is a difficult one for doctors and patient's families alike. To effectively address these issues requires a collaborative approach that includes the recognition of a patient's values, wishes and beliefs by the medical team, as well as trust in the skill and expertise of the medical team by the patient and their family. It is only in cases when a lack of respect and trust develops that conflicts such as those resulting in the Golubchuk case arise. Unfortunately, conflict in such cases only leads to the further polarization and entrenchment of views.

As an intensive care physician, I have had the privilege of caring for many religious Orthodox Jews and their families, as well as patients of other religions who share similar beliefs pertaining to medical care. When faced with end-of-life decisions in such cases, suggesting that the family seek guidance from their rabbi or even inviting the patient's rabbi to sit in on family meetings – with the family's permission – has encouraged dialogue as well as encouraging people to keep an open mind. I will tell families that a rabbi, just like a physician, cannot provide an expert opinion without first being made aware of all the facts and circumstances.

As a physician and as a Jew, I believe that all life is precious and of infinite value. I also believe that alleviating suffering and providing comfort to a dying patient is a core purpose to any of the healing arts. As the great rabbi and physician Maimonides describes in his oath for doctors, "May I never see in the patient anything but a fellow creature in pain."

These are not opposing beliefs – rather they are one in the same.

Golubchuk's final battle

With regard to the story "Winnipeg man in life support controversy dies" (CJN, July 3) about the death of a disabled man, Samuel Golubchuk, please note that I was misquoted more than once.

What I had said in my eulogy was, "Many worship the god of utilitarian philosophy, which espouses 'futile care' theory as a rationale to end the lives of disabled individuals, and other false gods. Chaim Shmuel, Samuel Golubchuk, worshipped only one God."

In addition, I noted that, "In Europe, on the battlefield, he faced evil and did not flinch. And in his final battle, he also did not flinch."

The suggestion that his final battle was with the hospital was not made by me. Indeed, his final battle was with the Angel of Death, a final battle nearly all of us will eventually have to face (a few of us will die suddenly, or in our sleep). In that battle, we hopefully will have physicians who obey their Hippocratic oath and seek to cure, or to care, but never to kill.

CJC lobbied for ITF membership

Prime Minister Stephen Harper and Secretary of State Jason Kenney do indeed deserve warm commendation for the government's principled decision to apply for membership on the Task Force (ITF) for International Co-operation on Holocaust Education, Remembrance and Research ("Canada to become member of Holocaust Task Force," CJN, July 3). This move did not occur in a vacuum, however, and The CJN was remiss in not acknowledging the longstanding efforts of the Jewish community advocacy organizations, which finally came to fruition under the current government.

Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) has been in the forefront of lobbying for Canada to join the ITF since the task force's inception. We have worked closely with Kenney and officials at Canadian Heritage and contributed to the baseline study on domestic Holocaust initiatives that Canada submitted as part of the application process. CJC representatives have participated in the NGO component of Canadian delegations to recent ITF gatherings, and I have been given the honour of representing CJC on the task force's education working group. In particular, CJC has worked for more than a decade on securing a government commitment to memorialize the S.S. St. Louis with a historical monument in Halifax Harbour.

We look forward to this ongoing partnership with the Canadian government to help Canada gain full membership on the ITF and to the establishment of the St. Louis historical marker.

Muslim denial of Jewish links to Temple Mount is the biggest barrier to peace

By YITZHAK REITER

If there is one thing that critically hampers Israeli-Palestinian peace talks, it's not the claim of a right of return for refugees – a non-starter from the Israeli point of view – nor is it the issue of final borders, since an exchange of territory could be negotiated. Neither is it the question of Jerusalem as an urban, undivided city, since the Palestinians would likely agree to a special arrangement in which they could have their capital headquartered in an Arab neighbourhood.

However, the issue that most negatively affects the peace process is the growing Muslim denial of the Jewish connection to the Western Wall and the Temple Mount, which Muslims view as their sanctuary. They call it Haram al-Sharif, or the Al Aqsa Mosque compound, and it's the third-holiest Muslim shrine after Mecca and Medina.

The following well-known example testifies to the widespread denial phenomenon, and what the public sees and hears is only the tip of the iceberg.

At the July 2000 Camp David summit, when then-U.S. president Bill Clinton proposed that the Temple Haram site be divided, then-Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat replied that the Jewish Temple had been in Nablus (known in the Bible as Shechem), not in Jerusalem.

Yitzhak Reiter

Not only did the Israeli mission to Camp David respond harshly to Arafat's words, Clinton himself was sharply critical of Arafat's denial. When Arafat's comments became known to the Israeli public, it hardened Israeli attitudes toward a possible compromise on the holy sites. According to a poll published shortly afterward, only nine per cent of Israeli Jews would agree to relinquish control of the Temple Haram compound to the Palestinians.

Since 1967, a growing number of Muslim scholars and historians have been attempting to dismiss the Jewish belief in the Jewish Temple, to deny its existence as a Jewish house of worship or even its location in the place identified by the Jews as the Temple Mount site. Moreover, there is a growing tendency among Palestinian Muslims and among many Muslim writers and political actors outside the Holy Land to totally deny any Jewish connection to Jerusalem in general and to the Temple/Haram site specifically.

Not only Palestinians, but many Muslim writers and public figures refer to what they call Haykal Sulayman (Solomon's Temple) as al-maz'um (meaning alleged or false). For example, well-known Egyptian writer Abd al-Tawab Mustafa dedicated a book to refuting the idea of a Jewish Temple. He stated in the preface to his book: "The Jews' belief in the temple is no more than a false allegation that does not hold up in the face of scientific criticism, since the Jews' supposed scholarship on the topic is not true scientific research, but rather [a collection of] speculations and hypotheses."

Another Egyptian scholar, archeologist Abd al-Rahim Barakat, wrote in an article that "the legend of the alleged temple is the greatest crime of fabricating history." According to him, David and Solomon had small houses of worship and no connection to a temple, while the Israelites did not in any case adhere to the religion of Solomon, who preached faith in Allah, the one God.

The broad reception that the literature denying the Jewish connection to the Temple Mount enjoys in the Muslim world and its incorporation into Muslim public awareness are evident also in the use that publicists and politicians make of it. Egypt's minister of property, Mahmud Zaqzuq, was quoted in November 1996 as stating that the Jews have no connection to the Western Wall, which, according to him, "was never a holy site for them." He added that no historical evidence exists to support the Jewish claims regarding the existence of Solomon's "alleged" temple anywhere in the city.

Perhaps the plainest words regarding the Jewish attachment to the Western Wall are those of the Israeli head of the Islamic Movement's northern branch, Sheikh Ra'id Salah, from September 2000: "Let us tell the Jewish public frankly: you have no right even to one stone of the blessed Al Aqsa Mosque. You have no right even to one particle of dust of the blessed Al Aqsa Mosque. So let us say frankly: the western wall of Al Aqsa the Blessed is part of Al Aqsa the Blessed... the insistence that Al Aqsa the Blessed be left under Israeli sovereignty is also a declaration of war on the Islamic world." Thus, the denial of any authentic Jewish connection to Jerusalem and its holy sites has been disseminated to, and internalized by, Islamic and Arab communities.

This denial contradicts earlier Islamic writings that underlined the connection of the Muslim Dome of the Rock and the entire compound to Solomon's (Jewish) Temple by individuals such as 11th-century Jerusalem geographer and historian al-Muqddasi and the 14th-century Iranian religious legal sage al-Mustawfi. The writer Abu Bakr al-Wasiti preached at the Al-Aqsa Mosque in the early 11th century and also included various traditions related to the Temple's Jewish past in his work in praise of Jerusalem.

Even in 1929, at the height of the political struggle over the Western Wall, the Supreme Muslim Council's guide to Haram al-Sharif maintained: "Its identity with the site of Solomon's temple is beyond dispute. This, too, is the spot, according to the universal belief, on which David built there an altar unto the Lord, and offered burnt offerings and peace offerings (2 Samuel XXIV, 25)." The same appeared in pre-1967 writings of the Palestinian public figure and historian Arif al-Arif, who said that the quarry to the west of the Damascus Gate is called Solomon's Mine because it was from there that David and Solomon brought stones to be used in building the Temple.

Today, the situation is the opposite.

An official book published by the Palestinian Authority in Ramallah in 2002 on the history of the Al Aqsa site makes no mention of the site's sacred status in Judaism. The problem is that even after the Palestinians realized that the denial of the Jews' connection to the holy sites of Jerusalem outraged Israelis, they continued with their denial. It has now taken on a new ethos.

One example from the post-July 2000 period is the statement by the Palestinian mufti Ikrima Sabri in an interview with the Al-Jazeera TV news network that the Western Wall is not a Jewish structure and that the Jews have no connection to it. He added: "Who decided that the Western Wall is a remnant of the temple?" According to Sabri, the Jews began to pray at the Western Wall only during the 19th century, when they began to develop nationalist aspirations.

I believe that there are Muslim academic experts who don't accept this denial, but their opinions are rarely published or publicized. There are also some Israeli scholars and public figures who belittle the role of Jerusalem in Islam. They claim that the city was never politically important or a capital city to Muslim Arabs, and that its sacredness developed relatively late. Israeli writers also tend to ignore the numerous Islamic monuments and artifacts established in Jerusalem by the various Muslim rulers throughout their rule in Palestine. However, they do not deny the holiness of the Al-Aqsa compound and the Islamic affiliation to Old Jerusalem. And unlike the denial in the Arab world, the belittling phenomenon in Israel is not mainstream opinion.

In conclusion, the process of diminishing and denying the Jewish links to the holy places is a problematic phenomenon that hampers the possibility of achieving peace between Israel and the Palestinians. In contrast to the Oslo process – which delayed resolving the most difficult issues, including Jerusalem, to the final stages of peace talks – I suggest that negotiations should start with the issue of Jerusalem.

According to Palestinian mufti Ikrima Sabri, the Jews began to pray at the Western Wall only during the 19th century.

Israelis and Palestinians must explore whether the other party is willing to recognize their respective religious and historical connections to Jerusalem and its sacredness in their belief system, regardless of the final settlement formula. This matter is especially important to the Jewish side, which in June 1967 relinquished effective control inside the Temple/Haram compound to the Muslim (and Jordanian controlled) Waqf administration. The Jewish side demands that at least its historical attachment to the site not be denied by Palestinian Muslims. Hence, in order to succeed, any peace process should involve a preliminary phase in which the negotiating parties deliberately express empathy for, and recognition of, the identity interests of the other, as well as its religious and historical role in Jerusalem.

Is there a solution to the Jerusalem problem that all parties can agree upon? I hope to address this question in a later article.

Opinions

We're our own worst enemies

The Alliance of Concerned Jewish Canadians (ACJC) presents itself as a coalition that offers an alternative to what it describes as the Jewish establishment's "attitude of blind, unquestioning, loyalty to the policies and actions of Israeli governments."

So, in its presumed benevolence towards a broader community that it believes should know better, and in its efforts to, therefore, educate us on a new paradigm that will bring peace in our time (to the Middle East), the ACJC has begun to blaze a trail toward the nirvana that it brazenly thinks we should all be embracing. Examples of its "achievements" include:

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

- Its condemnation of the creation by our government of a parliamentary "Israel Allies Caucus."
- Its backing of the 2009 "Durban II" United Nations anti-racism conference, which Canada has decided not to attend.
- Its statement of protest to DePaul University for having terminated the contract of Norman Finkelstein, the controversial author of The Holocaust Industry.
- Its endorsement of "Israeli Apartheid Week" at Canadian universities.
- Its call for the removal of the Jewish National Fund's charitable status on the grounds that "the JNF has been a major beneficiary of the ethnic cleansing of Palestinians perpetrated by the Israeli state."
- Its support for a May 2006 resolution by the Ontario branch of the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) advocating a boycott of Israel.
- Its participation in "Al Nakba" rallies, where its members have marched with an array of groups and organizations that were calling for Israel's demise.
- Its approval of positions that demonize Israel and accuse the Israeli government of "atrocities, war crimes and violations of international law against the Palestinian people."

Given what's known about the ACJC, it comes as no surprise that its following remains small and that it hasn't made any inroads into constructive debate on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. "A rump on the edge of Jewish society" is how Canadian Jewish Congress CEO Bernie Farber has described the coalition.

It is, therefore, puzzling that any Jewish institution, particularly one that is assumed to be Zionist, would provide a platform for the likes of the ACJC. And yet that is exactly what almost happened recently in Hamilton, where local ACJC representatives were to be the featured, and only, speakers at a program hosted by one of the city's synagogues that was advertised as "a conversation about Israel and Palestine."

Although the event was subsequently cancelled because of protests from across the local Jewish community, there remains a lingering aftertaste. Why, some are asking, is there a need to validate groups such as the ACJC by providing them with a forum, while knowing full well that they hold opinions that are seen to be so obviously antithetical to the best interests of our community and to the State of Israel?

Schalit case shows value of High Court petitions

I have previously addressed debates raging in Israel regarding limiting our Supreme Court's scope of authority to adjudicate on security-related matters, and about the price to be paid for the release of Gilad Schalit, a soldier captured by Hamas two years ago on the border with Gaza. Recent developments have linked both issues, encouraging renewed discussion.

Yair Loorsteen in Jerusalem

On June 19, a ceasefire began between Israel and the Hamas government in Gaza. As of this writing, the truce could only be described as shaky.

According to the deal, after a period of no rocket attacks, crossing points between Israel and Gaza were to be re-opened to allow a flow of basic supplies into the strip. Additionally, talks on Schalit's release were to be re-started and the re-opening of the Rafah passage between Egypt and Gaza would be contingent on their progress.

Schalit's family was understandably unhappy with the deal. While not abandoning their media campaign, they decided to take their case to the Supreme Court, sitting as the High Court of Justice.

Israel's High Court of Justice is a unique institution. The highest court of the land sits as a court of first instance, primarily in matters regarding the legality of state authorities' decisions. It hears hundreds of petitions yearly, submitted by individuals and groups who continue to see the High Court as a true bastion of justice.

The Schalits asked the court to order the government not to further implement the agreement until their son is released. Their legal arguments were three-pronged. First, they argued that binding executive assurances had been given to them by Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, Defence Minister Ehud Barak and Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni that no deal regarding Gaza would be struck if it didn't include Schalit's release. Second, they argued the deal was neither reasonable nor proportional, since it removed the economic leverage that might sway Hamas to release Schalit. Lastly, they said the cabinet's decision-making process had been flawed, because its members thought Schalit's release was part of the deal.

A hearing was set for the morning after the petition was submitted. The court heard attorneys for both sides and was briefed behind closed doors about the current status of negotiations for Schalit's release.

The following day, the court issued a very sensitively written judgment rejecting the petition, mainly on the grounds that the issue at hand, being of a political and diplomatic nature, was not a matter in which the court intervenes. In this vein, it noted that given the rationale for the ceasefire, it was not competent to decide whether the agreement was reasonable or proportional because it didn't require Schalit's release.

The court also found that promises made to the family were a matter of "executive fairness." Referring to precedents, it said that if the government favoured other legitimate public interests for reaching a deal with Hamas over abiding by the personal assurances given to the Schalits, its decision could not be overturned by the court.

Finally, the court reviewed the cabinet's decision-making process. Because of its sensitive nature, its findings on the matter were not made public, with this chapter of its ruling marked "classified." However, based on its findings, the court suggested the cabinet should re-convene to discuss the Schalit matter to ensure that all its aspects were clear and unambiguous.

While this case did not address the price to be paid for Schalit's eventual release, (although it's safe to say that when a deal is finally struck, it, too, will be challenged in the High Court), it's an excellent example of why the court should continue to play a role in such matters.

When overseeing the executive and legislative branches, the court has a pivotal role within the triumviral powers of the state. It understands this role and, as expressed in the Schalit case, acts with restraint, ensuring due process and proportionality in decision-making processes, as well as the protection of human rights.

There has been strong criticism of some of the court's more activist judgments, which struck down particular government actions. While one might not agree with all such decisions, they, too, have had an important role in moulding a special blend of Israeli constitutionalism that we can be proud of.

Most of us hope and pray for Schalit's swift release, notwithstanding the price to be paid. I'm certain our justices feel the same way. His family's case reiterates why no one should curtail their authority.

Obama vs. McCain: an Israeli view

Presidential election campaigns in the United States are always watched closely in Israel, and this is particularly the case after eight years with George W. Bush in the White House.

His record in the Middle East is mixed. His accomplishments include the post 9/11 war against Islamic terror, which led to the belated rejection of Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat, as well as the removal of Saddam Hussein and the threat of chemical and biological weapons aimed at Tel Aviv. But post-Saddam policy in Iraq was a disaster, and it allowed the Iranian regime to become a dominant force, including acquisition of nuclear weapons technology. And the Bush/Rice ideology naively promoted instant democracy in the Arab world, which legitimized Hamas and weakened the military elite that provides stability in Egypt.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

Globally, Bush's stumbling also undermined Washington's credibility and influence, from Venezuela to Pakistan. Power projection resulting from economic success has disintegrated, the dollar and Wall Street have plummeted, and American-led alliances have failed to defeat Al Qaeda or the Taliban. The perception of the United States as a weak and fading world power has also reduced Israel's military credibility and emboldened our enemies.

As a result, as viewed from Jerusalem and Tel Aviv, the U.S. election campaign is different this year. As in the past, Israelis compare the candidates on the basis of experience (advantage Republican John McCain), campaign speeches such as before AIPAC (viewed with some skepticism), as well as personal background (Democrat Barack Obama's friendship with Columbia University's Prof. Rashid Khalidi is one reason for concern). But these are not the most important aspects of the 2008 presidential election.

The key question in assessing the two remaining candidates is which one will restore the United States to the status of a superpower – not only in terms of image, but also in terms of actions and capabilities.

For this, the next president must unify the divided American public and inspire Americans to take the steps necessary to repair their economy, including reducing the huge gap between rich and poor, and improving education. A president who projects confidence, intelligence, and empathy can lead a long-overdue transformation, and here, Obama has the advantage.

History has shown that these steps will also have a major impact in improving America's ability to act effectively around the world. In 1961, John F. Kennedy's stirring speeches projected the image of a confident superpower, sure of its moral mandate and ready to "bear any burden" to defend the cause of freedom. In practice, the inexperience of Kennedy and his advisors led to serious policy blunders, including the 1962 nuclear confrontation with the Soviet Union, but America emerged as the undisputed leader and inspiration for citizens in many other countries.

The Vietnam War, the darkness of the Nixon years, and Jimmy Carter's "malaise" undermined this power, but in the 1980s, president Ronald Reagan's clear message and actions restored America's position as the world leader and sped the demise of the Soviet empire. As the close ally of the United States, Israel's deterrence capabilities also benefited.

On this score, Obama's energy and racial background can unite and inspire Americans, and his election will revive the glow of American democracy around the world. This must be weighed against Obama's thin track record, dubious ex-advisers including Zbigniew Bzrezinski and Samantha Powers, and the naiveté in calls for unconditional negotiations with Iranian leaders. Recently, Obama has sought to offset this image by speaking more about the need for security and military power.

In contrast, McCain's strengths and understanding of Middle Eastern and global realities result from his experience, including fighting in Vietnam and his period as a prisoner of war. His weaknesses result from a personality and vision that do not inspire, and he will be seen by many as a continuation of the Bush era.

These dimensions, taken together, make for a difficult choice for Americans, while Israelis watch with more than usual interest. If the result produces a stronger America, this should also benefit other democracies around the world, including Israel.

The Kirshner File

A cornucopia of books...

Publishers always aim to please. That is their raison d'etre, after all. The books under review, ranging from a comprehensive account on Jerusalem to a lavishly illustrated compendium on the Canadian-born modernist American architect Frank Gehry, will probably satisfy a fairly wide range of fickle tastes. So sit back, enjoy the fleeting summer weather and read to your heart's content.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Jerusalem is a storied metropolis of diverse faiths and clashing historical narratives. Simon Goldhill, a professor of Greek at Cambridge University, examines it in Jerusalem: City of Longing (Harvard University Press). Ambitious to a fault, Goldhill investigates its most important religious and secular sites, from the biblical era to the present day, through the prism of history, architecture and archeology.

Casting his eyes on, among other places, the Western Wall and the Temple Mount, he gives a reader the kind of tour that only an expert could provide.

More than a century ago, the American novelist Herman Melville wrote, "Jerusalem is besieged by an army of the dead." What he meant is that Jerusalem has been ruled by a multitude of conquerors. Bernard Wasserstein, a British scholar, skilfully delves into that topic in the third edition of Divided Jerusalem: The Struggle for the Holy City (Yale University Press). Bringing a balanced approach to the task, he analyzes Jerusalem's importance to Jews, Christians and Muslims and observes it under British, Jordanian and Israeli administration.

Batya Gur's last detective novel before her untimely death in 2005, Murder in Jerusalem (HarperCollins), unfolds in sizzling fashion after the corpse of a woman is discovered in a warehouse at Israel Television. Gur has a knack for engaging a reader, and her feel for Jerusalem is unerring.

Bernard Avishai, a sharp and seasoned Canadian scholar, poses tough, unavoidable questions in The Hebrew Republic (Harcourt).

"Obviously, Israel cannot maintain an occupation [in the West Bank], denying a great many people political rights and remain democratic in any ordinary sense," he writes. And in a reference to the disaffected Israeli Arab minority, he observes, "But there is an even more disturbing problem... Can a state for world Jewry be a republic of its citizens, many of whom are non-Jews?" In short, Avishai believes that Israel must become a more complete democracy if it is to enjoy a peaceful future.

Despite the promise of the Oslo accords, Israel and the Palestinians have yet to resolve their devilishly difficult dispute. In the third edition of Israelis and Palestinians. Why Do They Fight? Can They Stop? (Yale University Press), historian Bernard Wasserstein focuses on three neglected forces – demographic, economic and social – that have both shaped the conflict and made Israelis and Palestinians so interdependent. This book may force you to re-examine your basic assumptions.

Mark Werner, an American lawyer, describes his tours as a volunteer at Israeli military bases in Army Fatigues: Joining Israel's Army of International Volunteers (Devora Publishing). Offering an insider's view of the Israeli armed forces and of volunteers like himself, he looks at the everyday lives of soldiers and civilians.

If you're an ancient history buff, The Forts of Judaea 168 BC-AD 73 (Osprey) is for you. This an illustrated primer on Hasmonaean and Herodian fortifications spanning the period from the Maccabean revolt to the Roman-Jewish war. The author, Samuel Rocca, is an archeologist trained in Israel.

Lawrence Freedman's A Choice of Enemies: America Confronts the Middle East (Doubleday) falls under the category of mandatory reading. A professor of war studies at King's College in London, he discusses the United States' political and military role in the region from the presidency of Jimmy Carter onward. Focusing on three hot spots, Iraq, Iran and Afghanistan, he shows with admirable erudition how they have influenced each other. He adds that the region's problems cannot all be traced to the Arab-Israeli dispute.

If Islamic radicalism is one of the ills that besets the Middle East today, then Osama bin Laden – the spiritual leader of Al Qaeda – is surely its chief personification.

Two new books deal with that issue in bracing style. The Bin Ladens: An Arabic Family in the American Century (Penguin Press), by Steve Coll, turns on the Yemenite clan that produced a monster of epic proportions. Al Qaeda in Its Own Words (Harvard University Press), edited by Gilles Kepel and Jean-Pierre Milelli, is a selection of speeches, Internet postings and published writings from Al Qaeda leaders. Read these polemics and sink into despair.

Once upon a time, Christians, Jews and Muslims coexisted in Spain. In A Vanished World (Oxford University Press), Chris Lowney re-examines this epoch, tracing the respective contribution of each group to medieval Spain. Cuba's Jewish community, past and present, is the subject of Ruth Behar's soulful meditation, An Island Called Home: Returning to Jewish Cuba (Rutgers University Press). Behar, born in Havana and now teaching anthropology at the University of Michigan, concentrates on the Jews who remained after Fidel Castro's accession to power. Her text is complemented by Humberto Mayol's evocative black and white photographs.

Omer Bartov's Erased: Vanished Traces of Jewish Galicia in Present-Day Ukraine (Princeton University Press) is a journey into "a black hole." He recreates the history of Jewish communities in that remote corner of Europe, including his own family's background, while juxtaposing it against the backdrop of Ukraine's construction of heroic monuments to glorify leaders who collaborated with the Nazis.

Who's Who in the Jewish Bible (Jewish Publication Society of America), by David Mandel, puts some 3,000 biblical figures, from Aaron to Zuriel, at your fingertips. Doubtlessly a handy reference book.

Sixty-three years after Adolf Hitler blew out his brains in a Berlin bunker, Life and Death in the Third Reich (Harvard University Press), by Peter Fritzsche, intelligently explores the appeal of Nazism and the extent to which Germans knew about the murder of Jews. A worthy companion volume by Wolfgang Benz, A Concise History of the Third Reich (University of California Press), deals with these and other issues. Stanley Payne's excellent Franco and Hitler: Spain, Germany and World War II (Yale University Press) tackles four interrelated themes: Franco's relationship with Hitler; Spain's decision not to enter the war; Spain's ties with Nazi Germany; and Franco's assistance, or lack thereof, to Jews.

The Changing Face of Anti-Semitism (Oxford University Press), by Walter Laqueur, is a tour de force of compression.

Holocaust memoirs continue to proliferate. The Zookeeper's Wife (W.W. Norton), by Diane Ackerman, is the amazing story of a Catholic Polish couple who saved more than 300 Jews.

My Hometown Concentration Camp: A Survivor's Account of Life in the Krakow Ghetto and Plaszow Concentration Camp (Vallentine Mitchell) is by Bernard Offen, a survivor whose strength and grit shine through his tale of adversity.

And in Becoming My Mother's Daughter (Wilfrid Laurier University Press), Erika Gottlieb summons up a traumatic childhood in Nazi-occupied Hungary and writes about a rededicated life in Canada.

Frank O. Gehry. Selected Works: 1969 to the Present (Firefly Books), by Casey Mathewson, celebrates the achievements of an iconic architect. Masterpieces of European Painting, 1800-1920, in the Metropolitan Museum of Art (Yale University Press) dazzles the senses.

Lonely Planet's guidebooks, distributed in Canada by Raincoast Books, are always useful and fun to read, both before and during your trip. Their newest ones, Italy, Rome, Tuscany & Umbria, London and Hong Kong & Macau, keep faith with that proud tradition.

Number of faith groups join in celebration

The Temple Kol Ami choir accompanied the service, which was followed by a buffet dinner and the multicultural entertainment.

Members of seven faith groups, including Catholic, Muslim, Baha'i and Hindu, came to celebrate with the synagogue. B'Nai Shalom V'Tikvah works together with them on a tikkun olam project through the Community of Faiths Against AIDS in Africa, which supports agencies in Africa such as the Stephen Lewis Foundation.

Like most teens, B'nai Shalom V'Tikvah has had its growing pains. Beginning in 1994-95 as Jewish Families of Durham, a fledgling group of 15 families, founders and original members Joanie Gertler, Barry Picov, Ely Edelson and Harley Saltzman thought about taking things a step further and began searching for a home.

With the help of Rabbi Gottleib, who was then executive director of CCRJ, the group approached churches and other groups in the Pickering and Ajax area. They finally met with St. Paul's United Church members, who agreed to rent out space to the congregation and offered flexibility and assistance to help transform the sanctuary from church to synagogue on Shabbat and holidays.

This transformation includes importing a Magen David wall-covering and an Aron Kodesh for the bimah, and removing or covering items such as mantlecloths, hanging banners and a large cross.

"St. Paul's congregation has been warm and welcoming to us," King says. "We do our best to respect their house of worship."

They have an arrangement for the High Holy Days in 2009 when Rosh Hashanah falls on a Sunday, so that both can worship on the same day. The church will have its service earlier in the day, and the shul members will move theirs a little later.

The two congregations also enjoy joint programming – Bible and Torah study throughout the year – and every other year, the shul hosts a second night Passover seder with members of the church.

"It's really a unique arrangement," King says. "There are not too many other synagogues doing what we're doing in Ontario, let alone in Canada."

B'Nai Shalom V'Tikvah prides itself on its progressive programming for its members, for example yoga classes with the rabbi (who was once a consultant to the federal government in yoga, meditation and altered states of consciousness), completely egalitarian services and adult education focused on tikkun olam and modern perspectives.

The congregation has two services a month – one on Erev Shabbat, and one on Saturday with Torah study and a Shabbat service. Services are interactive and often led by members.

Hebrew school for children in kindergarten to Grade 7 is offered at the same time and place as adult education classes, making it convenient for parents to attend without worrying about babysitting.

In addition, there are synagogue activities for festivals and holidays. A Purim carnival was held, and a fun-filled family Chanukah event saw the congregation work together to create and spin what they claim is the world's largest dreidel. As part of the broader Jewish community, the congregation participates in such Toronto events as the Walk with Israel, the Ashkenaz Festival and Israel Day.

There are now 55 families involved in B'Nai Shalom V'Tikvah. Congregants come from a number of different backgrounds: Conservative, Reform, Jews by choice, Israelis, mixed marriages, families with non-Canadian adopted children and gay/lesbian couples and singles. Some members are people considering conversion to Judaism. There is also a small group of single adults who have moved east of the GTA to find affordable real estate.

The shul tries to make everyone feel welcome, even offering "buddy arrangements" for newcomers who might not feel comfortable attending a service on their own.

The synagogue has grown via word of mouth and hopes to reach out to some 1,700 Jewish people who now call Durham Region home, including Clarington, Markham and eastern Scarborough.

"We've not yet reached everyone in Durham who is Jewish," says Harley Saltzman, one of the founding members. "We want to see continued growth and for the synagogue to make its presence known in Durham."

The community response to the bar/bat mitzvah celebration suggests that they are on their way. The congregation recently formed a building search committee to lay the groundwork for a new home. Visit B'Nai Shalom V'Tikvah's website at http://www.rjweb-builder.org/congs/cd/cd006/ .

Conference addresses healing through prayer

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Judaism makes a distinction between curing and healing, said Rabbi Dow Marmur, rabbi emeritus of Holy Blossom Temple, at a conference sponsored by the Toronto Jewish Healing Project, held last month at Beth Tzedec Congregation.

"A lot of people are cured but not healed, and vice versa," he said at a workshop following the keynote address by Beth Tzedec Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl.

The Toronto Jewish Healing Project, co-ordinated by Etta Ginsberg McEwan, is now under the auspices of Jewish Family & Child as part of its chaplaincy. It offers a variety of coping skills and techniques, including singing, psalms, meditating and the studying of sacred texts.

Rabbi Marmur, a member of the healing project's steering committee, said too many people believe solely in the cure. "We need to learn to embrace life despite the pain. We must heal enough so we can face life as is."

The group uses the term "healing" instead of "healed," he said because healing is a continuous process.

By taking the healing project under its umbrella, he said, JF&C has recognized that the agency has a role beyond social work. "They have to help people cope in various situations."

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said that incorporating the healing project into JF&C is a big development because it moves it from the margins into our organizational structure. "The project has not yet caught fire, but it has been good for many people."

Through prayer, he said, we may all be comforted. "We all have times when we need someone to take care of us. We might come home and cocoon, we might go to someone with a hug, or we might go to synagogue to hear some familiar melodies. [These things] allow us to go to a safe place and then go forward."

In praying, he said, we need to get in touch with our deep feelings, and put them into words.

We all need a place to sulk, he said, "and praying is a time in which we can go back and recognize our needy selves and get replenished."

He said Rabbi Mordecai Kaplan, founder of Reconstructionist Judaism, said that prayer is a form of self-examination, the raising of the best part of oneself.

"He also saw prayer as [performing] a social function, as helping to build a community. The sense of singing and music brings people together."

He added that Rabbi Joseph Soloveitchik, a 20th-century philosopher and teacher, says that we are able to pray because of historical precedent. "Prayer allows us to approach God. [Otherwise] we would be silent."

Citing Constantin Stanislavski, a Russian theatre director from the early 20th century, Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said that when on stage, actors have to move beyond the external representation of acting. "They have to go deep into their persona and bring that onto stage."

In prayer, as well, he said, we need to get in touch with our deep feelings and put them in words. "We have to take our emotions and conjure them up."

He said Chassidim believe that when praying, we should concentrate on the words being said until we see the light. "We shouldn't just recite the prayers, but we should go right into them. We are supposed to strip our souls of earthly clothing and garb ourselves in the words of prayer."

Whatever a person's interpretation of prayer, he said, "we find our own way. Prayer is a vehicle for transcending oneself and for coming together on an emotional level."

The conference also included an experiential workshop using the techniques of prayer, meditation and spiritual direction to discern God's voice, a workshop on making prayers more effective, and a service of healing led by Temple Kol Ami Rabbi Daniel Komito-Gottlieb and Dawn Bernstein.

Couple launches campaign in memory of son

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

A Toronto couple has raised $90,000 in the past two months to help a school in Israel, in memory of their son. The amount brings them halfway toward their goal of renovating the science labs at Yeshivat Hadarom's junior high and high school in Rehovot. The schools serve about 600 local students.

Jake and Vivian Anhang, along with a 30-person tribute committee including their daughter in Israel and son in Washington, D.C., are working to make the Eli Anhang Memorial Laboratories a reality.

Jake Anhang said he had hoped the campaign would be completed earlier, in order not to conflict with other campaigns, and, also, so that the school would be able to do the renovations over the summer, before classes start again in the fall.

Yeshivat Hadarom, which combines Jewish and general studies, is under the auspices of the Rabbinical Council of America. The complex also includes a hesder yeshiva – the first in Israel to combine Torah studies with army service – and a teachers' college, as well as a nearby youth village and school.

Eli Anhang was killed in an accident two years ago at the age of 35, during a visit to New York. The father of two children who are now 6 and 9 years old, he worked in the high tech security field and was an alumnus of Associated Hebrew Schools and Or Chaim. He also attended Eitz Chaim Day School and Ner Israel Yeshiva.

In a letter that was sent to potential donors as part of a fundraising flyer, the Anhangs, who are already supporters of Yeshivat Hadarom, noted that Eli had a "profound love" for Israel, and that people remember his "constant smile and concern for others."

Eli Anhang

Two rabbis who are affiliated with the institution - Rabbi Hersh Galinsky, dean of Yeshivat Hadarom and Gan Yavneh Youth Village schools, whom the Anhangs had hosted when he visited Toronto; and Rabbi Menachem Gopin, a former director of Mizrachi Canada from 1983 to 1999 and the school's associate director general – had informed the Anhangs of a need to renovate the science wing.

The more the Anhangs heard, the more they thought that creating the "Eli Anhang Memorial Laboratories" at the school would be an appropriate way to memorialize their son, Jake told The CJN.

The current science labs, which are almost 50 years old, are still the original labs, "and even then they had done them on a shoestring," said Anhang, who has visited the institution twice in the past two years with his wife.

Anhang said they were "quite impressed with the decorum and behaviour of the kids." The school is also noted for its high academic standards, reflected in the bagrut (matriculation) scores of its graduating students, Rabbi Gopin said.

The project is "a tremendous mitzvah on the part of the Anhang family, and a wonderful memorial to Eli," said Rabbi Galinsky, who remembers Eli as "a wonderful, thoughtful young man." The laboratory wing will incorporate biology, physics and computer facilities.

Rabbi Gopin, who taught at Or Chaim when Eli was a student and whose son was a classmate of his, said he was "a very special young man. He always had a smile on his face... [and] a glint in his eye. There was always something bigger that he wanted to do in the future, something he was looking forward to."

Yeshivat Hadarom is "a terrific place," said Rabbi Moshe Stern of Shaarei Tefillah Congregation, a member of the tribute committee. A letter he wrote to potential donors noted Eli's "endearing nature [and] sensitive soul" as well as "the goodness of his heart." The rabbi hopes the project will serve as "a continuing force in memory of Eli."

For further information about the campaign or to contribute to it, call 416-633-7677 or contact Canadian Friends of Yeshivat Hadarom at 2 Neptune Drive, Apt. 510, Toronto, Ontario M6A 3E6.

Discovery invites participants to challenge Judaism's central principles in a novel process called Failsafe. Based on analytical techniques used by the Mossad, the Israeli intelligence agency, this chain of discussions draws audiences into a fascinating and rigorously intellectual means of testing the rational basis for belief in Judaism.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Toronto man spearheads Polish cemetery restoration

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Toronto lawyer Howard Nightingale has been the driving force behind the restoration of an old abandoned Jewish cemetery in Siedleczka, Poland, that will be officially rededicated in a ceremony set for Aug. 17.

Nightingale and representatives of numerous other Toronto Jewish families plan to be in attendance, along with many townsfolk and notable visitors, including the town's mayor and possibly the chief rabbi of Poland.

Nightingale, whose late mother survived the Holocaust as a hidden child in the nearby village of Gac, first stumbled upon the cemetery seven years ago and was shocked at its state of disrepair.

The site was completely overgrown with weeds, the perimeter walls had disappeared, and many of the tombstones were broken or laid in piles.

"We said Kaddish at the cemetery," Nightingale recalled. "There was a mass grave at the bottom of the hill – Jews of the town were rounded up and shot in 1942. The records show 892 Jews were shot.

"There was a marker at the bottom of the hill which was completely overgrown. We had difficulty in even finding it, but my cousin knew about it. At that time, we all agreed that something should be done."

Nazis used tombstones to pave roads

The one-acre cemetery was established about 1850 and may have been the last resting place for members of Nightingale's family who died prior to World War II. During the war, the Nazis used some of the tombstones as paving stones on the road.

Convinced that the long Jewish presence in Poland deserves to be honoured and remembered, Nightingale began raising funds for the project. More than $22,000 came from five families with relatives in Siedleczka and its surrounding shtetls of Kanczuga, Zagorze, Gac, Manasterz, Białoboki, Chmielnik, Jawornik Polski and Zabratówka. Eventually, about $54,000 was raised.

Although Nightingale soon realized the difficulty in co-ordinating the restoration by long distance, vital assistance came from the Poland Jewish Cemetery Restoration Project, now administered by the Foundation for the Preservation of Jewish Heritage in Poland, and from Norman Weinberg, a Buffalo-area man with expertise in similar restoration projects.

Many Toronto-area Jewish families likely have roots in the Siedleczka region. The town is located in southeastern Poland, about 170 miles southeast of Warsaw. For more information on the cemetery and to see some tombstones online, visit www.Siedleczka.org.

Reading to feed the Jewish mind

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

This summer's reading list of books for the inquiring Jewish mind is headed by two new releases by Avi Sagi, a professor in the department of philosophy at Bar-Ilan University. In The Open Canon, Sagi displays his vast knowledge of rabbinic literature to offer a compelling argument regarding the nature of halachah. The book is organized around one central inquiry: how can the Torah, with its myriad of interpretations, be closely linked with divinity when "human strands are so closely woven into its fabric." Can the central religious texts of Judaism be authoritative if God's word is filtered through human perception?

And in Transforming Identity, Sagi analyzes with care and precision the history of conversion literature in the Jewish canon. Given recent events in Israel, where a religious court ruling has raised the possibility of thousands of conversions becoming retroactively invalid, Sagi's work should be required reading for anyone who wants a nuanced and sophisticated understanding of the regnant issues. It is both illuminating and surprising in the best sense.

Charles Taylor, professor emeritus of Philosophy at McGill University and one of the leading philosophical thinkers alive today, has published a monumental work that encapsulates many of the themes he has been writing about for decades. In A Secular Age, Taylor ruminates on the changes that modernity has brought for faith and about the tantalizing search for spirituality in an age where science and the drive for autonomy have led to widespread abandonment of traditional religion, at least in the West. Spanning centuries of religious currents, the book is unafraid to pose big questions and struggle with their ramifications.

There is a voluminous Holocaust literature already extant, including numerous memoirs and personal accounts. A plainly written and quietly gripping testimony comes from Rabbi Naphtali Lau-Lavie, entitled Balaam's Prophecy. The Lau family need no introduction in Israel: Naphtali's younger brother Yisrael Meir Lau is a former Ashkenazi chief rabbi and the author's son is Benny Lau, a well-known figure in religious Zionist circles. In this book, published in 1993 in Hebrew and translated into English five years later, Rabbi Lau tells of his efforts, as a boy, to save himself and his younger brother in the wake of the murder of his parents. The narrative also traces his life after the war in the Land of Israel, as well as the United States.

In a recent interview, the playwright Vaclav Havel, who went on to become the president of the Czech Republic, noted that even with the downfall of the Soviet Union and the heady rush of freedom that this brought to millions of people, "unfortunately, we have not succeeded in creating a better world." The best and worse impulses of humanity are movingly recorded by Dr. James Orbinski in An Imperfect Offering, his passionate discussion of humanitarian action in the 21st century. One of the founders of the Canadian chapter of Medecins Sans Frontieres (Doctors Without Borders), Orbinski served tirelessly in Rwanda at the height of the 1994 genocide. The book chronicles the agonizing medical and moral dilemmas he faced on a regular basis and challenges the reader not only to consider the question of how to alleviate suffering, but what our role in perfecting the world can and must be.

Julian Barnes meditates on mortality

There Is Nothing To Be Afraid Of* by Julian Barnes, Random House.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Many and varied are views and attitudes about death.

Emily Dickinson wrote: "Because I could not stop for death, he kindly stopped for me."

In his play Julius Caesar, Shakespeare wrote:"Cowards die many times before their deaths;/ The valiant never taste of death but once./ Of all the wonders that I yet have heard/ It seems to me most strange that men should fear/ Seeing that death, a necessary end,/ Will come when it will come."

William Hazlitt suggested that perhaps the best cure for the fear of death is to reflect that life has a beginning as well as an end. There was a time when we were not, this gives us no concern; why then should it trouble that a time will come when we shall cease to be?

These thoughts on mortality come uneasily to mind after reading There Is Nothing To Be Afraid Of. In this, his 15th book, Julian Barnes confesses that sometimes the fear of death assails him in the night when he is pitchforked back into consciousness. Suddenly he is "awake, utterly alone, beating pillow with fist and shouting, "Oh no, oh no, oh no."

Now at 62, Barnes has written a book about many things: history, religion, art, literature and family relations – but mainly about our inescapable mortality.

A liberal portion of the book is given over to his relationship with his parents and older brother. In a recent interview, he said: "I'm a novelist and therefore ideas have to be rooted in people. If I'm going to write about death, I'm not equipped to write in a general, theoretical, argumentative, philosophical book about it – that's not how I write. It has to be connected to me and therefore also my parents, because my experience of people I knew well, dying, is of their dying."

Barnes used to be an atheist but is now an agnostic. He admires Jules Reynard, the 19th-century French author, who said: "I don't know if God exists. But it would be better for his reputation if he didn't."

Barnes admits: "I don't believe in God, but I miss him." And insists that you have to be very foolish to suppose that the generations who believed in God were less intelligent than your own.

The author indicates that of all the professions, medicine is the one most likely to attract people with high anxieties about dying. This is good news in one sense to know that doctors are against death, but less good in that they may unwittingly transfer their own fears onto their patients, over-insist on curability and shun death as failure.

Barnes considers the popular poetic image that compares human life to a bird flying from darkness into a brightly lit banquet hall and then flying out into the dark on the farther side. He writes: "This image doesn't work for me. It's pretty enough, but the pedantic side of me keeps wanting to point out that any right-thinking bird flying into a warm banqueting hall would perch on the rafters as long as it bloody well could, rather than head straight out again. Moreover, the bird, in its pre- and post-existence on either side of the carousing hall, is at least still flying, which is more than can or will be said for us."

Dylan Thomas famously instructed his dying father – and all of us – "Do not go gentle into that good night. Rage, rage against the dying of the light." This advice, maintains Barnes, "speaks more of youthful grief and poetic self-congratulation than wisdom based on clinical knowledge."

He refers to Sherwin Nuland, an American surgeon who wrote the book How We Die. Nuland stated plainly: "No matter the degree to which a man thinks he has convinced himself that the process of dying is not to be dreaded, he will yet approach his final illness with dread – gentleness and serenity are unlikely to be his option."

Long-lived Bertrand Russell remained an atheist into his old age. He was asked, what if the Pearly Gates were not a fantasy, and he found himself faced by a deity he had always denied? "Well," Russell used to reply: "I would go up to Him and say, 'You didn't give me enough evidence.'"

Despite its forbidding subject, this book is often witty and provocative, rather than morbid and depressing.

Unhappily, there is no way to elude the harvesting angel with his scythe, but this protean book provides alternative avenues and approaches on how to face the inevitable.

Jewish genetic screening

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Today, we look at Jewish genetic screening and related controversies.

I must emphasize that although you can find a wealth of information about genetic screening online, the Internet must not be considered a substitute for trusted medical or rabbinic experts who are familiar with your particular circumstances. Also, pay close attention to the credentials of the authors of anything you read on the web. Not every one is a reliable or accurate source of information.

"Why is this gene different from all other genes?" That's the name of a conference that examined scientific, ethical and religious genetic issues facing Jews. Dr. Robert Pollack, a professor of biological sciences, says that advances in decoding the human genome have allowed us to develop new screening tests for genetic diseases found among Ashkenazi Jews.

But those advances also open a Pandora's box of ethical dilemmas. Should a couple considering marriage opt for genetic testing? What should they do if they receive heartbreaking results? Can insurance companies require genetic testing results?

The conference was organized by the Association of Orthodox Jewish Scientists, whose website has many thought-provoking articles geared to both scientific and general audiences. [aojs.org] The association recorded the conference and has made it available online. It is accessible to the layperson. Part 1: [tinyurl.com/5lu9gb]; Part 2: [tinyurl.com/5f255s]; Part 3: [tinyurl.com/5rt7uq].

One of the greatest fears about genetic testing is the stigma that could occur if someone is known to be a carrier of a disease. A fascinating article in The Jewish Homemaker magazine looks at the Brooklyn-based organization, Dor Yeshorim. [tinyurl.com/4cyjrd] Dor Yeshorim tests young men and women before they begin to date. If both are carriers for a certain disorder, they are told their prospective union is "not advisable." No one is told if he or she is a carrier, only that both people must look for another match. The organization was created by Rabbi Joseph Eckstein, who lost four children to Tay-Sachs disease between 1965 and 1983. [tinyurl.com/4d59ve]

The Dor Yeshorim method has gained wide acceptance in Brooklyn's Orthodox community and has been credited in helping to virtually eliminate Tay-Sachs among Jews. [tinyurl.com/3n4lur]

But it has also been criticized by Rabbi Moshe Tendler, a rosh yeshiva and professor of Jewish medical ethics at New York's Yeshiva University. [tinyurl. com/42un4d] Rabbi Tendler has concerns with mass screening programs since finding a genetic defect "can lead to discrimination by insurance companies, employers and others [who are] looking to be married." Rabbi Tendler is also quoted in a lengthy and critical article that appeared on the New Atlantis magazine's website titled Eugenics – Sacred and Profane. [tinyurl.com/489r3p]

Aish HaTorah's website also includes an article about Dor Yeshorim and genetic screening. But what caught my eye was the response to the piece from a woman named Lillian. She explains that after she and her fiancé were tested and found to be carriers for Tay-Sachs, they received permission from their rabbi to go ahead and use contraception during their marriage. Over the years, they went on to adopt seven children – as well as give birth to an eighth child after an unexpected pregnancy. Lillian says she has no regrets. "It wasn't an easy path. But nothing good comes easily. Yes, it's easy to say goodbye [to a fiancé] because having a family might be more difficult than usual. But the rewards are far more reaching." [tinyurl.com/4m9t75]

However, the decision by Lillian and her husband to marry and use contraception in order to prevent pregnancy wasn't acceptable to the next person to comment at the Aish site. Judith said that by choosing to adopt, a man cannot fulfil his Torah obligation to have children. "There is only one way to fulfil this mitzvah and that is by having your own, biological children, a minimum of a boy and a girl who go on to have children of their own."

Family celebrates 100 years in Canada

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

It has been 100 years since the first of the Borovoy clan arrived in Canada, and about 150 family members came together recently to mark the occasion and meet extended relatives at the 70th annual family reunion.

The 2008 Borovoy Picnic took place June 22 at Ballantrae Community Centre, in Stouffville, Ont.

The Borovoys came from a town called Krugloe (also known as Kroile), which was in the Mogilev province of what is now Belarus. Velvel and Freida Borovoy put down roots in Elora, Ont., in 1908.

Eight families came from that couple, with the names Borovoy, Garshowitz, Avruskin and Taraday. The descendants of the original eight Borovoy siblings now number several hundred people who live in Mexico, the United States and Canada, with about 80 living in Israel.

They include authors, engineers, amateur genealogists and recording artists, among many other professions.

Fred Borovoy, 73, took part in the family's first reunion in 1938, when he was the youngest of some 45 first cousins. His father, Sol, was one of the eight original siblings in the clan. Although Fred has lived in Israel for 34 years, he has attended a reunion or has visited relatives in Canada regularly since 1978.

"This is very emotional for me. It's good to see all of these relatives and good to see that there are still some second-generation [members of the original Elora Borovoys]," he said. "This is especially good for the younger generation to see where they come from."

Fred graduated from the University of Toronto's engineering program and went on to make aliyah. In Israel, he plied his trade in the Israeli military and for the country's atomic energy program. He has also spent the past 34 years as a volunteer police officer.

"It's good to see everybody and have the kids involved with the family," said Steven Borovoy, 55, who lives in Manotick, Ont., near Ottawa. "It's exciting to find out what's going on and watch the kids grow, with each year."

As chief of maintenance at Transport Canada, he manages the fleet of aircraft owned and operated by the Canadian government, including the fleets of the Canadian Coast Guard, the maritime surveillance program and the arctic surveillance program.

His daughter, Julia, was the youngest participant 20 years ago, at the 50th annual reunion. "I found this year's picnic to be a great way to meet relatives we haven't seen in years," she said. "We have the panoramic photo from 20 years ago, when I was just three weeks old, and my family was looking at it along with our 2008 panoramic photo... When I show these photos to friends, they're amazed. All of the little kids have grown, especially me."

Gord Garshowitz, 63, who teaches part time at Toronto's Or Chaim and Ulpanat Orot high schools, recalls attending reunions as far back as 55 years ago. They often took place at a farm near Guelph, Ont., owned by the Avruskin family.

"I can remember as a kid going to those reunions," he said. "There were also local reunions that my family used to go to."

Hartley Garshowitz, 52, has spent the past 20 years compiling an extensive family tree that goes back about 180 years. The tree, displayed at the reunion, now includes 5,400 names and contains 44 pages.

"It's important to know one's roots," he said. "Knowing family background and maintaining contact with one's extended family helps keep us together. It really is a small world."

Hartley's grandmother, Sarah Borovoy Garshowitz, came through Ellis Island in 1908 on her way to join other family members who had come over just before. She was joining her older sister, Dora, who had already settled in Canada with her husband, Samuel Avruskin.

This year's reunion culminated in the opening of a time capsule that was sealed 20 years ago. It included name tags from the 1988 reunion, a sign-in book from the reunion, various letters to relatives, a genealogy chart, a driver's licence from 1982, some old photographs and a family history book.

Israel earns praise for diplomatic efforts

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The recent flurry of diplomatic activity from Israel has attracted a fair amount of media coverage. Among the initiatives: overtures, by way of Turkey, to Syria about resuming peace talks; an effort to reach out to the Lebanese government; indirect negotiations with Hezbollah about a prisoner exchange, and indirect negotiations with Hamas about a ceasefire.

The New York Times, which has never shied away from criticizing Israel, began its June 30 editorial, "Israel's Diplomatic Offensive," by praising the Jewish state for these diplomatic moves.

The paper, however, was not blindly enthusiastic, writing that "[t]here are clear risks." It continued: "Hamas may not respect or enforce the ceasefire; there have been almost daily violations. Syria may be as unbudging as it had been in past negotiations. Hezbollah may block talks or use them to buy time to build up its armaments and political leverage. [Israeli Prime Minister Ehud] Olmert, politically weak and legally besieged, may not have the staying power to see any of these initiatives through."

Nonetheless, the Times argued, Israel is "right to try."

Indeed, memory apparently being in short supply, many in the media tend to forget all the efforts Israel has made over the years to strike agreements with its Arab neighbours: Egypt in 1979; Jordan in 1994; the Palestinians through the Oslo years from 1993 to 2000; repeated negotiations with Syria under its former president, Hafez Assad.

Instead, journalists tend to focus on the drama of day-to-day conflict.

Notwithstanding a predictable amount of cynicism about Olmert's motives, given his personal legal difficulties, what he's doing now on the diplomatic front is consistent with longstanding Israeli policy. However, Iran's increasing influence on countries and parties that border Israel – including Syria, Hezbollah in Lebanon, Hamas and Islamic Jihad in Gaza – may limit Israel's negotiating options, according to some experts.

In "Peace Offensive" (July 9), New Republic editor-in-chief Martin Peretz called it "a stunner" that Terry Larsen, the former United Nations special envoy to the Middle East and an often severe critic of Israel, "lambasted Israel for its recent negotiations with Syria."

Peretz quoted Larsen as saying: "Israel has given Syria a huge gift, without thus far receiving anything in return."

Peretz wrote that, in exchange for Israel relinquishing the strategic Golan Heights to Damascus, "there are only two concessions worth getting… detaching Syria from Iran and… lifting Syria's hold over Beirut." Yet Syrian President Bashar Assad has indicated that his regime's relationship with Iran won't change.

The fundamental point is that if someone such as Larsen has come to Israel's defence, this is a clear indication that at least some important international attitudes toward the Jewish state are shifting in its favour.

* * *

The Canadian media reported on the controversy and raw emotion that the prisoner exchange deal between Israel and Hezbollah aroused in Israel. The fact that Israel agreed to release a heinous killer, Samir Kuntar, without even knowing for sure the fate of kidnapped Israeli soldiers Ehud Goldwasser and Eldad Regev, struck many Israelis as setting a dangerous precedent for more such kidnappings.

On CBC Radio (June 29), Iris Makler quoted Israeli politician and peace activist Yossi Beilin: "I think our worst mistake was to negotiate and agree to terms without knowing if our soldiers are alive or dead."

Israel's commitment to leave no soldier on the battlefield – even if dead – was poignantly explained in The CJN's July 3 editorial, "Wretched choices": "This promise, this belief in the sanctity of life is the elevating quality and timeless, eternal value that give Israeli society its strength and resilience. And it is precisely this quality and this value that distinguishes the Jewish state from the cruel enemies it fights."

Paul Michaels is communications director for the Canada-Israel Committee.

ENJOYING THE OUTDOORS: Hundreds of families came out for a day of fun at the recent Zareinu Moveathon Festival in Downsview Park, which raised money for the Zareinu Educational Centre for children with special needs in the community.

A.V. Israel promotes services for deaf children

Organization seeks cochlear implants for those who need them

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

When Elaine Tal-El's twin daughters, now 18, were diagnosed with profound hearing loss at age two, she not only did what she could to help them, she helped deaf children across Israel.

An independent filmmaker who immigrated to Israel from Canada in 1980, Tal-El, whose twins are the youngest of four daughters, is the co-founder and chair of A.V. Israel, a nonprofit organization that seeks cochlear implants for everyone who needs them and the mainstreaming of hearing-impaired children.

In Toronto recently to raise awareness and funds for the organization, Tal-El said that after facing the shock of her daughters' diagnosis, she researched services in Israel and found the approach to deaf children to be "backwards."

"We were told the girls would never be like their sisters, and we were advised to have them learn to lip read, which is a very tricky way of learning language. So many words look the same."

She learned about cochlear implants – electronic devices with an internal component surgically implanted in the inner ear and an external piece that attaches by magnet – from a Canadian expert she brought to Israel at her own expense.

The girls ultimately had their first implants in New York in 1993, at a cost of $70,000, and Tal-El said "the results were dramatic. Along with therapy, the girls, who had not spoken until then, began hearing and talking."

With the use of the technology and intensive rehabilitation, "the girls learned language just like the best of us."

About four years ago, the girls had their second implant, and the family's insurance company agreed to subsidize the procedure for $25,000.

Now graduating high school, the girls hear, and they speak Hebrew and English fluently, Tal-El said. They also plan to join the Israel Defence Forces.

Tal-El said her vision, as well as the vision of A.V. Israel, is that every person with hearing loss in Israel should have the opportunity to communicate through spoken language and to maximize his or her potential to become an independent and creative member of the hearing world.

In its two centres, in Ra'anana and Jerusalem, A.V. Israel provides speech and language therapists who are trained to educate children with hearing loss using auditory-verbal strategies.

The organization also provides parents with support, education and counselling to help them meet their children's needs, such as acoustic accommodations in schools and special arrangements for high school students preparing to take matriculation exams.

A.V. Israel's main focus, however, is to help families obtain cochlear implants, Tal-El said. Although the Israeli government pays for the first cochlear implant, that's only the first step in becoming part of the hearing world.

The government doesn't pay for a second implant, which allows for bilateral hearing, and it doesn't pay for batteries, which have to be replaced every two days.

Tal-El said that her organization lobbies health officials to improve insurance coverage for these families.

She said that "we live in a beautifully auditory world, and I want our girls and other kids like them to be part of it."

Correction

Inexplicably, some editing and other errors found their way into the obituary of the late Charles Zaionz that appeared in last week's issue. The name "Ronen" appeared in the place of "Zaionz" in the second- and third-last paragraphs. Given the overall context of the article, the error would have been apparent to the reader. Nevertheless, the textual result was incorrect and the error inexcusable.

Charles Zaionz

The names of Zaionz's children, Raphi and Elana, were also incorrectly spelled.

In addition, the quote attributed to Moshe Ronen, the chair of the Canada Israel Committee, regarding his days as head of the Jewish Students Network was unfortunately truncated. It should have read: "We student activists were not prepared to submit to communal discipline of not making waves, and instead were forthright and active on behalf of Soviet Jewry and Ethiopian Jewry – often embarrassing the communal leadership into action."

We apologize for the errors and for any hurt or embarrassment that may have arisen from them. MBD

Balkan Beat Box's musical mix makes for a potent cocktail

By EZRA GLINTER
Special to The CJN

Gypsy punk, klezmer jazz and Balkan brass may already be entrenched styles in New York City's downtown scene, but for musical nomads Balkan Beat Box (BBB), there's always a new twist on an old tune.

Mixing circus theatrics with electronic beats; Arab melodies with Hebrew lyrics; and African percussion with Balkan brass, BBB's global mix of musical ingredients makes for a potent, high-energy cocktail.

"The influences are pretty vast, but somehow out of all of that we have developed a special BBB esthetic... we always search for freshness, yet we seem to agree how BBB should sound," says Ori Kaplan, the band's bald-headed, fierce-eyed saxophonist.

Kaplan, 39, grew up in Israel, where he studied klezmer clarinet and later jazz saxophone. After moving to New York in 1991 to study at the Mannes College of Music, he quickly got involved with the local jazz scene, playing with groups such as Trio Plusm, as well as his own Ori Kaplan Percussion Ensemble.

He also began moonlighting with various rock bands, including world-pop outfit Firewater and gypsy punk band Gogol Bordello.

While tripping around the rapidly expanding indie-rock universe, Kaplan stumbled upon fellow Israeli Tamir Muskat, a drummer and electronic music master whose world-music leanings kept bringing the two into the same circles.

Eventually, they teamed up with Gogol Bordello vocalist Eugene Hutz and guitarist Oren Kaplan to form the experimental gypsy-Hebrew hybrid J.U.F.

"Tamir's ability to dig in on the electronic side of things and my melodic background with Eugene's explosive energy was like the sign of the times. An urban immigrant movement creating its own soundtrack," says Kaplan in an interview with the Canadian Jewish News, who, at the time, was en route to the Med World Music Festival in Loulé, Portugal.

In 2005, Kaplan and Muskat got together on a more permanent basis and created Balkan Beat Box, along with a motley collection of collaborators, including Israeli MC Tomer Yosef.

They soon released their first, self-titled album on the JDub record label, home to other wave-making Jewish acts including SoCalled, and at one point, Matisyahu. Buzz about the new band was nearly instantaneous, and an early Purim party gig at S.O.B's, a stylish SoHo world-music venue, easily sold out.

"Tamir and I wanted to continue to work together with different guests, get what was to us a more down-home kind of feel," says Kaplan. "We swim very similarly in this ocean of sounds. For us, it was the creation of new music that is New York City and also the music of the Mediterranean pond we came from."

After spending a few years solidifying their reputation in the underground New York scene, the band released its second album, Nu Med, in 2007. Unlike the rag-tag nature of their first release, Nu Med took a more calculated approach, resulting in a tighter, if slightly less spontaneous record.

"The first album was created as a studio project before we even named it. Tamir and I were having and making new tracks for our DJ nights. It's a great collection of thoughts," says Kaplan. "The second album comes more from the experience accumulated on the road, playing with the same people and adding their voices. It's more of a refined album."

Since the band's inception as a side project for Kaplan and Muskat, BBB has featured a continually rotating lineup of supporting musicians. Currently, the band includes blues guitarist, singer and Sway Machinery front man Jeremiah Lockwood; Pink Noise bassist Itamar Ziegler; and co-saxophonist and clarinetist Peter Hess. Tomer Yosef, who is also a popular solo artist in Israel, has become an increasingly integral member of the group, contributing his signature percussion samples. Though members of the band all have their own side projects, the unique alchemy of BBB has kept it an artistic and professional priority.

"Each one of us has a lot going on, but BBB is a special thing. It's the voice that shines the brightest and speaks to all of our minds in perfect sync," says Kaplan, who also maintains his own project, the improvisational-rock band Shot'nez.

In addition to BBB, other world-music-tinged bands, such as Beirut and DeVotchka, have been sweeping the indie-rock world in recent years. According to Kaplan, the trend represents a desire to get back to cultural roots. At the same time, hipper genres such as punk, hip hop and electronic music have helped breathe new life into antiquated forms.

"Most of us came from somewhere and are searching for this community, which we can celebrate in a new way. The old techno clubs don't supply this vodka-drenched wedding ceremonial vibe that we take to the clubs. There is something which makes you smile and dance, and break some inhibitions about the old world with these electronic or punk elements," Kaplan says.

Perhaps one of the most ambitious aspects of Balkan Beat Box is the band's effort to rise above political and ethnic divisions, a mission that is consistent with their cross-cultural compositions. Over the years, the band has worked with Moroccan, Bulgarian, Syrian, Palestinian and Iranian guest artists.

"We are musicians first and politics comes next, but our natural will to bring some dialogue to old enemies sometimes pushes us beyond music. It's an added mission," Kaplan says.

Currently, the band is working on their third album, which it is recording in New York, Belgrade and Tel Aviv.

"We are already playing a few of the songs in our shows, but every time we fly to meet each other in a corner of the world to work on it, some extra magic happens," Kaplan says.

With a vast range of styles and traditions at its fingertips, the band has proven itself to be anything but predictable. But whatever Balkan Beat Box does next, it's bound to add spice to an already hot repertoire.

Balkan Beat Box plays at the Fesitval D'été in Quebec City on July 10; at the Ottawa Blues Festival on July 11; and at the Winnipeg Folk Festival on July 13. For more information, see www.balkanbeatbox.com.

Coast to Coast

Singles plus volunteering equals JCorps

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Is JCorps mainly a group where singles get a chance to meet and mingle, or an opportunity to volunteer and do good work?

Actually, the answer is both.

Montreal is the second place outside New York City to become officially affiliated with JCorps, which, although it's only a year old, is being touted as the "largest Jewish volunteer network in the world."

Its members are Jewish singles aged 18 to 28 who can come from all streams of Judaism. They do volunteer work every Sunday in groups of about 20.

At the same time, the singles get to know each other and form bonds, while avoiding the singles scene of noisy bars and often empty relationships.

"In a sense, Montreal is opening up a JCorps franchise," said Ari Teman, JCorps's 26-year-old founder, on the phone from New York. "Other cities we're also working on now are Boston, Washington, Miami, Los Angeles and San Francisco."

JCorps ascribes its phenomenal growth – about 10 per cent every two weeks, Teman said – to the fact that it is based in New York, with its teeming numbers of Jewish singles, and to the fact that it is largely using the Facebook social networking site, e-mail and word of mouth to get the word out.

Teman said the diverse range of New York singles involved in JCorps come from hundreds of countries, colleges and universities across America and around the world.

The Montreal JCorps leader is Judith Fuchs, a 23-year-old law student at the University of Montreal, who discovered JCorps when she was researching ways to volunteer in the community.

"It's already taking off," Fuchs told The CJN. "We heard from 120 people in four days."

Teman, who works as a stand-up comic in New York and is a graduate of Brandeis University, makes no bones about the fact that his primary motive for creating JCorps was that he was growing weary of the Manhattan Jewish singles scene, where "you keep seeing the same people, the clubs are dark and loud, and you know after five minutes if there's anything there."

Even on its website, in the frequently asked questions section, people ask: "Is this organization the result of an overly elaborate plan to meet singles?" The answer comes back: "Yes. And you're welcome."

JCorps, Teman said, allows the singles to "enjoy a personal sense of fulfilment" through the volunteer work, while at the same time, making new "personal and professional connections."

Fuchs said the primary motive in her JCorps involvement was to reactivate her volunteer spirit – she used to do quite lot of volunteering while going to school at Hebrew Academy – as well as to meet other singles.

Teman flew to Montreal recently to see Fuchs and help get JCorps off the ground locally.

The rules for JCorps are fairly simple, but they are enforced. Members must be Jewish, single and aged 18 to 28. All those doing volunteer work must wear JCorps T-shirts. Because JCorps is non-denominational and is not involved in religious activities, volunteer work is done on Sundays, not Saturdays or Jewish holidays, to enable more observant Jewish singles to participate.

JCorps stresses that its main role is to make connections between its volunteers and communal organizations. It is run exclusively by volunteers, including Teman.

Fuchs, who is also involved in Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region's young adult committee and is a past president of the Canadian Jewish Law Students Association, said she expects the first local volunteer event to take place within a few weeks, probably at the Old Brewery Mission, Montreal Children's Hospital or a seniors residence.

"We want to be able to come back to the same place every month," she said.

Teman is reluctant to specify the exact number of people in JCorps, but he said they number in the thousands and he stands by the JCorps claim that it is the "largest Jewish volunteer network in the world," based on the involvement of New York City singles alone.

Costs are paid through corporate donations and small fundraisers, including comedy club evenings that charge token amounts. The money raised goes toward the cost of T-shirts, transportation to work sites and publicity. Teman said in the United States, JCorps has the status of a non-profit organization that can issue tax receipts, and Fuchs is now working to acquire the same status in Canada.

JCorps has also received attention from the New York Jewish media. The Jewish Week named Teman, who is also the founder of a product design firm, as one of its "36 under 36" for 2008, and JCorps was the subject of an article last year in the New Jersey Jewish Standard.

Teman said, depending on how things go, consideration might be given to starting up a JCorps for older singles, and even for married couples.

But so far, the unique approach taken by JCorps seems to be working. "No one has done the social volunteering approach for singles before," he said.

The Montreal JCorps website is www.montreal.jcorps.org. Fuchs can be reached at judithcfuchs@gmail.com.

Kulanu marches in Gay Pride Parade

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

This year's Gay Pride Week in Toronto attracted more than one million people, and among those who celebrated the event was a small student group representing Jewish members of the gay community.

Pride Week – which takes place every year in the last week of June and includes galas and street festivals, and ends with a parade that begins at Church and Bloor streets, goes west to Yonge Street and south to Carlton Street – is one of the largest such events in the world.

And members of Kulanu Toronto, a Jewish social group for bisexual, gay, lesbian, transgendered, transexual, and intersexed people, wanted its presence to be felt.

"We had a lot of people cheering us on. We had one guy come to our booth and say that it was so wonderful that there is a Jewish group," said Justine Apple, who volunteers as an executive committee member of Kulanu Toronto, which has been funded by Hillel of Greater Toronto since 2003.

Despite some grey and wet weather, Apple said that between the volunteers who manned the Kulanu booth and those who marched in the June 29 parade, about 25 members – students and professionals – came out to represent the Jewish gay community.

"We had a great time. [Our booth] started off at Yonge and Gloucester, which is a really crappy location, but then we moved to Alexander Street, which was much better. We were handing out promotional material, business cards, flyers indicating what our goals are, what kinds of social events we run, organizations we affiliate with," Apple said.

She added that Kulanu also produced T-shirts that had a Magen David and said "Unified By Love" to incorporate the theme of this year's parade – "Unified" – and the values of the group.

"On the banner, it also said 'Unified By Love' and we had hearts on it, and a Magen David, we had a menorah on there. We were also holding up signs with our website and logo," Apple said.

"We even had one of our executive members, who is involved with a guy in Detroit and he brought his two little kids, so it was so amazing, because we were holding our banner and in front of us, were the two guys and the two kids. Everyone was looking at them. They were such a focus."

Leading up to the parade, Kulanu co-sponsored a June 25 screening at the Miles Nadal JCC of a documentary titled Jerusalem is Proud to Present, which chronicled the events and controversy leading up to the World Pride Conference in Jerusalem in 2006.

Apple said that she was thrilled with the attendance, as the Al Green Theatre was nearly full.

In addition to Kulanu's involvement with Pride Week, the group organizes events for the 400 people on its e-mail list, including Shabbat dinners, barbecues, karaoke nights, movie nights and pub nights, as well as Chanukah and Purim parties.

Kulanu mainly operates out of the Hillel at the University of Toronto, but she said students from all over the Toronto area are invited and welcome to attend all of its events.

Apple said that when the group was officially founded in 2003, it was primarily student-based.

"But now the demographic has changed, and we have a lot of non-students participating as well," she said.

"We met a lot of people at Pride this year at our booth who were older, past their 40s, and they said they wanted to meet more Jewish gay people in Toronto, but they were worried that Kulanu is generally for students and they were afraid they wouldn't meet anyone or wouldn't be welcome there. I said, 'What are you talking about? It's for everyone.' Kulanu means 'all of us,' so it is important that people know that."

Apple became involved with Kulanu five years before it became an official campus group, but she has only been on the executive for a year. She said that her interactions with other members of the gay community inspire her to stay connected.

She said that at a recent event, she was approached by a man from Montreal who was in his 30s.

"He said, 'I just want to tell you I'm a little shy. I don't often come out to events because I'm just coming out, but I get all your e-mails, I know about all your events and even though I don't come out, I want you to know that you're my anchor, you're my security blanket and without you, I don't know what I would do. I'm just so grateful that your organization exists.'

"That meant a lot to me. Those are the kinds of things that mean a lot."

For more information about Kulanu or its upcoming events, visit www.kulanutoronto.ca.

ש'שאר ג'נ'נו

גידי קורן וחברים

מה יהיה

קיץ עצבני ובלתי ניתן לניבוי בארץ ישראל:
האם תהיה רגיעה ותשובי שדרות יוכלו לנשום? האם תשרוד הממשלה או תהיה הליכה לבחירות? האם ישוחרר השבוי מידי תאמאס?

נשמעת טענה שחוסר היציבות השלטוני בישראל משפיע על הסטטוס ההחלטות של הממשלה, אבל הטענה הזאת אינה הגיונית כי הממשלה הזאת נתמכת עדיין על ידי רוב ברור של נבחרים, ורובם אינם רוצים לסיים את מושב הכנסת כי הם לא ישובו למשכן הכנסת לאחר הבחירות, לאחר שחלק ממפלגותיהם יימחקו (מפלגת העבודה וקדימה).

הטענת נגד אהוד אולמרט בגין קבלת מעטפות כסף מתומכו האמריקני יתברר בחום יולי אוגוסט, אבל גם אז-זו תהיה חקירה מוקדמת שלא תניב שום תוצאות סופיות-התוצאות הסופיות ותקבלנה בבית משפט זה או אחר, או על ידי פרקליט מדינה זה או אחר בעוד מספר שנים, כשאולמרט כבר לא יהיה קרוב לוודאי ראש ממשלה.

הדעיון, שנהוג במספר מדינות, שלפיו אי אפשר לתבוע או לחקור מנהיגים במהלך כהונתם על דברים שעשו בעבר בטרם כהונתם, נראה לי מאוד מתאים לארץ אוכלת יושביה כישראל. אבל שישאר בינינו.

רק יהודי יבין

תודה לאידנה ששלחה לי את הקטעים הבאים:

ישיבה יוניברסיטט הקימה נבחרת חתירת משוטים, שמפסידה בכל המירוצים בוה אחרי זה למרות אימונים מפרכים. מחליטים לשלוח את מוריס פישביין לרגל אחרי הנבחרת של קיימברג'. מוריס מתחבא בין העצים על שפת הנהל ואחרי יממה חוזר ומדווח לחבריו:

"מצאתי את הסוד שלהם!! אנחנו צריכים רק אחד שיצעק-שאר השמונה צריכים לחתור."

מוישה קורא בעיתון על מחקר חדש שאומר שנשים משתמשות ביותר מלים מגברים. הוא מדווח באשתו לאשתו, כי הוא תמיד אומר לה שהיא מדברת יותר מידי. מאשה מקשיבה לו, חושבת ואומרת: "זה בגלל שאנחנו צריכות לחזור על כל דבר שלוש פעמים כדי שתבינו!"

עונה לה מוישה: "על מה?"

האיטלקי אומר: אני עייף וצמא-אני מוכרח לשתות יין!
הצרפתי אומר: אני עייף וצמא, אני מוכרח לשתות קוניאק!
הגרמני אומר: אני עייף וצמא, אני מוכרח לשתות בירה!
הרוסי אומר: אני עייף וצמא, אני מוכרח לשתות וודקה!
היהודי אומר: אני עייף וצמא, בטח יש לי סכרת!

Preparing for overnight camp

Life Coach Corner

Judy Siblin-Librach

How do we prepare ourselves for camp? How do we let our babies go off for weeks at a time? What words of wisdom can we give them – and ourselves – to make it easier for everyone?

I know there are mothers and fathers who look forward to the break – and then there are mothers who weep and worry and wait for that first phone call, letter or other sign that all is well.

As you help your child cope with possible homesickness, avoid expressing your own anxiety. While it's fine for parents to say, "I'm really going to miss you," it may not be the best idea to say, "I'm going to be miserable without you," while you cry your eyes out. Keep things positive and upbeat, and remember, other parents will be your best help. Call them, and you can all commiserate together.

We have prepared them with everything from T-shirts to shampoo, soap, the latest in bug sprays and state-of-the-art sunscreen. We have ironed labels till our arms hurt. We have packed and re-packed, trying to whittle down the 20 T-shirts to 16, even though they only asked for 10. We have warned them about safety first, sharing, caring and teamwork. We have stamped their letters, addressed their envelopes with perfectly typed labels. We have included comics, reading material, updated iPods and as much love, advice, humour and hugs as we can cram into those last few days.

Still, most of us feel a little niggly in the pits of our tummies. And it's not because they won't do well, because, of course, they will. It's because this is a reminder once again that our babies are not babies anymore, and that this is a blessing for them, an opportunity to learn, grow and be independent, so that one day they can sew labels, worry and wave to their own children at the bus stop.

Missing them is the hard part, and most of you probably feel the same lump in your throat and ache in your heart as I do. But believing they will be fine really does help. So does a good cry – after the bus leaves.

Here are a few tips to make the time go faster: redecorating rooms or changing the kids' bedding is a great way to look forward to their return. Also, do those things you never have time to do, now that the house is a little quieter. Do the project you have been longing to get to, or start that exercise program. Pay attention to the others at home who now have you to themselves. Write lots, pray lots and know that all is going to be well. And don't forget your spouse. This is a wonderful time to re-connect, have some romance and more time together. Finally, as my good friend, another Judy, pointed out, this is a wonderful time to reconnect with yourself.

Keep busy. Write fun letters and cards and find a project to do. A good letter is chatty, upbeat and encouraging – writing about meals or mundane activities is a fantastic way to keep your letters light and breezy. Ask lots of questions and even tell a joke or two. Tell your child how boring it is in the city and how lucky she is to be in the fresh air with her friends at camp.

Don't forget that our kids are often over-programmed all year. Camp is time without pressure. No homework, no pressure to do things on time. Camp is a chance to breathe and just feel good being who they are, without TV or video games or anything to stand in their way.

They can try out new friends, find new aspects of their personality and become independent. For some, this is the first time Mom or Dad is not there to do things for them. This is great for kids.

They'll do great and so will you. I promise.

Have a safe, happy and healthy summer!

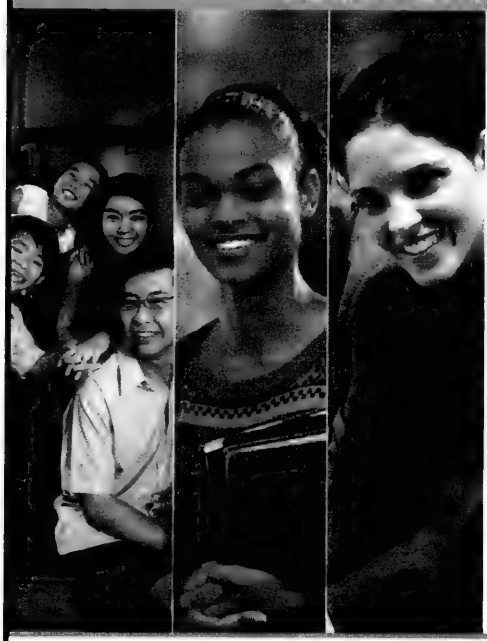
FAMILY CUT: As most kids settled into their summer vacations, three Associated Hebrew Schools students, the Hirsch sisters – from left, Ariella, 3½, Michelle, 6, and Rebecca, 8 – spent their first day off cutting their hair for the Angel Hair for Kids Program, which accepts donations of human hair, 10 inches or longer, to make wigs for child cancer patients.

Giving newcomers a head start
Donner aux nouveaux arrivants un bon départ



The Government of Canada believes in immigration. We want more newcomers to join us and be an important part of Canada's future. That's why we are improving our immigration system by:

1. Creating a more flexible, fair and responsive immigration system
The changes to Canada's immigration laws will help to attract the skilled workers Canada needs most and ensure families are reunited faster.

2. Helping internationally trained individuals
The Foreign Credentials Referral Office was created in 2007 to help newcomers get the information they need to have their credentials assessed and recognized in Canada

3. Increasing settlement funding
The Government of Canada has invested $1.4 billion* more in settlement funding, which includes language training and job search and employment services to help newcomers succeed and make a new home in Canada.

4. Reducing the Right of Permanent Residence Fee
The federal government reduced the right of permanent residence fee from $975 to $490.

* Excluding Quebec. In Quebec, the Canada-Quebec Accord gives the province the exclusive responsibility for providing settlement and support services to all immigrants in Quebec in exchange for financial compensation from the Government of Canada (approx. $198.2 million in 2007-08).

Learn more at www.cic.gc.ca or call 1 800 O-Canada (1-800-622-6232) TTY: 1-800-926-9105.

Le gouvernement du Canada croit en l'immigration. Nous voulons accueillir plus de nouveaux arrivants et que ces derniers jouent un rôle actif pour assurer l'avenir du Canada. Voilà pourquoi nous améliorons notre système d'immigration en prenant les mesures suivantes :

1. Créer un système d'immigration plus souple, plus équitable et mieux adapté
Les modifications apportées à la législation canadienne en matière d'immigration contribueront à attirer les travailleurs qualifiés dont le Canada a le plus besoin, ainsi qu'à réunir les familles plus rapidement.

2. Aider les personnes formées à l'étranger
Le Bureau d'orientation relatif aux titres de compétences étrangers a été mis sur pied en 2007 pour aider les nouveaux arrivants à obtenir l'information dont ils ont besoin pour faire évaluer et reconnaître leurs titres de compétences au Canada.

3. Accroître le financement en matière d'établissement
Le gouvernement du Canada a investi un montant supplémentaire de 1,4 milliard de dollars en fonds d'établissement, notamment pour financer les cours de langue et les services d'orientation et d'aide à la recherche d'emploi pour permettre aux nouveaux arrivants de s'intégrer avec succès au Canada.

4. Réduire les frais relatifs au droit de résidence permanente
Le gouvernement fédéral a réduit de 975 $ à 490 $ les frais relatifs au droit de résidence permanente.

 Exclut le Québec. Au Québec, l'Accord Canada-Québec donne à la province la responsabilité exclusive des services d'établissement et d'intégration des immigrants au Québec en échange d'une compensation financière du gouvernement du Canada (environ 198,2 millions en 2007-08).

Summer bake-ation

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

Some people like to read cookbooks like a novel, while others prefer to cook and bake, but almost everyone likes to eat home-baked sweets! Now that summer is finally here, life is a bit more relaxed and it's always wonderful to share home-baked sweets with family and friends. Summer vacation is also a good time for your summer "bake-ation!"

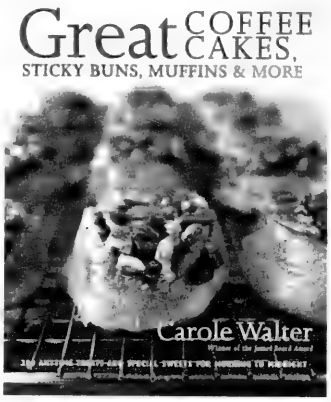
Need some guidance? Award-winning cookbook author Carole Walter has taught baking classes for more than 20 years and has studied with famous pastry chefs in the United States, France, Austria, Italy and Denmark. Walter is the author of Great Cakes, Great Pies & Tarts, and Great Cookies. Her newest baking book, Great Coffee Cakes, Sticky Buns, Muffins & More: 200 Anytime Treats and Special Sweets for Morning to Midnight (Clarkson Potter), makes a welcome addition to the baker's bookshelf.

You'll find a selection of treats that are perfect for breakfast, an afternoon snack, or dessert – the sweets people most like to make at home to enjoy with family and friends. With more than 200 recipes for America's favourite baked goodies, you'll find pound cakes, coffee cakes, muffins and other quick breads, scones, sweet biscuits, Bundt cakes and, of course, her scrumptious Sticky Buns.

Walter guides novices and expert bakers alike through irresistible recipes including Butter Crumb Coffee Cake, Raspberry Buttermilk Muffins with Streusel Topping and A Dilly of a Cheese Scone. Old-world classics such as Almond Croissants, Double Chocolate Walnut Babka and Cinnamon Raisin Rugelach are complemented by what are sure to become new favorites, like Jeff's Chocolate-Glazed Midnight Muffins, and Pumpkin Pecan Loaf.

Walter offers straightforward directions, foolproof recipes, countless tips and suggestions in her new book. To ensure success, her signature "At-a-glance" boxes outline the necessary information to ensure your baked goods turn out perfectly, from baking pan sizes, oven temperatures, baking times, and any special equipment you might need.

In addition, she includes extensive general information on outfitting your own kitchen for baking, common ingredients and techniques. With straightforward directions and enticing recipes, Great Coffee Cakes, Sticky Buns, Muffins & More will have you baking up a storm of treats for every occasion. Try this scrumptious, easy sweet and watch those smiles appear!



CAROLE WALTER'S MACADAMIA FUDGE SQUARES

At-a-glance:
Pan: 10½ x 15½ x 1-inch jelly roll pan
Pan Prep: Line with foil and butter
Oven Temp: 375 degrees
Baking Time: 13 to 15 minutes
Difficulty: *

This pretty bar cookie is another play on a brownie. Dark brown sugar and a hint of cinnamon are perfect partners for the robust flavour of the chocolate. The top is generously sprinkled with macadamia nuts and has a chocolate webbed finish that's guaranteed to catch your eye.

1 cup all-purpose flour, spooned in and levelled
¼ tsp. ground cinnamon
¼ tsp. salt
1 cup (2 sticks) unsalted butter
4 oz. unsweetened chocolate, coarsely chopped
1 cup (lightly packed) very fresh dark brown sugar
1 cup granulated sugar
4 large eggs, well beaten
1 tsp. pure vanilla extract
1½ to 1¾ cups coarsely chopped, salted macadamia nuts
1 small recipe Midnight Chocolate Glaze (recipe follows)

Position the rack in the middle of the oven. Heat the oven to 375. Line a 10½ x 15½ x 1-inch jelly roll pan with aluminum foil and butter the foil.

In a medium bowl, thoroughly whisk together the flour, cinnamon, and salt. Set aside.

In a large bowl set over a pot of barely simmering water, slowly melt the butter and the chocolate. Stir occasionally. Remove from the heat and, using a whisk, blend the brown sugar into the mixture, stirring until melted. Gradually mix in the granulated sugar. Stir in the eggs and the vanilla. Add the dry ingredients, stirring just until combined. Do not overmix.

Spread the batter evenly in the prepared pan, smoothing it with the back of a tablespoon. Sprinkle the surface with the macadamia nuts and press them gently into the batter. Bake for 13 to 15 minutes, or until the top is set and the bar begins to pull away from the sides of the pan. Do not overbake. The squares should remain slightly moist on the inside. (Note: If the batter rises in the pan during baking, prick the bubbles gently with a fork to release the air.) Remove from the oven and let stand until almost cool.

While the bar is cooling, make the glaze. To web the bar, dip a small whisk into the glaze and squiggle it across the pan. If the glaze becomes too thick, thin it with a little very hot water. Let stand until the glaze is set.

Carefully lift the bar from the pan by grasping the foil on both sides and place it on a large cutting board. Pull down the sides of the foil and cut into 2-inch squares using a thin-bladed, sharp knife. Makes 4 dozen 2-inch squares

Storage: Store in an airtight container, layered between strips of wax paper, for up to 5 days. These cookies may be frozen.

MIDNIGHT CHOCOLATE GLAZE

Here is a glaze that has a beautiful, glossy shine and wonderful, rich chocolate flavour. While Walter thinks the best results are achieved if the glaze is applied when it is made, it can be made ahead and either refrigerated or frozen. The glaze will keep its sheen for up to eight hours, depending on your room temperature and weather conditions. When she tested the recipe, it was impossible not to lick her fingers when scraping the pot clean.

½ cup water
¼ cup granulated sugar
2 tbsp. light corn syrup
4 oz. fine-quality bittersweet chocolate, finely chopped
¼ cup strained powdered sugar
1 tbsp. Dutch-process cocoa powder
1 tsp. pure vanilla extract
¼ tsp. lemon juice
pinch of salt
1 tbsp. unsalted butter, soft

Place the water in a 3-quart heavy-bottomed saucepan. Add the granulated sugar and corn syrup, but do not stir. Cover and bring to a slow boil on medium-low heat. After 1 minute, check to see if any sugar crystals remain. If so, gently stir the mixture. Continue to cook the syrup uncovered for 3 to 4 minutes. (Large bubbles will form on the surface.)

Remove the pan from the heat and sprinkle the chopped chocolate over the syrup. Push the chocolate gently into the syrup, but do not stir. Let stand for 2 to 3 minutes, until the chocolate is melted, then stir gently with a small whisk.

When smooth, stir in the powdered sugar and cocoa powder, then blend in the vanilla, lemon juice and salt. Stir gently with the whisk until smooth, then blend in the butter. If the glaze is not pourable, add 3 or 4 teaspoons of very hot water until the desired consistency is reached.

Note: This glaze is best used immediately. Makes enough for one 10-inch Bundt cake or 9 x 13 x 2-inch coffee cake, or 16 to 18 muffins.

Storage: Leftover glaze can be refrigerated for several weeks. This glaze may be frozen. To use, reheat, adding very hot water to thin the glaze as needed.

Pro-Israel rallies signal change in U.K. Jewry

By AMIRAM BARKAT
JTA

LONDON — With a pair of massive rallies for Israel held simultaneously in London's Trafalgar Square and Manchester's Heaton Park on June 29, British Jewry may be signaling that its transformation is at hand.

Some 30,000 participants attended the public shows of support for Israel, which were inspired by New York's annual Salute to Israel parade.

Several thousand people waving Israeli and British flags marched from the Ritz Hotel to Trafalgar Square followed by dozens of carnival floats, cyclists, dancers and bands. At Trafalgar Square, an Israeli cabinet minister, Britain's secretary of state for education and Britain's chief rabbi all addressed the crowd. Israeli musicians performed between the speeches.

"I'm sure that my father, who served here as an officer in the British army, couldn't have imagined that some day tens of thousands of Jews would be waving Israeli flags here in Trafalgar Square," said Israel's minister for welfare and Diaspora affairs, Isaac Herzog, who addressed the London rally. Herzog's father, the late Israeli president Chaim Herzog, served as an intelligence officer in the British army during World War II.

Observers and critics alike said the unprecedented show of pride and self confidence at the rallies is a sign that British Jewry is shaking off its reputation for being timid and low key.

Organized by a coalition of community groups under the direction of the Board of Deputies of British Jews and the Jewish Leadership Council, the rallies were aimed at expressing solidarity with Israel at its 60th anniversary and the unity of British Jewry.

Jeremy Newmark, the Leadership Council's chief executive, said the idea for the event was born when he and several British Jewish organization executives attended last year's Salute to Israel parade in New York. Discussing the parade with representatives of the American Jewish Committee, Newmark recalled an AJC representative saying a New York-style Israel salute probably wouldn't play in Britain.

But Newmark said the New York experience changed his mind.

"Seeing this tremendous display of communal unity and affirmation of the relations between not just the Jewish community but actually America and Israel, we thought, 'Well, here is one thing that might just play in the U.K.,'" he said.

Herzog told JTA he was pleased that "Anglo Jews decided to follow the American Jews' example with a display of power and unity."

An event like the June 29 Salute to Israel could not have taken place as recently as a decade ago, Newmark said. But a political shift that has made British politics much more tolerant of minorities, lobbies and interest groups changed that, he added.

"If you want to influence political decisions in Britain, you have to operate up front as an interest group, and the community had to adjust to that," Newmark said.

Some Jews long have complained that British Jews are too timid.

Three months ago, a renowned British-born Israeli expert on anti-Semitism, Prof. Robert Wistrich, told the Jerusalem Post that Britain's Jewish leadership is taking a "softly, softly approach" in tackling the problem of anti-Semitism.

"There is a long tradition of doing things behind closed doors," Wistrich said. "It is difficult to break with tradition, but it should be broken."

Newmark believes the breakthrough is already under way.

"The caricature of Anglo-Jewry that Wistrich and others have sought to portray is no longer the case. It's history," he said. "Ask any minister in a government portfolio that relates to the Jewish community in any way if the Jewish community is shy about coming forward or making noise, if they feel they're not being treated the way they want to. You'd get a pretty clear response."

Newmark points to several high-profile media campaigns launched by the British Jewish community in the past year, including fighting an academic boycott and campaigning against the Anglican Church's "divestment intentions," as further evidence of the community's willingness to speak up.

"We now have strong support for Israel within all the mainstreams in the nation's political parties as a consequence of the work done by the 'Friends of Israel' organizations within each party," he said.

At the rally, Herzog lent support to this argument, saying he felt "decision makers in British politics as well as in the media are much more attentive today to Israel's case than several years ago."

Researchers of British Jewry say the Jewish community here has never been healthier.

Keith Kahn-Harris, a sociologist based at London's Goldsmiths College, says research suggests that in recent years, even during the height of the second intifadah, an overwhelming majority of British Jews feel settled and comfortable in their homeland.

To be sure, there are concerns about the growing threat of anti-Semitism and the virulent anti-Israel views coming from some in the media and intellectual elites. But, Kahn-Harris said in a phone interview, "The threats are manageable, and the community developed effective mechanisms to counter them."

Yaakov Wise, a researcher at the University of Manchester's Centre for Jewish Studies, said the number of British Jews is growing for the first time since the end of World War II. A large part of this growth is due to an exceptionally high birth rate among haredim, although they were largely absent from the June 29 parades.

Also underrepresented were Israelis living in England. One communal leader admitted he was "disappointed" by the "limited success" of efforts to engage Israelis in Britain.

On the edges of the Trafalgar Square rally, some pro-Palestinian Jews took part in a vigil organized by the Palestine Solidarity Campaign.

Brian Klug, a prominent left-wing activist who has criticized British Jewry's unconditional support for Israel, told JTA he did find something positive about the parades in the fact that "Jews are able to express in public their views about something that affects them, which was not the case about 30 years ago when I was growing up in London."

Nevertheless, he said, "It is not supportive of Israel or of Israelis to 'salute' the country in public while passing over the occupation in silence."

Salute to Israel organizers, however, didn't seem to care much about the voices of dissent.

"We're focused on having a good day and a few fringe voices are not going to upset anybody," Newmark said.

At the London rally, huge screens projected greetings from Israeli President Shimon Peres and London's new mayor, Boris Johnson, followed by a slew of American celebrities such as former president Bill Clinton, Billy Crystal, Michael and Kirk Douglas, Ashton Kutcher and Ben Stiller.

The events cost some $700,000 (US), and nearly 600 volunteers were required to secure the Trafalgar Square rally alone.

"We promise to do this again next time Israel celebrates its 60th anniversary," Henry Grunwald, president of the Board of Deputies, quipped when asked if the Salute to Israel would be repeated.

"I'm sure we will have such events again in the future" he later added, "but probably not on an annual basis like in New York."

Dispute with Iran sends world oil prices to record highs

The Daily Telegraph reported Monday that Iran had set up a number of civilian companies whose activities, it said, were being deliberately concealed from the United Nations nuclear inspection teams.

"The companies, based on the outskirts of Tehran, are working on constructing components for the advanced P2 gas centrifuge, which can enrich uranium to weapons grade two to three times faster than conventional P1 centrifuges," the report said, adding that the firms were set up by Iran's Revolutionary Guard, which oversees Iran's nuclear program.

Nuclear experts were quoted as saying the centrifuges are highly sophisticated devices, mainly used in the manufacture of atomic weapons.

"The work is aimed at developing the blueprint provided by Dr. A.Q. Khan, the 'father' of Pakistan's nuclear bomb, who sold Iran details of how to build atom bombs in the early 1990s," the newspaper said.

The offer of trade and other incentives proposed by the world powers was presented last month by European Union foreign policy chief Javier Solana to Iran's chief nuclear negotiator Saeed Jalili. Iran has put forward its own bundle of proposals aimed at resolving the dispute and has said it was encouraged by common points between the two separate packages.

Ahmadinejad said Iran was ready to discuss its nuclear ambitions, but that the "language of threat" was futile. "We are ready to discuss common subjects of the two packages. Talks should be held in a fair and just atmosphere," he said.

The nuclear dispute with Iran has raised fears of a military confrontation and helped to send world oil prices to record highs. Ahmadinejad dismissed talk of military action.

"Let alone America and Israel, even if hundreds of countries came together, they would not dare to attack Iran," he declared.

Arab attack in Jerusalem leaves 3 dead, dozens injured

By ROY EITAN
JTA

JERUSALEM – The deadly terrorist attack by an Arab bulldozer driver on a crowded street July 2 raised questions anew about how Israeli authorities can protect against attacks by lone assailants from eastern Jerusalem.

At least three people were killed and dozens injured in the noontime attack on Jaffa Road.

Husam Duwayat, a 30-year-old father of two from eastern Jerusalem, plowed through traffic on one of the busiest streets in the Israeli capital, overturning a commuter bus, crushing cars and sending pedestrians in a mad rush for safety.

"It was terrible, like nothing you could imagine," a bus passenger who gave her name as Bat-El told Israel Radio.

Policemen and an armed civilian ended the rampage by scrambling aboard the 20-ton bulldozer and shooting Duwayat at point-blank range. The brutal scene was captured on film and broadcast around the world.

There was no immediate claim of responsibility for the rampage, prompting speculation that Duwayat, who had been working at a construction site nearby, turned violent spontaneously. Police said he had a criminal record but no known terrorist ties.

It was the second attack in Jerusalem by a lone Arab assailant from eastern Jerusalem in four months. The previous attack was a shooting spree at a Jerusalem yeshiva in March, which left eight students dead.

This attack renewed debate in Israel over how to handle Palestinians from eastern Jerusalem, who carry Israeli identity cards and may travel freely around the Jewish state.

Israel's West Bank security fence and regular IDF counterterrorist operations and intelligence gathering in Palestinian-populated territories have dramatically reduced terrorist attacks against Israelis from their highs earlier this decade, during the second intifadah.

Such security measures, however, provide little defense against an attack like this, in which an Arab from an area west of the security fence apparently acting alone perpetrated a deadly attack using relatively unsophisticated weaponry.

The March attack at the Mercaz HaRav yeshiva in Jerusalem bore the same hallmarks.

"The terrorists never tire of thinking up original ways to strike," said Jerusalem Mayor Uri Lupolianski. "It's no accident they choose Jerusalem. This is the heart of the State of Israel, of the Jewish people."

After the bulldozer attack, Israeli Industry and Trade Minister Eli Yishai called for the terrorist's house in the Sur Bacher neighbourhood of Jerusalem to be demolished – a punitive measure commonly used in the West Bank and Gaza until recently, when it was discontinued amid criticism by civil liberties groups.

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert ordered his ministers and legal advisers to assess the legal implications of taking such action, promising an answer by day's end.

Pending a decision, police raided the house in search of clues as to Duwayat's motives.

As they left, a female relative ululated from a balcony to watching journalists.

"Husam's a martyr!" she shouted. "May God have mercy on his soul."

The attack came as Olmert struggled to preserve a two-week-old ceasefire with Hamas in the Gaza Strip. The ceasefire has been interrupted multiple times by rockets and shelling from Gaza.

Islamic Jihad, which has claimed responsibility for some of that rocket fire from Gaza, praised Duwayat's attack.

"The Jerusalem Brigades bless the heroic operation in Jerusalem as the natural reaction to the crimes of the occupation," the group said, according to reports.

In Gaza, Hamas spokesman Sami Abu Zuhri said he did not expect the Jerusalem attack to "influence the Gaza calm."

"There is a continued aggression against our people in the West Bank and Jerusalem, and so it is natural that our people there will respond to such aggression," he said.

From Washington, President Bush telephoned Olmert "and expressed his condolences to the Israeli people over today's murderous terrorist attack," the Prime Minister's Office said.

The Fatah-led Palestinian Authority also issued a condemnation of the attack.

"Whoever carried this out wants to hurt the peace process, and we urge the Israeli side not to be dragged down by those who want this to happen," said Tayeb Andel Rahim, an aide to P.A. President Mahmoud Abbas.

The off-duty Israeli soldier who ended the bulldozer rampage in Jerusalem is avoiding the limelight.

Israeli commentators have dubbed him a hero, but the 20-year-old army conscript who grabbed a security guard's pistol and shot dead Husam Duwayat has refused to take credit.

Television and newspaper reports carried dramatic pictures of the soldier astride Duwayat's bulldozer but with his face obscured, in deference to a court gag order issued at his request. The soldier's name was similarly barred from publication.

In a brief statement, the soldier said he acted "in accordance to the precept of 'don't stand by your brother's blood', even at the risk of getting hurt."

He also said he had been inspired by his brother-in-law, David Shapira, an army officer who stormed into Jerusalem's Mercaz HaRav Yeshiva as a Palestinian gunned down students there in March, shooting the assailant dead.

According to media reports, the soldier recently enlisted in the Egoz commando regiment having spent two years contesting an army decision not to draft him. He had been blacklisted for taking part in protests against Israel's 2005 withdrawal from the Gaza Strip.

A resident of Jerusalem, the soldier graduated from a West Bank yeshiva.

Israel Briefs

Barak meets Iraqi president

Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak met the president of Iraq on the sidelines of a conference in Greece last week. Barak and Jalal Talabani shook hands and briefly exchanged pleasantries during the Socialist International outside Athens. They were introduced by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, who also spoke separately with Barak, a former Israeli prime minister. Since U.S.-led forces toppled Saddam Hussein in 2003, Israeli leaders have called on the new Iraqi regime to recognize the Jewish state. But Baghdad has been cool to the overtures pending a resolution to Israeli-Palestinian peace efforts. Several members of the Iraqi parliament called on Talabani on July 4 to apologize for the handshake with Barak.

MK visits banned

Israel broadened a ban on visiting enemy states to include Knesset members, who previously enjoyed exemption. A bill preventing any Israeli who visits hostile Arab countries or Iran from being elected to parliament was ratified Monday in second and third readings. The law would allow for serving Knesset members who violate it to be disqualified as lawmakers. The legislation targeted Israeli-Arab lawmakers who have long raised hackles in the Jewish state by travelling to countries such as Lebanon and Syria, often in shows of solidarity.

Report on MIA Ron Arad

Israel is waiting for a report from Hezbollah regarding the group's efforts to locate missing Israeli Air Force navigator Ron Arad, defence officials said July 4. In the report, Hezbollah is expected to say that it did not manage to locate Arad, who was shot down near Sidon in 1986, but concludes that the navigator died in Lebanon more than a decade ago. The report will be given to Ofer Dekel, the Israeli official charged with negotiating the release of Israeli soldiers held by Hezbollah and Hamas, as part of the United Nations-brokered deal for the release of Ehud Goldwasser and Eldad Regev who were abducted in a cross-border raid by Hezbollah on July 12, 2006.

New attack, no swap talks

Hamas is suspending negotiations over the release of abducted soldier Gilad Schalit due to Israel's closure of Gaza Strip crossings, the London-based Al-Hayyat quoted a senior group official as saying July 4. Israel closed its commercial crossings to Gaza on July 4, a day after a Qassam rocket fired from the coastal territory struck near the western Negev town of Sderot. It was the sixth incident of rocket fire since a fragile Egyptian-brokered ceasefire went into effect June 19. Since then, the army says 11 rockets and mortars have been fired toward Israel.

WUJS to leave Arad

The WUJS Institute adult study program is moving from its longtime home in Arad to Jerusalem and Tel Aviv. The institute, a study-internship program that since 2006 has been under the auspices of Hadassah, the Women's Zionist Organization, will open in the new locations on Sept. 1. The 50 students registered for the fall semester have agreed to participate at the new sites. The move was precipitated by a Jewish Agency announcement that it would close the absorption center in Arad, a southern Israeli city 18 miles from Beer Sheva. The centre has provided housing and classroom space for the program for 50 years.

Libel lawsuit denied

An Israeli court rejected a libel suit against a pro-Palestinian documentary about the battle of Jenin. Petach Tikvah District Court turned down the suit filed by five Israeli veterans of the 2002 fighting in the West Bank town against Mohammed Bakri, the director of the film Jenin, Jenin. The court found that while the film was defamatory, the plaintiffs could not sue Bakri, because they had not been singled out in the film. Palestinian propagandists alleged that Jenin was the site of deliberate massacres, turning the town into a symbol abroad of Israeli depredation.

Zimbabwe Jews hold out

By MOIRA SCHNEIDER
JTA

CAPE TOWN, South Africa – With Zimbabwe in the throes of an economic and political crisis, the country's tiny Jewish community is holding steady.

The president of a synagogue in the city of Bulawayo says Zimbabwe's approximately 320 Jews have been left largely unharmed by the violence surrounding last week's presidential election that drove opposition candidate Morgan Tsvangirai from the race.

Observers outside the country have called the vote, in which President Robert Mugabe was re-elected, a sham.

Hylton Solomon, the 52-year-old president of the Bulawayo Hebrew Congregation, says the Jews of Zimbabwe have become accustomed to the grim situation in their country.

"Over the years, everybody has been so disappointed," he told JTA. "It's just another day. They just accept it. The Jews, certainly in Bulawayo, I don't believe feel threatened, and I don't think they ever have."

Though they have been spared the violence, Zimbabwe's Jews have been hit hard by the economic crisis. The country has been beset by electricity, food, water and fuel shortages.

Jewish aid officials assisting the community say, however, that few Zimbabwe Jews intend to leave.

It's a community that has dwindled to 320 from a high of about 7,500 in the 1970s, when the country was called Rhodesia and ruled by a white minority.

The Jews are split between the capital of Harare and Bulawayo, Zimbabwe's second-largest city. Two Jewish day schools, one in each city, have mostly non-Jewish students. The Ashkenazi and Sephardi synagogues in Harare have combined their services, and there is one rabbi in the country, David Alima of Bulawayo.

Mervyn Smith, the president of the African Jewish Congress – an initiative of the South African Jewish Board of Deputies to attend to the needs of far-flung Jewish communities in sub-Saharan Africa – said he sensed a mood of resignation among Zimbabwe's Jews on a recent visit.

"There isn't a fear of physical danger, but there's almost despair that the economy and the whole situation can ever right itself," Smith said.

The country is suffering from skyrocketing inflation estimated at 20 to 30 per cent per week. Last week, it took 40 billion Zimbabwe dollars to equal $1.

Many Jews have seen their savings totally eroded.

"People are depressed, but what is really having an impact on everyone is the collapse of the economy," said one community member who asked to remain anonymous. "Our money is worthless."

Most Zimbabwe Jews are elderly; just six Jewish children live in the country. Of the 110 Jews in Bulawayo, 26 live in Zimbabwe's only Jewish old-age home, the Savyon Lodge.

The economic crisis has hit them particularly hard.

"Many were dependent on their savings and pensions; they thought that they could live with dignity and be independent to the end of their days," said one community member. "That is not possible. Things are either unavailable or unaffordable."

> 'As a community we carry on'

The executive director of the African Jewish Congress, Rabbi Moshe Silberhaft, says he spends 90 per cent of his time on issues relating to the Zimbabwean Jewish community.

"We provide everything from medication to rent to basic foodstuffs," Silberhaft said. "Nothing is affordable, nothing is available. We send water purification tablets because the water is no longer safe to drink.

"The reality is that there's almost nothing on the ground – there's no toilet paper, cotton, wool, medication," he said.

Silberhaft visited Zimbabwe in late May and said the Jews in the country were prepared to carry on. At his monthly distribution of essentials, the rabbi said he "watched proud Jewish people that used to be in the category of 'haves' queuing for salt, toilet paper and jam."

Silberhaft recently went to London to raise awareness of the crisis and raise money for the African Jewish Congress' Zimbabwe fund.

Though a June 13 report in the London Jewish Chronicle said the Jewish Agency for Israel was planning a secret emergency airlift of the country's remaining Jews, Silberhaft insists there are no such plans.

"I met with Zeev Bielski [the agency's chairman], and there's absolutely no evacuation plan whatsoever," Silberhaft said. "What the Jewish Agency and we say is, if you want to leave, as long as there are commercial airlines, why wait for an evacuation? Leave now and we will take care of you."

One community member said that despite constant calls for them to leave by panicked family members abroad, most Jews in Zimbabwe do not feel the need to run.

"As a community we carry on without any interference and celebrate all the festivals," she said. "I don't feel any urgency to leave."

"The situation is dire, not unsafe," said another Zimbabwe Jew who spoke to JTA on condition of anonymity. "No one that I know has been harmed in any way."

She added, "I feel safer here than in Johannesburg."

Many of Zimbabwe's non-elderly Jews regularly commute to neighbouring South Africa.

"The younger people like me have homes in South Africa," said Solomon, the synagogue president. "I often question why I'm not more positive in making a plan to move, but I don't know whether South Africa is the place to move to, quite honestly. I'm still making a bit of a living here and I have the best of both worlds."

Solomon says he visits Cape Town every four to six weeks for about 10 days to see family and go to movies and restaurants.

"It's just a bit of a bittersweet sort of life," he said.

Last July, Solomon was jailed for a night for violating Zimbabwe's price controls by overcharging on a box of spaghetti.

With everything that has happened, however, Solomon sounds a note of optimism.

"Something positive is going to come out of all this," he said. "The economic situation just cannot carry on like this anymore."

1948...They Were There

Mayer survived assault on Latrun in War of Independence

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

Winnipegger Rubin Mayer was one of the lucky ones.

In the early morning hours of May 25, 1948, he was one of 450 men in the crack 32nd Battalion of the new Israeli army's Alexandroni Brigade charged with storming the police station at Latrun, which was heavily defended by Jordanian soldiers.

Latrun was an important objective because it overlooked the road to Jerusalem, which was at that time under siege by Arab forces and virtually cut off from help.

The Israeli force (which also included 1,650 men from the 7th Battalion of the 7th Brigade) was outnumbered and outgunned and had to charge up a hill with no cover in sight. By the end of the day, Mayer recalls, 400 of his comrades were dead and he was badly wounded.

Mayer remembers Latrun as a "huge waste of Israeli manpower.

"Men were taken right off the boats at Haifa, put into trucks and sent right into battle with little or no training," he says. "Many of them died without ever seeing Israel."

Mayer was bending over to pick up a couple of his fallen fellow soldiers when he was hit by eight bullets. He was hit in the left buttock (he says he still has the scar) and leg. He was evacuated to Beilinson Hospital in Petach Tikva, where a young Canadian surgeon volunteering in Israel was able to save his leg. Mayer spent almost a year in hospital recovering.

"I had to fight off a lot of infections," he recalls, "but I had a strong will to survive."

That strong urge to live had also helped Mayer survive the Holocaust.

He was born in northern Romania in the Bessarabia area in 1929. "I had an uncle who operated a resort in Hungary just across the border," he says. "My two sisters and I would take turns spending the summer there. It was my luck that I was spending the summer of 1940 there."

He was caught in a round-up of Jews in the area and shipped off to Auschwitz. Fortunately, he was big for an 11-year-old and was put to work rather than being sentenced to death. While his memory is a little hazy, he thinks he was in Auschwitz for about six months before he saw his opportunity to escape.

"There were garbage cans near the gate," he recalls. "I noticed a hole under the gate near the garbage cans. I crawled under and starting running. A guard saw me and started shooting, but I was quick enough to get away. I ran into the bushes."

Mayer was also fortunate that a farm family with whom he sought refuge near Auschwitz was willing to hide him. "I went into the barn," he says. "A little girl saw me and told her parents. They were nice people. They took me in and hid me in the attic for a few months."

Mayer then joined the Partisans. "I was ready to fight, and die, if necessary, for the Jewish People," he recalls. "I was also really mad."

In addition, he adds, "I was a strong kid. I was able to do hard work."

He had to learn Polish quickly.

He recounts that the Partisans he fought with had old long rifles from the Turks that didn't always work.

After the war, he returned to his family in Romania and he joined the Labour Zionist youth movement Dror Habonim. In 1946, the now young chalutz (pioneer) was taken by truck to the Italian port, Fiume, and smuggled into Israel.

"We were brought to Israel in a fishing boat with shelves down below to sleep on," he says. "We weren't allowed on deck during the day because the Haganah [pre-Israel militia] men didn't want the British to see us. We were landed at Yafo."

He was housed at a kibbutz in the north where he worked with the cows half-days and studied Hebrew the rest of the time. After a time, he joined the Haganah and was sent to the northern border.

"At first, we had one rifle for every three soldiers," he says. "Eventually, we received new supplies of rifles from Germany."

The Israeli force was outnumbered and outgunned and had to charge up a hill with no cover in sight

His wounds at Latrun were not his only war injuries. On another occasion, a bullet grazed the side of his head.

There was yet another occasion, he recalls, when he turned to a friend and fellow soldier next to him and asked for some bullets. When the friend didn't answer, he began to get angry. Then he realized that the other soldier was dead, shot through the head.

After recovering from the wounds he received at Latrun, he moved to the Galilee and later to Haifa. He married Clara, and they started a family. He found a job with Egged as a conductor and bus driver, and worked as a chauffeur and a self-employed trucker.

"I bought an old English army truck and drove the Haifa-Afula route as a private contractor," he says. "I worked long hours. One day, the truck died. I couldn't afford to fix it, so I left it by the side of the road."

The family came to Winnipeg in 1960. "We wanted to raise our children in a more peaceful environment," he says. "Also, my sisters and their husbands and my parents were living here."

His brother-in-law owned a service station in south Winnipeg. Mayer worked for his brother-in-law at first, driving tow trucks in the winter and often putting in 12-hour days. After five years, he applied for and was hired by Winnipeg Transit as a bus driver.

"I was hired right away because they could see by the way I sat in the driver's seat and handled the wheel that I knew what I was doing," he says. "I liked the fact that I would be wearing a uniform and not have to get dirty."

He retired 14 years ago.

In his leisure time, Rubin Mayer is an artist. He works with ceramic and coloured glass pieces, he paints and he is a sculptor. He makes Jewish figures.

He and Clara have three children, seven grandchildren and one great-grandchild.

Why I left the Old Country

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

In 1942 the YIVO Institute for Jewish Research, which had only recently relocated from Vilna to New York City, sponsored a contest for the best autobiography by a Jewish immigrant on the theme Why I Left the Old Country and What I Have Accomplished in America.

More than 200 autobiographical essays were submitted, written mostly in Yiddish and mostly by men, detailing many of the concerns of Jewish immigrants both in Europe and in America. Max Weinreich, YIVO's director and guiding light, corresponded personally with many of the writers, persuading them of the historical importance of their works and requesting elaboration. YIVO gave out 25 prizes and preserved the essays in its archives.

Now, some 65 years later, a collection of these essays has been published as My Future Is in America: Autobiographies of Eastern European Jewish Immigrants, edited and translated by Jocelyn Cohen and Daniel Soyer (New York University Press). I found them a pleasure to read.

Bertha (Brukhe) Fox, who came from Skvira, Ukraine, to New York in 1922, wrote about her life in an essay titled The Movies Pale in Comparison. The reason she left the Old Country? "Pogroms, pogroms without end," she explained. "The pogromists always burst into the houses, took whatever there was, and left. Before we could recover, it started all over."

Jews had "drowned in pools of blood" during the Revolution, were swollen with hunger in its aftermath, then had to contend with the rampaging anti-Semitic hordes. They sometimes gathered together with their neighbours, up to 100 or more in a single house. Like many, Fox went out of her mind with fear.

"One time, when the hooligans came to break down the doors of our house, I moved quickly to open up, to avert their fury. One of them aimed his rifle at me and stuck it against my chest. Out of terror, I broke into hysterical laughter. Taken aback, he lowered the rifle. When the other one asked him, 'So, what are you waiting for?' he answered, 'I can't shoot a crazy person.'"

Some of the essays record heartbreaking childhoods of deprivation, poverty and hard times. Families struggled with failing businesses, moved from one impoverished village to the next, and were sometime preyed upon by larcenous scoundrels. Still, many were loathe to travel to America, considering it a "treif" land and a refuge of criminals, especially in the 1880s, 1890s and early 1900s.

Minnie Goldstein, who travelled with her family from Warsaw to Rhode Island in 1894, related that her father, a poor businessman, was clandestinely teaching himself English but kept the reason a secret. When he finally told her mother that he wanted to go to America, she was aghast. "Who goes to America anyway? Those who run away from home because of some sort of crime or those who are banished there by the government. What does someone like you have to do with America?"

When he left despite her wishes, she was ashamed and wouldn't tell people where he had gone. Goldstein then described a gruelling ocean crossing four years later as her mother brought her to New York to be reunited with their father and husband.

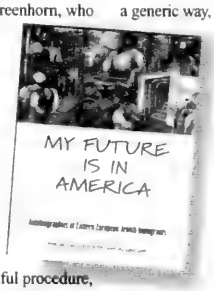
Rose Silverman, who wrote the title essay, received a harsh slap from her father the first time she told him "my future is in America." But eventually he came to realize that she was right, even though parting with her broke his heart. Six weeks before her planned departure, he grew sick. "See to it, my child, that you are a respectable person in America," he told her from his sickbed. The next day he died. Silverman travelled from Berdichev to New York in 1913.

Many of the essayists were involved in the socialist movement, both in Russia and in America; several served in the czar's army, but not could afford the bribes necessary to be assigned to a Jewish unit or avoid a difficult military posting. Others were steeped in Gemara and an observant life, which they intended to continue in the new land. Not all were true to their religious ideals.

Aaron Domnitz, who came from Romanovo, Belarus, to Baltimore in 1906, was amazed at the reception he received at Ellis Island, where a Yiddish-speaking security official asked him how he planned to make a living: he would be a Hebrew teacher, he replied.

"They laughed at me. 'Go, go,' they said, 'you'll be a great rebbe in America,' and pushed me aside. I looked around. Here I am on the other side of the railing, among those who have been let in. But why did they laugh at me? It's nothing. People are good-natured here and they were joking. I liked the reception."

Several essayists discuss the situation of the greenhorn, who upon landing may have already been in debt for a ship's ticket sent to him from his "landsleit" relatives and friends, and paid for on the instalment plan. Typically, his friends would take him to the "right" men's shops and outfit him in a new suit, hat and shoes. "Everything had to be American," Domnitz wrote. "Clothes from home were defective, even if they were of good quality and well sewn. Going to the stores with the greenhorn on Canal Street was a joyful procedure, like a Jew back home picking out an esrog."



Many studied English at night schools such as the Educational Alliance, whose manager helped them apply for citizenship and persuaded some of them to lop off the extraneous "off's" and "ski's" and otherwise Americanize their surnames.

Although many soon realized that the streets of America were not paved with gold, there is at least one satisfying anecdote here of a greenhorn quickly making good.

Chaim Kusnetz's father, a newly arrived iron worker, was given a chance to create a fancy and complicated gate that none of the more experienced workers could do. The result was worthy of exhibition in a gallery, and Kusnetz's father was soon promoted to foreman.

No less satisfying was Rose Schoenfeld's decisive action after waiting five years for her husband either to return from America or send for her and their five children. Leaving the children with a beloved cousin, she travelled across the ocean and showed up "as if I had fallen from the sky. Everyone in the house was so surprised to see me that they could not say a word. My husband started to faint from the surprise." Five months later, the cousin brought over the five children and the family was reunited in America.

At times immensely gripping, these charming and realistic tales describe not only the lives of the writers and their families but, in a generic way, the lives of our own immigrant ancestors as well.

Every Family Has a Story: Tales from the Pages of Avotaynu. Edited by Gary Mokotoff.

Several dozen genealogical adventure stories are in this collection, straight from the pages of Avotaynu, the international journal of Jewish genealogy. At their best, these tales by many authors combine the intrigue of a detective story by Arthur Conan Doyle with the vividness of fiction by Isaac Bashevis Singer.

My favourite is Max, by Avotaynu publisher Gary Mokotoff, who comes across as a close cousin to Sherlock Holmes. It begins when a woman named Marilyn calls him after reading an article about him, wanting to know if he is related to a certain Maximilian Mokotowski. Mokotoff soon informs her that she has a living brother she knew nothing about.

Later, when a man named Larry writes to ask him if they might be related, Mokotoff replies: "Are we related? Your name is Lawrence Mokotoff. You were born on June 18, 1934. Your father's name was Max Mokotoff and your mother's name was Mary Sears. I have been looking for you for 15 years. Oh yes, you have a half sister and half brother who live in the New York City area." Larry, needless to say, is dumbfounded.

Snooping around graveyards? Following a paper trail? Digging through musty archives? Who knew that this material could be woven into such a gripping form of Jewish literature? You don't have to be a genealogist to enjoy these tales of family-tree sleuthery – but it helps

Grooving for the Jewish National Fund

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Stevie Wonder's song I Wish funkily blasted out of a warehouse into the parking lot of an industrial building after business hours in North York last month.

Youth blaring a radio while they worked? Not hardly. Instead, band leaders from some of the city's most renowned wedding and special occasion groups were practising, tightening up their chops in advance of Band-Tastic – a charity concert and dance party with proceeds going to the Jewish National Fund (JNF) – on July 15, at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue.

Not that they needed much practice, mind you. With decades of experience among them, the songs flowed as if they had all just worked together on a simchah the night before.

Larry Rodness, organizer of Band-Tastic, told the Canadian Jewish News the time was right for him and his musical colleagues and friends to give back to the community that had supported their careers all these years.

Rodness said the idea sprang from an impromptu conversation he had with another bandleader he met at a local mall recently.

"We thought, we've all subbed for each other over the years and wouldn't it be fun to perform for the community … for charity. It's time to give back," he said. "We all thought it was a great idea. The job was to find an organization interested in it. I've worked with the JNF on their Negev dinners for years, so I approached them and they said, 'OK.'"

Band leaders Larry Rodness on guitar, Saul Helman on drums and Kenny Simon on bass guitar rehearse for the charity concert and dance party Band-Tastic on July 15. [Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf photo]

Rodness added that the more than 14 bandleaders/musicians and guest singers are volunteering for the event with all proceeds going to the JNF.

For the past few weeks, the musicians have gotten together in the evenings to choose the songs they'll be playing for their audience and to rehearse.

Each bandleader came to the table with 10 "most favourite" songs in the hopes of getting people dancing up a storm, Rodness said.

"Everybody's going to get a chance to do their music. We've heard people are longing for a good dance gig," he said. And he's aiming to please.

Just don't expect certain tunes to be played during the five-hour, 50- to 60-song show.

Asked what songs guests can forget about hearing, the other band leaders piped up.

"We have a fee scale for often repeated songs," quipped Robin Langdon, a singer whose powerful vocals have been heard on stages across the city for years.

Other bandleaders quickly nodded their heads, shouting out songs they hope to never play again. But the consensus was that the familiar "whoa whoa whoa" whine of that staple lounge-singer, lovelorn ode Feelings will definitely not be heard next week.

In addition to the bands, a cappella group E.Q. will also perform and a charity auction will be held.

LALLY CADEAU WINS DORA AWARD FOR HER PERFORMANCE IN ROSE

Actor Lally Cadeau, who played the title role in the Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company's production of Rose, has won a Dora Award for Outstanding Performance by a Female in a Principal Role. A one-woman show, the play focused on the life of a Holocaust survivor and was performed at the St. Lawrence Centre's Jane Mallet Theatre in March. Ted Dykstra also won a Dora for his performance in the musical Fire, and Dancap earned a feather in its cap with a Dora for best outstanding touring production for The Drowsy Chaperone.

* * *

Names in the News: Seymour Mayne, poet and Ottawa professor, recently returned from a lecture tour in Argentina on the occasion of the launching of Relojos: Sonetos de una palabra, a collection of his writings in Spanish translation. Mayne, a professor of creative writing and co-ordinator of the Vered Jewish Canadian Studies Program at the University of Ottawa, met with various academic, community, literary and religious figures in the Jewish community of Argentina.

A proponent of a poetic form called the "word sonnet," his poetic output includes Killing Time, The Song of Moses, Carbon Filter, Light Industry, Hail, Ricochet, Overheard, September Rain and A Dream of Birds. Mayne has also written a short memoir that is scheduled for publication in this month's edition of the journal Midstream.

* * *

Names in the News II: Eduardo Propper de Callejón, the maternal grandfather of British-born actor Helena Bonham Carter, was recently named a Righteous Gentile by Israel's Yad Vashem Holocaust Museum. A wartime Spanish secretary in Bordeaux in 1940, Propper de Callejon, who was of half Spanish and half Jewish ancestry, issued thousands of visas to refugees escaping Nazi-occupied France for Spain and Portugal. The family is also genealogically connected to the Rothschilds and the Fould-Springers, a French banking family. Bonham Carter's many films include Room with a View, The Wings of the Dove and Sweeney Todd.

Joan Rivers revels in being politically incorrect

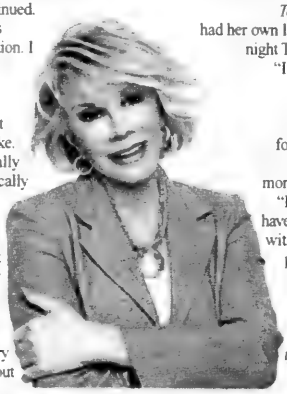
By RON PASCOE AND PAUL TELNER
Special to The CJN

Joan Rivers, one of our time's most unconventional comedians, is returning to Montreal for the Just For Laughs comedy festival.

The irreverent Rivers hosts the festival's Videotron Just for Laughs Gala on July 16.

When the Canadian Jewish News got on the phone with Rivers from her New York apartment, she immediately asked, "So what do you want to know?"

Has she been outspoken from day one?, we asked. "Probably not," Rivers replied. "I think most of us that go into comedy go into it because we were always thinking rather than saying what we thought was funny," she continued.



"In high school, I was not the class clown. I was the class wit. Big distinction. I never put the lampshade on my head, but I made the joke about Moby Dick."

Rivers thinks comedy is the last bastion of being able to say what you like. "Absolutely everything is so politically correct nowadays. My act is so politically incorrect," she said.

"It has to be, please! If it's funny, people laugh. If they don't laugh, then perhaps you've gone too far. I do that at least twice in my act every night. I say to the audience, 'Too far, eh?'"

Along with longtime fans, college students often populate her shows, in part because her act is not about memory lane. "People interview me and ask about Johnny Carson. Who cares – you know? I'm talking about being green, old, sex, death, the absolute fallout from 9-11, and terrorists being hideous and ugly – all current," Rivers said.

After gaining much notoriety from a 1965 appearance on The Tonight Show with Johnny Carson, among other gigs at the time, she wrote for the hidden-camera show Candid Camera. She said she found writing for Just For Laughs Gags, also a hidden-camera show, difficult.

"For everyone that you see that gets hysterical or funny, you really have 15 hours of people going, 'Oh, okay,' and walking away.

"I did a thing once where I was shoplifting and people would just watch me. Lily Tomlin was on the show with me, and she couldn't take it anymore, she was so bored."

In the 1980s, Rivers was the first permanent guest host of The Tonight Show; appeared on Saturday Night Live and had her own late-night show on Fox, but she doesn't watch late-night TV anymore.

"I don't tune into Leno or Letterman. Those shows have become so commercial. I have yet to see someone come out that isn't pushing something," she said. "Wouldn't it be nice if someone came on for no reason other than just wanting to be there?"

After having celebrated her 75th birthday last month, Rivers continues to have a full schedule.

"I have a play in Edinburgh that will go to London. I have two books coming out. I have a tour going around with my comedy act. I have my jewelry company. I perform Wednesday nights at [the New York club] The Cutting Room," she said.

"I'm in a series called Z Rock coming to IFC [Independent Film Channel], doing a TV pilot, offered another game show and will be on Celebrity Apprentice."

She admits that she's never seen Celebrity Apprentice, Donald Trump's reality TV show. "They are going to send me tapes."

Rivers and her daughter, Melissa, have worked together as co-hosts of endless red-carpet events, starting in 1996 for the TV channel E! Entertainment, then for the TV Guide Channel and next for AOL. "It's a lot of fun to work with your daughter. She's the only one that I'm happy who does better than I do," Rivers said.

"I'm very competitive. I'm not sitting back and passing the mantle. You're going to have to rip it from my shoulders."

She expressed her admiration for the comedian George Carlin, who died recently. "I knew George, and he had a great life. They are replaying all his specials. A star for 40 to 50 years. He worked the week before died," she said.

"How nice not to be forgotten, to die with your boots on? I think that's exactly how he wanted it. He left a great legacy for being a respected comedian among his peers. He was great."

One of Rivers' mainstays is talking about celebrities she can't stand. "Russell Crowe is very, very rude," she said. Tommy Lee Jones, too. Diane Keaton is rude and weird. She's always dressing in a Charlie Chaplin outfit. I have pictures of her on the red carpet with white gloves. They're like clown gloves."

She doesn't hate everyone. In fact, she thinks Rosie O'Donnell is brilliant, finds Nicole Kidman charming, adores Howard Stern, who often has Rivers on as a guest, and speaks highly of her fellow Just For Laughs guest Kathy Griffin.

Just For Laughs has expanded to include shows in Toronto from July 23 to 27, including galas hosted by Martin Short (July 24), Jason Alexander (25) and Jimmy Fallon (27). In Montreal, the festival runs from July 8 to 20 and includes a special event featuring South Park creators Matt Stone and Trey Parker, and Canadians Jeremy Hotz and Seth Rogen.

The hosts of the signature gala series at St-Denis Theatre include Kathy Griffin (July 17), Craig Ferguson (18), Jeremy Piven (18) and Jimmy Fallon (19). For tickets, visit hahaha.com.

Artist trades IT career for paintbrush and beeswax

By RITA POLIAKOV
CJN Intern

Nava Waxman's studio is filled with everything but her paintings.

Pieces of copper in every shape, form and texture spill out over her desk. A can of beeswax, white and solid, sits in the corner and, on the other side of the tiny room, hangs a thin string, almost like a clothesline. Instead of clothes, it holds sketches, side by side in chronological order.

"Drawings are my passion. I do drawings in sequence," she said.

Waxman turns her drawings into paintings using ink, oil paint, pieces of copper and beeswax.

"I started working with copper before beeswax," she said.

Ever since her father-in-law brought a bag of junk home, Waxman has been scouring garage sales for copper pieces.

It was only during an encaustic course (the process of burning in colours) that she realized the two materials fit together.

"To be honest, when I took the encaustic course, I started using copper in class. Once I layered the beeswax, I was almost crying – it looked like they were meant to be," she said.

When I visited Waxman's studio, most of her paintings had been moved to the Blue Dot Gallery, where she had her first solo show last month. The few that were left in her studio were in various stages of creation.

The paintings I saw there were painted with similar earth tones. Smoky reds and blues dominated, and the images included barren trees, electric wires, hills and shaky-looking ladders.

"I guess I feel comfortable in an environment that looks raw," she said, staring at the softly sloping hill in a painting behind her. "Without it, nothing would work. I want to make a really natural piece of land, a simple hill, a simple valley. That's where I feel comfortable."

Born in Israel, Waxman, 34, used to work in information technology. She moved to Canada in 2003 to pursue a career in art.

"It was something I was wishing and dreaming about all my life. I was always creative. I did art in my spare time," she said. "I knew that in order to pursue my dream, I needed to make a radical change. Moving to Canada was the best choice."

In Toronto, Waxman could do little else but paint.

"When I moved to Canada, I was pretty much alone. I had no friends, no family. I didn't work. I had so much spare time. I woke up, took the subway to the art supply store, got home and sat and worked," she said.

It didn't take long for her paintings to sell.

"The community here in Toronto is very embracing," she said. "My paintings sell fast – nothing stays for a long time. It took me a long time to do a solo show. When I did… people knew me, they were waiting for me."

Waxman's show at the Blue Dot attracted about 180 people for the opening. By the second-last day of the show, three-quarters of the paintings were sold.

Deenah Dunkelman Mollin, her public relations representative and friend, isn't surprised by Waxman's success.

"I saw her work and I wanted to cry. It moved me. There's so much meaning in every square inch," she said.

When describing her paintings, Waxman was hesitant to analyze them.

"I feel that the people who buy my paintings try to build their own meaning," she said. "I don't think they're really urged to know what it means to me. The people who are drawn to my paintings are people who like the abstract."

While Waxman is a full-time artist, she doesn't spend all her time bent over her canvas.

"People have the impression that an artist has dramatic moments when lightning strikes and they are suddenly inspired. It is not that way for me. I find myself constantly reading, writing, sketching, pondering the most fleeting to the deepest of thoughts," she said.

"Being a constant observer of life, immersing myself in nature, taking photos, collecting found objects and then integrating aspects of these elements into my work. This is all inspiring to me."

Waxman is preparing for her second solo show in October. In the meantime, she's developing an international clientele.

"I'm sending paintings to England, the U.S., Vancouver, Israel. It's amazing," she said.

Israeli artists show works at Toronto outdoor exhibit

Two Israeli artists, Rachel Goldraich and Moshiko Botser, are participating in this year's Toronto Outdoor Art Exhibit at Nathan Phillips Square.

Goldraich was born in Zimbabwe and moved to Israel as a child. She graduated with a degree in art from Haifa University and envisioned her future as a painter.

However, her path was altered when she attended a workshop put on by an American lampworker, where she was taught the basics of creating small sculptures out of borosilicate glass.

"I had collected these as a child, and the realization that I could actually make them fascinated me," Goldraich said.

After many hours of practice and a lot of shattered glass, she began making sculptures worthy of sale.

During a workshop years later, Goldraich learned to work with soda glass and thus opened up the world of glass beads for herself.

"I was completely addicted. The medium of hot glass, the flame, and the magic of transforming a solid glass rod into a miniature piece of art," she said.

When asked about presenting her art to more than 100,000 people in three days, Goldraich admitted she is panicky and overwhelmed, however, she added that she is also excited and honoured.

Moshiko Botser's reaction to the large number of visitors was slightly different.

"I hope to be exposed and find an art dealer and galleries in Canada," he said.

Botser was a self-professed nomad when he was younger. His travels around the world eventually led him to Katmandu, where he met the silversmith for the king of Nepal.

Botser was taken to a studio there, where 15 men were working. "They were doing all the fireworks of welding with the power of their lungs," he said.

That night, the workers gave him a ring. "It has been almost 20 years now, and I still have the ring with me. I sleep with it," Botser said.

His visit to the studio inspired him to become a silversmith.

At one point, Moshiko found pieces of plastic in the garbage that he decided to use to create artwork. "I started to combine gold and plastic. That was the beginning," Botser said.

His art is a reflection of the time we live in. "Polymers, which I am working with, [are] the most important material of our time. If in the Stone Age people built their things from stone, in the Iron Age, they built their tools from Iron, then today is the polymer era," Botser said.

He will be in Booth 725 in the purple section at the art show, and Goldraich will be in Booth 667 of the yellow section.

Admission is free for the exhibition, which runs July 11 to 13. For more information, visit the Toronto Outdoor Art Exhibit website at www.torontooutdoorart.org.

Canadian cyclists sought for Maccabiah Games

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — By day, Sylvan Adams, head of Iberville Developments Ltd., is a savvy, successful real estate developer.

Come evening, though, you're just as likely to catch Adams, 49, manoeuvring his mega-expensive racing bike around a looping track, competing in a bike race on the Criterium circuit.

And as often as not, he's a fair bet to win.

Adams said these days, he competes "two to four" times a week in the masters category in the sport he loves.

He loves cycling and racing so much, in fact, that he recently took up former Maccabi Canada president Roy Salomon's offer to captain Canada's first cycling team entry at the next Maccabiah Games in 2009.

Salomon told The CJN that cycling has received the go-ahead to be a competition sport at the next games, set for July 12 to 23, 2009.

"There should be 11 or 12 countries competing," he said. "It's got the potential to be very big."

For Adams, who has been to Israel many times but never to the Games, the opportunity is more than welcome.

"I've known Roy and [his late brother] Dick my whole life," Adams said in an interview. "I don't take on many of these types of projects, but Roy tells me there's a very, very special feeling when you're there."

Indeed, Adams believes that heading Canada's first Jewish cycling team will be a fine way to mesh his abiding respect for the Maccabi cause with his own passion for the sport.

It was a passion that was rekindled for Adams about a decade ago. Always active in sports, Adams grew into adulthood on his bike. "I didn't even own a car until I was 24."

Although he always stayed active in one sport or another, he took up serious cycling in his late 30s, which he acknowledged was "relatively late." He then got the racing bug after seeing a Criterium race in Laval. The person who urged him to go was Paulo Saldanha, a former top Canadian and two-time Canadian masters road cycling champion.

Adams confesses that before that moment, he didn't even realize that there was an organized bike-racing circuit.

"I left there completely exhilarated," he recalled, and at age 40, decided to try racing out for himself. He got the required licence to race, and he was off. One year into it, Adams had already won four races in his age group – 39 to 49. One of his more recent competitions was a Père Sablon race on the Criterium circuit.

Adams said in terms of recruiting members for the Maccabi Canada team, he would be "putting feelers out," reaching out to Canadian Jewish cyclists who might be interested in competing at the Games, which are expected to see the participation of a record 8,000 Jewish athletes from around the world.

The overriding criteria for qualifying, Adams said, will be racing results. "No trials are necessary." Adams himself plans to compete in the masters category.

Perhaps only cycling aficionados would truly understand the appeal of the sport, but for Adams, it's a matter of the harmony it produces between the rider and the bike.

"I love the noises of the bicycle, the sound of the bicycle, the speed of the bicycle," he said.

Sports like tennis and hockey are "all-skill sports," Adams said. Cycling, of course, also takes talent and training, but it's less technical in nature, and in that sense, more democratic, allowing all, regardless of age, to enjoy those qualities.

Individuals interested in competing in cycling at the 2009 Maccabiah Games can contact Adams by e-mail at sadams@ibervilledev.com.

Canada hopes for medal in golf at 2009 Maccabiah

MONTREAL — Don't be surprised if Canada shows itself to be bona fide medal contender when members of its golf team take their first swings at the Maccabiah Games in Israel next year – the 18th, or chai, edition.

So says Montrealer Richard Marsh, one of the province's best Jewish amateur golfers, who at 56 is captaining Canada's Maccabi golf team along with Danny Zack of Vancouver.

"It will be a very competitive team," Marsh promised. "I would really like to see 30 to 40 people coming to the tryouts."

National trials will take place at Montreal's Elm Ridge Golf Club on Sept. 14 and 15, but Marsh said there's a new wrinkle this year to attract people: the tryouts will also be a trophy tournament.

The event will be called the Canadian Maccabiah Golf Championship. Needless to say, not just anybody will be able hit the links. For the men's open tournament, you need a verifiable handicap of no more than six, and for the women's open, 10.

Already, Marsh noted, there are some very talented golfers with an excellent shot at being on the team that will hit the links in Caesarea, which is about 90 minutes outside Tel Aviv and whose course, the only 18-hole course in Israel, recently underwent a complete renovation.

They include 23-year-old Montrealer Jeff Barkun, who Marsh said "hits the ball a mile," is a very good control player, and plays on the Quebec amateur tour; one-handicapper Evan Krakower of Montreal, who's only 19; and McGill University student David Albert, who plays on the McGill gold team.

Among the contenders on the women's side is Torontonian Stephanie Klein, who has competed at several national events and plays the amateur circuit in Ontario.

The number of individuals competing in the juniors or master's levels will depend entirely on how many express an interest. Golfers at the national trials are expected to pay an entry fee of $180. Master's players going to Israel – in any sport – must pay for the entire trip themselves. Marsh said Canada has fielded some "good, good teams" over the years. Co-captain Zack was a member of a bronze medal-winning team in 1977, and in 1981, Canada earned a team silver while Billy Holzman of Ottawa's Rideau View Golf Club earned an individual bronze.

There were no Canadian golf medals during the 1990s, and Marsh said that next year's Maccabiah will see Canada facing some stiff competition in golf, especially from South Africa and the United States.

But he thinks there's hope.

"If you don't go into it thinking you can win it, then there's no point going in," he said.

Marsh, who is married to an Israeli, is looking forward to being in Israel again.

"The Maccabiah is something that gets into your system, your bloodstream" he said. "It feels like you're going home."

For more details on the tryouts, visit Maccabi Canada's website at www.maccabicanada.com, e-mail Marsh at r.marsh@maccabi-canada.com, or e-mail Zack at d.zack@maccabicanada.com.

Some advice for Bridezilla

Sandie Benitah
20Something

After a long, dreary winter, summer is finally here – the season for suntanning, vacationing and, of course, getting married.

I've been fortunate enough to have been a bridesmaid close to 10 times in my life, and, no, I'm not being sarcastic when I say fortunate.

I've been fortunate because I've stood under the chupah for some amazing friends, including my sisters. But I'm also fortunate because being a bridesmaid has taught me a lot about women, about friendship and, most of all, about patience.

The best brides that I've had the pleasure of helping have been the girls who haven't been planning their wedding since they discovered Bridal Barbie as a kid.

These brides are considerate and easygoing. They let me choose the kind of dress I want to wear, they didn't insist on having me wear lavender or seafoam green, and they were certainly appreciative of my efforts.

These are the brides that make it a pleasure to bend over backward for.

Then there are other brides who take their friends dedication to them for granted.

I have one colleague who was her best friend's maid of honour this past May. She made us all laugh when, at lunch one day, she showed us a long "to do" list that she had just received from the bride via e-mail.

My colleague's chores included picking up the bride's wedding dress, spending a Saturday afternoon wrapping bonbonieres and putting together a video scrapbook to show at the reception.

"The worst thing is, she wants me to run the video myself throughout dinner," she complained to us. "I don't even get to eat dinner at her wedding!"

My friends and I have a book full of horror stories to tell about our experiences with Bridezillas, but I don't think venting is the solution to this problem.

Now, I know that brides need all the support they can get. They've got a great party to plan and a new life to prepare for. But many of them get carried away planning their big day and lose sight of what it's all about. That's when they morph from Bridal Barbie into Bridezilla.

A wedding is a declaration of commitment and celebration of love between two people – nothing more, nothing less. It's not about a bride's dress, the floral centrepieces or the colour scheme. In my opinion, these frivolous details don't bring much value to the big day. If anything, they take away from it.

A lot of brides consider their wedding day to be a day to shine and be the centre of attention. The grooms are simply there to stand beside them and act as Prince Charming in this stage production.

Even retailers are keen to jump on this notion. One commercial for tuxedos always irks me when it says, "When everyone's looking at her, she'll be looking at you."

I feel for the grooms out there. I really do.

While wedding receptions can be beautiful, emotional and incredibly special, so is the relationship that is being celebrated. Years later, no one will remember the dresses your bridesmaids wore (I hope!), but they will remember the kind of relationship you have fostered since the wedding.

So to my fellow bridesmaids, I say let's gently remind our bride friends that we're here to support them as much as we can, especially when it comes to helping them keep some perspective.

And to the brides that we have the honour of standing next to, please remember that in they eyes of your family, friends and, especially, new husband, you don't need a princess dress to be special to us.

After all, a good friendship and good relationship makes every day a special day for all of us, not just for you.

NOT YOUR SUMMER CAMP SLUSHY

• 1 cup Kosher aperitif or sweet wine
• 4 c shaved ice (made with grater blade of a food processor)

Chill aperitif/wine in a small pitcher. Using an ice cream scoop, pack approximately 1 cup shaved ice into a cocktail glass, then drizzle with a quarter of the chilled aperitif or sweet wine. Repeat with remaining ice.

About Life

Dear Ella,

I have a very close circle of friends. Janice, one of my dearest friends, broke up with Josh more than a year ago, but they remained close, and he has become an important member of this circle.

A couple of months ago, Josh's mom passed away. Since this incident, Josh and I have become closer. I lost my mother last year, and this common grief has bonded the two of us. It's obvious that Josh and I are headed into a relationship that will extend beyond the boundaries of "just friends." I have no idea how Janice is going to feel about this, and I love her dearly and don't want to hurt her. I also don't want to give up on what Josh and I have developed. It's a very special relationship and we have become very close. I'm stuck and scared. Help!

Testing Loyalty

Dear Testing Loyalty,

Dating your friend's ex falls into the category of a "dating grey zone" and there are no easy answers here. Your situation is a little unusual, because although Janice and Josh have broken up, Josh remains within this close circle of friends. This means that Josh and Janice were mature enough to put their breakup behind them and continue with their friendship. Often a relationship will end badly, and hard feelings and anger are left behind.

Don't let Janice discover this through the grapevine. It's possible that if you play your cards right, you will end up in the best possible scenario, with both friendships intact.

You must be honest with Janice. Explain how innocently your bond developed. Hopefully, Janice will be onside, but you have to prepare yourself for the chance that she won't approve. In that case, you will have some hard decisions ahead of you. But even if Janice gives you her blessing, the dynamic of your relationship could change. However, you are not at that stage yet, and you may never be.

Often the best relationships are created when the two people involved start out as friends first. More often than not, those are the relationships that can truly survive the test of time, and it sounds like this is what you and Josh share.

Friendship is about honesty, loyalty, support and respect. Your circle of friends has already tested some difficult situations and has come out on top.

We began before birth

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

I was born on April 27, 1960, but I began much before that.

Canadian Jewish News columnist Bill Gladstone is my second cousin on my father's side. He is a fine man, a journalist, and someone with a commanding sense of family and history so much so that he has spend years ensconced in genealogy, revealing his roots and mine.

Recently, Cousin Billy published a book on his findings titled One Hundred Years in Canada: The Rubinoff-Naftolin Family Tree (www.rubnaft.com). This masterful book took 20 years to create. Billy interviewed some 200 people and researched ships' manifests, naturalization papers, and marriage and death records. He also designed and edited the book.

In One Hundred Years, Billy reveals his talent as a writer and researcher, and his eagerness to share with readers gems of information he discovered, as well as the simple truth – that we are part of history and connected to all of its dots. Billy is gifted.

So what happened before April 27, 1960? According to Cousin Billy's findings, a lot!

It all began – or at least as far back as documents reveal – in the early 1800s with Mr. and Mrs. Rubinowitz who were "born between Bobruisk and the Dneiper River in a region now southeastern Belarus." The Rubinowitzes had five children: Rachel, who married Shmuel Chaim Rubinowitz; Riva Rishe, who wed Itsha Maisha Naftolin; Binyamin, who made Esther (Dobin) his wife; Minya, who accepted Elimelech Arnoff's proposal; and Aaron, who married Esther Cahansky. Bill divides the book into five sections – one for each branch of the families – and takes us on a century-long trek with each one of them.

In my family, the Naftolin branch, Cousin Billy introduces us to my bubbie, Mary (Naftolin) Rosensweig, through a literary synopsis of her life and a charming picture dated 1911, which revealed a fashion sense that was quite contrary to my memories of her. Her life was hard.

I read about my parents' sojourn to Kitchener in 1954 and saw an intriguing snapshot of my Uncle Berel visiting former president Jimmy Carter at the White House in 1977. I learned I had a cousin who was a barber, and another who married the "city legend" Sammy Taft, the owner of the Toronto store The Hatter. He was renowned for bringing the tradition of the "hat trick" into the National Hockey League. (Taft offered a hat to any player who scored three times – a hat trick – in a game at Maple Leaf Gardens. Fans followed his lead and offered their hats to players as well, throwing them onto the ice.)

Billy is a very heimish fellow. He is warm in spirit and generous, and one gets the sense he is making a very real-life connection between us and the family members in his book, especially those who risked life and limb to ensure our lives in this Goldene Medina (golden land).

The 600 pictures in the book are riveting and almost put us in the same room with the many characters in our family. A black and white two-page spread from 1937 of members of the Agudos Hamishpocha (also known as the United Families Organization, an affinity group launched in 1928 that offered newly arrived family members free loans and a familial place) reflects the varied emotions of those who preceded me by decades yet share a special DNA and history unique to us. It's nice to meet you.

Cousin Billy is humble and a spiritual person. In the acknowledgements, he writes, "I would like to thank the Rebonno shel Olam, the Almighty, for putting this task before me, then granting me the privilege of completing it."

Thank you, Bill, for this treasure. You remind us that we began long before our birth dates, and that family and personkind are inextricably connected. This alone contributes greatly to shalom, peace in our world.

Israeli Canadians sue Lebanese bank

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — In what is being described as an unprecedented Canadian civil action, a Lebanese bank is being accused of being complicit in terrorism against Israeli civilians by virtue of providing financial services to Hezbollah.

The Beirut-based Lebanese Canadian Bank (LCB), which has a Montreal office, is being sued in Quebec Superior Court by four Canadian citizens living in northern Israel for damages they say they suffered during the war between Israel and Hezbollah in 2006.

The plaintiffs are seeking more than $6 million in total from the LCB, which they hold liable because they allege it knowingly and unlawfully did extensive business during and for two years prior to the conflict with two Lebanese groups that have been identified by the United States as financial arms of Hezbollah.

"LCB, in providing banking services to Hezbollah-related finance companies, has facilitated Hezbollah's terrorist activities," the suit alleges. "In so acting, LCB facilitated and lent support to the violent acts of Hezbollah, and violated the rights of the plaintiffs whose injuries were caused by LCB in providing the financial infrastructure and facilities for the funding of those violent acts."

The suit further claims that the rockets fired by Hezbollah from southern Lebanon into Israel during the war targeted civilians and that their firing constitutes terrorism as defined by Canadian and international law.

"We deny all allegations," said the LCB's Montreal representative, Tina Al-Hattouni.

The suit was filed July 2 by Sarah Yefet and her daughter Shoshana Sappir of Safed, and a couple, Rochelle and Oz Shalmoni of Karmiel. All are Canadian-born, except Oz, who came to Canada as a child.

Destroying myths about organ donation

By RABBI REUVEN P. BULKA

Once an idea gets crazy glued into the brain, it is hard – indeed, almost impossible – to detach. We Jews have our fair share of such myths, so many, in fact, that I have written two books about them, What You Thought You Knew about Judaism and More of What You Thought You Knew about Judaism. A few teaser myths are that we are the chosen people (really we are the choosing people), that the term goy means someone non-Jewish (we are often referred to as goy, a nation, including in the Shabbat afternoon Minchah service), or that Judaism is anti-pleasure.

Comment

For the moment I would like to zero in on one myth (and a very significant one at that): the myth that Judaism is against organ donation.

In a word, this is simply untrue.

Just recently, a highly respected sage, Rabbi Zalman Nehemiah Goldberg, son-in-law of the late, great venerated sage Rabbi Shlomo Zalman Auerbach, shocked many by stating that Judaism is in favour of organ donation. He attached the usual caveat that one should consult one's rabbi on this. But the message is clear and unequivocal.

The question is, will it make a difference?

Why would it not? Because it remains an entrenched myth in the mind of so many that Judaism is against organ donation. Jews and non-Jews are convinced of this.

Why do so many people believe this? There are a number of possible reasons. One is simple: ignorance. People don't know, and therefore assume, often incorrectly. Another is that it is convenient to believe that Judaism is against organ donation, because that way, you are off the hook and don't need to contemplate this urgent and life-saving matter. People generally avoid all conversation regarding their eventual demise, including buying burial plots. Organ donation fits with this avoidance response.

Jailed Man Released

VANCOUVER — A Canadian Jew who spent 12 years in a Bulgarian jail for a crime he says he didn't commit arrived in Vancouver July 6. Michael Kapoustin 56, who was released July 3 from a Sofia jail, has been reunited with his wife and son, who is now 15 and hadn't seen his father since he was two. Kapoustin was charged with fraud and embezzlement in the early 1990s in connection with a business venture. He was jailed in 1996 and eventually cleared of fraud, but was convicted of embezzlement in 2002. The Bulgarian-born Kapoustin, who came to Canada with his family from Hungary in 1956, was released after Ottawa lobbied on his behalf.

Resort Purchased

TORONTO — The Tel Aviv-based Mishorim Development Group, chaired by Israeli Canadian businessman Gil Blutrich, has purchased the Horseshoe Valley Resort in Collingwood, Ont., north of Toronto, the Toronto Star and Israel's Globes newspaper reported last week. The sale price was around $38 million, the Star reported. Blutrich's Skyline International Development Corp. recently bought much of the nearby town of Port McNicoll on Georgian Bay for $100 million.

Obama To Visit Israel

NEW YORK — Barack Obama will visit Israel next week. The Democratic U.S. presidential nominee is expected to arrive on July 22 or 23 for a two- or three-day visit, Yediot Achronot reported. Obama, who is seen as keen to boost his security credentials and support among U.S. Jews, confirmed he plans to visit Israel as part of a Mideast tour. He's expected to meet Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and other top leaders, as well as visit Sderot to show solidarity with residents there. His Republican opponent, John McCain, also visited Israel recently.

Dachau Seeks Twin

BERLIN — The German city of Dachau is seeking a new image – through a sister city in Israel. "Of course the city of Dachau would like to have a partner city in Israel. But it must be organized with great sensitivity," mayor Peter Bürgel told the Welt am Sonntag newspaper. Dachau is the site of one of the first concentration camps created on Hitler's orders. Bürgel, a member of Bavaria's conservative Christian Social Union Party was elected mayor in March. He said he wants to improve international contacts, particularly with Israel.

Attack Arrests Made

PARIS — French officials have charged two men in their 20s for the beating of a 17-year-old Jewish boy in an incident that prompted an outcry in Paris. On July 10, Foued O., 26, and Sekou M. 25, were charged with "attempted murder and group violence aggravated by their anti-Semitic character" for assaulting Rudy Haddad on June 21. Haddad, who was wearing a kippah, was brutally beaten with metal bars while on his way to synagogue. Both the suspects deny the charges but admit to being present during the attack on Haddad. Four other suspects being held by authorities earlier last week were released.

Group Ends Agriprocessors Boycott

NEW YORK — An Orthodox social justice group has called off its boycott of America's largest kosher meat supplier less than a month after it began.

The boycott, organized by Uri L'tzedek, went into effect in mid-June in an effort to pressure Agriprocessors to institute mechanisms to ensure compliance with U.S. labour laws. On July 8, the group said it was suspending the boycott because the company "is beginning to take significant steps towards directly addressing the concerns" raised about treatment of its workers.

Agriprocessors has sustained a wave of negative media coverage since May 12, when U.S. authorities conducted the largest workplace immigration raid in American history at its meat-packing plant in Postville, Iowa. In the wake of the raid, employees have claimed they were underpaid and sexually and physically abused. Agriprocessors officials deny the allegations and the federal government has yet to bring any charges against the company's owners, the Lubavitch Rubashkin family of Brooklyn, N.Y.

Uri L'tzedek cited a number of reforms it says have been instituted by Agriprocessors' new compliance officer, including the creation of an anonymous tip line for workers, a new safety department and new safety training.

Seniors dance troupe performs in Ghana

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

It took less than five minutes for each member of the Vintage Dancers, a local dance troupe, to respond affirmatively about performing in Ghana.

When their teacher, performing artist and educator Sarina Condello, e-mailed the 12 women, all between the ages of 62 and 73, she wasn't surprised at the quick responses, she said.

The troupe, 11 of whom are Jewish, travelled in March along with Condello; Kwasi Dunyo, an internationally recognized drummer and teacher; and two photographers, to Dagbamete, Ghana, to take part in the spring festival, a spiritual event in that region of Ghana.

"Most had not been to Africa, and they all have a sense of adventure. They were ready immediately to come with me," Condello said.

Dancer Frances Bleviss, who was accompanied by her 33-year-old daughter, said that despite the "extreme heat and humidity, the trip was amazing.

"The dancing was a hit – about 1,000 people attended one performance – and we all managed to ignore the drops of blood from a goat carcass on the floor of the shrine when we danced barefoot wearing traditional African gear."

When one dancer, whom Bleviss described as short and heavy, came onto the stage, the crowd went wild, she said.

Esther Pifko

"There were cheers and shouts. They applauded her for her size and her spirit. She said she had never been appreciated like that before."

Condello, 44, said that our culture is youth-driven. "We do not recognize the creativity, wisdom and power of our elders. They are almost invisible. Attached to that is the notion that their bodies are not sexually attractive, and that they have no agility. All of that is absolutely untrue. My dancers are sensual and energetic, and most are over 65."

Condello said that Africa is the birthplace of communal dance, and her intention in planning the trip was to bring the women together to celebrate the ecstasy and joy of communal dancing.

"Dancing is an inherent part of African culture. They dance to pray, to mourn, to celebrate, and I wanted my dancers to experience that. In Africa, they dance until they die moving. Nothing is ever the same after you've danced to drums in Africa."

Bleviss, who has been dancing with Condello for three years, said that until then, she hadn't danced in three decades.

"Then I retired, my mother died, and a 9½ year relationship ended. I knew I would find myself through dance, because it was a way to connect my heart and spirit through movement."

Every woman on the trip came back with a sense of pride, she said. "We all got something from the experience, and we

Uplifting and impressive

From the editor's desk

In an old, renovated building, on a street that is a small capillary of intense Jerusalem life, connected to and running north from Yafo Road, one of the city's oldest arteries of traffic and history, some 100 students from around the world gather every day to learn filmmaking.

Talented, earnest and imaginative in their studies, the students are also de facto "ambassadors" of a way of life not normally found in the film industries of most western countries.

The creative and guiding ethos of the Ma'ale School of Television, Film and the Arts is respect for traditional Jewish values. It is without a doubt the only such school of its kind in the world.

Founded 18 years ago by individuals who mostly came from observant homes, it has become today, one of the great social, cultural and artistic successes of Israeli society.

Last month in the company of Steve Solomon, the director of the Canada Desk of the Jerusalem Foundation, the Canadian Jewish News visited the school to see first-hand this busy hive of artistic endeavour, which after less than two decades has already achieved such wide acclaim.

"There is rarely a film festival in Israel and Europe that does not show a Ma'ale film," the school's director Neta Ariel told us. "The quality of the films speaks for themselves. Ma'ale films, shorts of about 20 to 30 minutes in length, are sent to festivals all around the world. Many have won awards."

Last month, a trio of Ma'ale films were shown in Vancouver, Montreal and Toronto. They won the hearts of the audiences, as noted by our correspondent Reva Kaiser Wein in the June 12 issue of The CJN, Toronto edition.

Typical of all youthful quests, the films of Ma'ale deal with themes such as the search for love, questions of identity, relationships and one's place in society. But their special lens is that of deference for Jewish tradition.

Though the school began as a way to open up the observant community to the world of filmmaking, people from all parts of Israeli society attend the school today. Its students and teachers come from the left and the right, the observant and the non-observant, from the culture of Tel Aviv and from the culture of Jerusalem.

"Admission is open to anyone," Ariel said, "but there is a 'religious' orientation to the school and the curriculum. Ma'ale does not apologize for its Zionist and pro-Jewish philosophy."

The school's graduates have now taken their place in the ranks of the television and film workforce in Israel as directors, producers, scriptwriters, editors, journalists and reporters. But the success of the school was hard won.

Acceptance of the school within the Orthodox community came very slowly. "Indeed, the first few years were very difficult for the school and for the community," Ariel confided.

But ultimately, the school proved it belongs within the Orthodox world, too. The breakthrough followed the creation of the Machon Torah V'Yetzira (The Institute of Torah and Creativity – my translation), a rabbinical cinema club of sorts that has become a forum for the discussion of controversial and difficult issues. The popular monthly meetings are attended by diverse individuals. We were told that the film Trembling Before God, which explored homosexuality within the Orthodox community, attracted some 80 rabbis to the meeting, some of whom come from the haredi community.

"Though it started as an institution for teaching films," Ariel told us, "it is now apparent that Ma'ale is an instrument of 'outreach.' Secular and Orthodox people learn about each other. The school, its films, the way we operate, opens people's hearts. The response to the school and to its films has been overwhelming," Ariel enthused.

One current project of a student in the school is producing a survival narrative of the Ethiopians who came to Israel, modelled on the Spielberg Holocaust Archive in Los Angeles.

"Reform and Conservative congregations have started to show interest in Ma'ale films. Some secular high schools in the country, too, are using Ma'ale films for their curricula," Ariel told us.

The values taught in the school also propel it to become involved in social-action projects for the benefit of the wider community. We were told of two projects, one involving children with special needs and one with Arab children from east Jerusalem and the West Bank.

Supported by the Jerusalem Foundation as part of the dream of the Jerusalem's late mayor Teddy Kolek to build a thriving, tolerant city, Ma'ale is a non-profit organization. Student fees cover about 25 per cent of the actual cost of running the school. The rest comes from various donors. Most of the funding from the Jerusalem Foundation is dedicated to assisting students with their tuition for the four-year cinema and television program.

The slogan of the school was written on a bulletin board in Ariel's office: "Bringing Judaism to Art and Art to Judaism."

The school defies typecasting. Indeed, that is Ma'ale's key message: all human beings defy typecasting. Each of us is unique. And Ma'ale enables individuals, for whom the opportunities in the past were so rare, to prove this very precious, universal, "religious" point. It is an uplifting and impressive place.

See]N CELEBRATING 60 YEARS OF ISRAEL

COURAGE TO DREAM, STRENGTH TO HOPE

Theodor Herzl, widely regarded as the founder of modern political Zionism, died on the 20th of Tammuz (July 3) in 1904. Here is seen in a stylization of his famous pose in 1895 looking out of his hotel balcony on the Rhine River in Basel, Switzerland. In this drawing, however, he is looking out onto the ramparts of the Old City of Jerusalem. The Tower of David is in the background, and a group of Jews are walking into the Old City. The drawing was on a stamp issued by the Jewish National Fund in 1929. After his exposure to the rampant anti-Semitism in France in the wake of the Albert Dreyfus trial near the end of the 19th century, Herzl decided that the Jews needed a homeland of their own. "If you will it, it is no dream," he wrote of the possibility of national home for the Jewish people.

What does SLF say?

After working with owner-managed businesses for more than 70 years, we have learned a few truisms about succession planning:

1. Things are rarely as simple as they seem.

2. It takes a team of experts to implement a proper plan, including SLF's tax, valuation and accounting professionals.

3. The sooner you consider your situation the more options you have available to you.

4. It is always prudent to review existing plans, especially in a challenging business environment, in order to assess whether they are optimal.

Toronto camp caters to special-needs kids

Chai Lifeline helps provide inclusive experience

By RITA POLIAKOV
CJN Intern

It's almost lunchtime and Adventure Valley day camp is a flurry of excitement.

Screaming kids run the length of the soccer field, trying to get in one more goal. Tennis balls bounce up and down in the courts, and Kool-Aid rockets are being launched high into the air.

In the middle of it all sits Owen, arguably one of the most popular campers in his group.

Kids circle him, showing off their homemade rockets, chattering about lunch and arguing about who will push his wheelchair.

Owen, 9, has cerebral palsy and is profoundly deaf, but none of that matters right now, because he is about to launch his rocket.

Two counsellors gently place an empty Kool-Aid Jammers container in his lap. Both his hands are brought together and the straw flies into the air, bringing a wide smile to Owen's face. It's obvious he wants to do it again, and again and again.

Owen is one of a few campers with disabilities at Adventure Valley camp, located at Leslie Street and Steeles Avenue. The camp, which is in its second summer, prides itself on inclusion. The camp's staff is made up of various special needs specialists and one-on-one counsellors who help cater to each camper's needs.

"Some camps have the illusion of inclusion," said Tammy Zaldin, Adventure Valley's co-inclusion liaison director. "Here, the whole camp is accommodating."

This summer, Adventure Valley has teamed up with Chai Lifeline, an organization that supports Jewish children with serious illnesses and their families. Chai Lifeline has just started a "Kindness Fund" to send siblings of disabled children to camp.

"Parents dealing with [their child's] illness don't have money to spend on camp," said Rabbi Mordechai Rothman, Chai Lifeline's regional director in Canada.

Rabbi Rothman found Owen through one of the parents at Adventure Valley and decided to help him as well.

According to Rabbi Rothman, Chai Lifeline will send five children with disabilities and 12 siblings of kids with disabilities to Adventure Valley this summer.

While Owen benefits from this program, so do his fellow campers.

"Other children are not necessarily exposed to kids with disabilities," Rabbi Rothman said. "It's important to learn that kids with disabilities are the same as you and me, they're just in a wheelchair."

Lynda Fishman, executive director of Adventure Valley, agrees.

Owen, one of a handful of special needs campers at Adventure Valley day camp, poses with his counsellors, from left, Sallyanne Hadzalic, Evan Lighter, Josh Garbe and Kevin Feng. [Rita Poliakov photo]

"Owen is so visibly special needs, I think it's a wonderful life lesson for [campers]," she said.

Adventure Valley is a 20-acre camp with facilities such as a soccer field, nine tennis courts, a pool and hiking trails.

The camp is ideal for children like Owen, Fishman said.

"Most camps won't take [children with special needs] or aren't equipped. We have qualified teachers and expertise. It's a small camp, we're able to integrate children with serious special needs."

While Owen can't participate in every activity, many games are modified to include him.

Josh Garbe, one of Owen's counsellors, has helped in the inclusion process.

"When things started two weeks ago, we didn't know what to expect. We knew his condition, but we didn't know what that meant... [but] we've realized that Owen is just like the rest of the kids. He wants to have fun just the same," Garbe said.

"Although [Owen] can't participate fully, he does all the arts and crafts and sports. He became one of the group."

Owen's fellow campers agree.

"Having Owen in our group doesn't hold us back, he helps us understand. Just because someone's different doesn't mean there's something wrong with them," Jack, 11, said.

Although Owen can only communicate using sign language and facial expressions, the campers and staff have learned how to understand him.

"Part of it is about finding a way to communicate his needs and desires and teaching his peers how to understand, teaching them that a smile is a whole conversation," said Zaldin.

Luckily, Owen loves to smile.

"A lot of the time, he's really funny. He smiles and laughs a lot. Yesterday, one counsellor was arguing with another over a cheer, and he started laughing," said Ethan, 10, who is in Owen's group.

Eleven-year-old Philip summed up the campers' attitude toward Owen.

"He's a friend," Philip said.

AN OPEN LETTER TO THE PUBLIC

SOMETHING IS WRONG

PLEASE HELP US MAKE IT RIGHT!

United Chesed of Toronto urgently needs YOUR help right now!!

We work with Jewish organizations in Toronto to help needy adults and children in our community. We are an urgent response service networking with major Jewish agencies, Synagogues, Chesed committees and Outreach Action committees.

These are only a few of the hundreds of challenges we have addressed in the past 8 years:

- Lack of food for children & adults
- Struggling single mothers unable to pay for children's busing, schooling, clothes
- Struggling families about to lose their homes
- Men and women unable to afford life saving and pain medications
- Families overwhelmed by accidents that disable providers from working
- Elderly, infirmed and incapacitated adults unable to afford transportation to important medical appointments
- Struggling families with the burden of bills they cannot meet
- Requests for food and beds for themselves and their children
- Pick up/ delivery of food, furniture, emergency food coupons, winter clothing
- Adult & Child Abuse
- Drugs & Alcohol issues
- Divorce issues
- Marital issues
- Legal problems

In 2007 United Chesed received more than 2600 phone calls and 3987 visits to our website, totaling 5987 calls for help and information. We are only halfway through this year, and we have received over 2900 calls.

We need financial assistance. Mainstream Jewish agencies have been unable to substantially support our financial needs. In 2007, with approximately $35,000 of support, we distributed over $500,000 value of furniture, clothes, food and services. Can you imagine what we can do with BIG money? The need in the community is great - we know there are those of you who have the ability to help us. We do most of our work behind the scenes and have been minimally exposed to the public because we feel that the money we receive must be prioritized for feeding that family of the single Mother when the kids get home from school at 5:30 rather than putting our money towards advertising ourselves. Our interest is in helping people in any way we can, as soon as humanly possible, without a lot of red tape. We do have accountability standards for those whom we help. Having created an awareness of our organization in the community, we have been inundated with requests and find that we now have to expand our efforts to quickly raise funds.

We mean business! Please consider donating to United Chesed of Toronto, a registered not-for-profit charity – All donors will receive a tax receipt.

Global insecurity

"We will defend our interests and defend our allies. We take very, very strongly our obligations to defend our allies and no one should be confused of that." Those were the very blunt and forthright words of the U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice last week at a news conference in the former Soviet Republic of Georgia. She was speaking on the subject of the latest showcase of missile launchings by the Iranian regime. And of course, she was speaking directly to the decision-makers in Tehran.

"Anyone trying to destroy Israel will find France blocking the way." Those were the equally blunt and forthright words of French President Nicolas Sarkozy last month in Jerusalem.

The world should be worried.

Iran is raising the temperature under an already stewing cauldron of potential Middle East confrontation. It has emphatically refused to accede to the increasingly desperate pleas by the United Nations Security Council and the European Union to give up its military-use nuclear program. The much-publicized display of missile testing last week was as much a jab and a poke in the pleaders' eyes as it was a show of strength for all the interested Middle Eastern onlookers. It should be made clear that those interested onlookers are decidedly more than simply Israel. The hated, predominantly Sunni Muslim, oil-producing world of the Persian Gulf will be no less a target for Iranian missiles than the despised Jewish state. The Iranians themselves make this plain: "Tel Aviv and U.S. shipping in the Persian Gulf will be Iran's first targets." And Iran's Sunni neighbours harbour no contrary illusions. Hossein Salami, a commander of Iran's Revolutionary Guards, said in a televised address last week that "thousands" of missiles are ready for firing.

By raising the heat and further stoking fears of possible military confrontation, Iran is also driving up the price of oil. Economies throughout the world are reeling as they try to absorb the upwardly spiralling base costs of their respective infrastructures.

And of course, Iran is the world's leading sponsor of terrorism, encouraging anarchy and anti-western mayhem wherever its petrodollars can buy influence.

It is thus no overstatement to suggest that Iran is effectively destabilizing the security of the entire globe in pursuit of its apocalyptic visions of theological supremacy.

"This is a challenge not only for Israel, but for the entire world," Israeli Defense Minister Ehud Barak said last week. "The focus now is sanctions and diplomatic action."

The civilized world must immediately heed Barak's words. Russia, India and China must join forces with the EU and the West to bring a halt to Tehran's military-use nuclear program.

Iran presents an ominous, present danger to the region and the world. Severe, stringent sanctions must be imposed against the Iranian regime. Urgently. Now.

The New York State legislature passed a landmark bill to help solve the situation of agunot, women whose husbands refuse to give them a get, a Jewish divorce, and who, therefore, can't remarry. The bill required anyone involved in a religious marriage to ensure that all barriers to remarriage have been removed prior to them being granted a civil divorce.

Speaking freely about Zionism

Gil Troy wonders why young people do not keep Zionism "at the centre of our story" as modern Jews, in the way as described so eloquently by Democratic presidential nominee Barack Obama ("Obama gets Zionism – why don't our youth?," CJN, July 3).

I am in my 30s and have always loved Israel, and I've never doubted its importance as an ideological and spiritual anchor for us as Jews. I grew up in a post-1967 world, and in my eyes, Israel was always an established and, in may ways, blessedly normal country. Given that, I do not see why it is acceptable in the current Canadian Jewish community to criticize the prime minister of Canada and his polices, but not the prime minister of Israel and his polices, while still affirming my support for either country. I find it hard to voice my deep support for Israel in an atmosphere where criticism and nuanced views are shunned. If you want youth to engage with Zionism, you need to create a space where they can speak freely.

How Israel defends itself

Stephen Tannenbaum's rhetoric denies facts, while his calling me names ("apologists for Palestinian terror") is mere baiting ("Palestinian propaganda in The CJN," CJN letters, June 5.) I haven't and don't condone acts of terror from either side. I never "denie[d] Israel the right to defend itself and its citizens" – the issue is how it is done. Israel frequently commits acts of terror against non-combatant civilians: firing assassination missiles at cars driving down busy streets or repeatedly breaking the sound barrier over Gazan children's heads.

Do I propose "a moral equivalency between the Israel Defence Forces and murderous [terrorist] groups"? I do, when they drop a one-ton bomb on an apartment complex to kill one terrorist, and there are 14 civilian deaths, including nine children as young as two months old. This happened on July 23, 2002, when an Israeli F-16 dropped a laser-guided 1,000-ton bomb on an apartment complex in Gaza City in order to kill Sala Shahada, a senior Hamas terrorist, while he was visiting his family in their apartment. Israel shares responsibility for innocent deaths in civilian areas when it uses lethal force far beyond international humanitarian law's principle of proportionality.

Is it "Palestinian propaganda and revisionism" to cite the International Court of Justice? Canadian Foreign Affairs' website says Israel should build "the [security] barrier on its own territory for security purposes... Israel's construction of the barrier... [is] contrary to international law under the Fourth Geneva Convention."

Sadly, these aren't anomalies, but typical of Israel's actions. I condemn Fatah's corruption and Hamas' intransigence. However, Israel shares in the "true root causes of the [Palestinian's] misery." I speak as a Canadian Jew who loves Israel and values justice. These truths require more, not less, attention from our Jewish press.

Pluralism of Thornhill community

I'll admit I was surprised that the Toronto Jewish community did not make the list of top 10 Jewish neighbourhoods in Jewish Living magazine ("Let's open up the 'hoods," CJN, June 26). Since we arrived in Canada two years ago, we have found the Greater Toronto Area to be one of the most vibrant, committed, involved and visible Jewish communities we've ever encountered. I was surprised when I read columnist Yoni Goldstein's reaction to our being left off the list, specifically that "the Achilles hell of Jewish Toronto" is the "inability, and in some cases unwillingness, to mix various Judaisms together."

In Thornhill, we have two Reform synagogues, two Conservative synagogues, chassidic synagogues, mitnagdic synagogues, Sephardi, Ashkenazi – you name it, Thornhill has it! One of the reasons we love living in Thornhill is the dynamic pluralism of the Jewish community here. So maybe Jewish Living magazine will take notice of us next year, because few neighbourhoods in the Jewish world allow for the range of Jewish expression we have found in the GTA, and, specifically, in Thornhill.

Renewed peace talks must start with Jerusalem

By YITZHAK REITER

When the Oslo accords were signed in 1993, there was a sense of euphoria on both sides that, at last, the Israeli-Palestinian conflict would be solved.

The failure of Oslo, however, brought about a sense of disillusionment and despair, and it reinforced the view that the conflict is insolvable. What was wrong in the Oslo process, in my view, was the fact that the hard-core issues, and particularly the Jerusalem entanglement, were delayed to the final stage of negotiations.

The architects of Oslo should not have rushed to sign an agreement and then limited themselves to the principles involved in starting the process only. Perhaps the secret phase of the Oslo talks during 1993 should have lasted a year or two longer, until the parties had solved the major issues. They might not have been able to come to an agreement on the holy sites of Jerusalem. After all, seven years later, the issue led to the failure of the Camp David II summit. But at least we would have been saved from the tragedy that followed. The collapse of the Oslo process in July 2000 devastated the peace process for years to come.

Yitzhak Reiter

Thus, any attempt to resume serious negotiations should start with the issue of Jerusalem. Since a major problem today is the phenomenon of Arab-Muslim denial of the Jewish connection to Jerusalem and the Temple Mount (as I argued in The CJN's Perspectives essay on July 10), trust can be built between the negotiating parties only after a mutual declaration has been agreed upon that recognizes the attachment of all religious denominations to that holy space.

As for the solution itself, there is no foreseeable alternative to the parameters presented to the negotiating parties in July 2000 by then-U.S. president Bill Clinton: the city would remain physically united, but the control of Arab and Jewish neighbourhoods should be divided accordingly between Israel and a future Palestinian state.

One can envision that the Arab part, consisting mostly of villages that Israel annexed in 1967, will serve as a venue for establishing the headquarters of the Palestinian capital. The Old City, however, which is the most delicate issue internationally, should be treated separately as a universal city in which all related parties would have a stake.

There is no doubt that the major issues are the right of administration of the holy sites and other religious institutions, and that the central site is the Temple Mount/Haram al-Sharif compound. In analyzing the prospects for a future agreement on these issues, one must distinguish between the maximalist claims of the sides and their vital, minimalist needs on which there will be no compromise.

In my view, the basic interest of the Palestinian side is the need to exercise more control and management of the site than the Palestinians have today. They absolutely reject division or sharing sovereignty of the site, but they could agree to resume control under international supervision without mentioning the word "sovereignty" in any agreement itself.

I assess the minimum Israeli demands to be:

• Palestinian recognition of the historic and religious connection of Jews to the Temple Mount.

• Restricting the Muslim Palestinian managers from being able to make physical changes to the compound while maintaining their responsibility for the preservation of the ancient artifacts.

• Retaining the right to ensure the well-being of those praying at the Western Wall.

• Retaining complete control of the Western Wall plaza.

Since the Six Day War and Israel's annexation of east Jerusalem, the Jewish narrative has stressed the indivisibility of Jerusalem. But Palestinians and the Muslim world will not relinquish their claims to a political capital somewhere in the eastern part of Jerusalem (al-Quds) and to control the administration of Haram-al-Sharif, their name for the Temple Mount.

Israel and the Palestinian Authority have a central role in finding a solution to the problem, but there are many other actors whose points of view must be taken into consideration:

• The various Christian denominations and institutions;

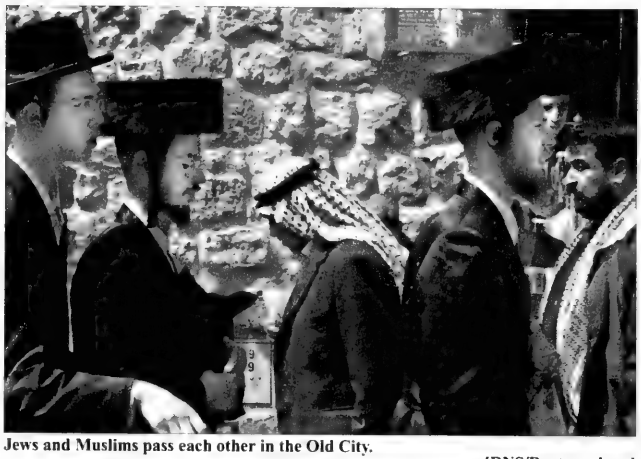
• Jordan;

• Perhaps the Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC), which brings together 57 countries and runs a special committee on the matter of al-Quds (Jerusalem), and of course

• the Jewish Diaspora.

The inclusion of the interests of so many "outside" actors makes the Jerusalem question a matter for the international community. Indeed, since July 2000, there has been a growing understanding among academics and politicians that the Old City should be administered under some kind of international trust.

A Jerusalem Institute for Israel Studies think-tank, headed by the renowned Israeli professor of international law, Ruth Lapidot, two years ago studied five options for the "Historical Basin" (the Old City and some holy sites attached to it). Three of the options suggested the involvement of an international body in the administration of Jerusalem's holy and historical sites. It's interesting to note that in the original UN Resolution 181 of Nov. 29, 1947, Jerusalem was designated as an international city. In hindsight, this proposal was a logical one.



Jews and Muslims pass each other in the Old City.

[RNS/Reuters photo]

In a recent study that I conducted at the Jerusalem Institute for Israel Studies, I suggested a solution based on management of the holy sites by a third (international) party for an interim period, with a delegation of powers from the third party to those who manage the sites and institutions today.

> 'The inclusion of the interests of so many "outside" actors makes the Jerusalem question a matter for the international community'

This period of third-party management could last for 20 years, over the course of which the two sides would negotiate the terms of a permanent settlement. If the two sides failed to reach an agreement by the end of the 20-year period, the third-party management would continue for another 20 years, and it would continue to be renewed until a final agreement was reached.

The reason for the device of interim period agreements emanates from the difficulty of the Israeli and the Palestinian political leadership to espouse the legitimacy of "compromise" for the sacred space of the Old City. It would likely be easier for both parties to achieve political support if the agreement would be for renewable, interim periods of some 20 years. The leaders could thus claim that they made no "historical concessions" and that the issues were yet to be negotiated.

The third party would be an international body whose composition and responsibilities will be detailed in an agreement between the two parties. It would be authorized to manage the relevant sites, but would make minimal use of its right to do so and instead would delegate these responsibilities to the communities that are in charge of their sites today.

The international body would have the authority to monitor and enforce the implementation of the agreement. If the two sides did not uphold their responsibilities or did not comply with the restrictions put upon them, the international body would have the right to take on the role of managing and administering the sites, until such time as the two parties return to shouldering their responsibilities, settling their conflicts, and creating the circumstances necessary for reinstating the agreement.

The international body would be expected to:

• guarantee freedom of access and arrangements for non-Muslims to visit the Haram al-Sharif/Temple Mount compound;

• guarantee Muslims the freedom to perform religious rituals on Haram al-Sharif

• guarantee Jews the freedom to perform religious rituals at the Western Wall;

• prohibit digging, building or razing of structures by unilateral decision;

• ban changes that will affect the character of the sites or the display of symbols of national sovereignty;

• maintain public order and security, and

• prevent any form of incitement or political activity.

A strong international body would prevent conflict and be a guarantor of the viability of the agreement. In addition, I suggest the creation of an inter-religious body to cultivate the traditions of the different religions and national communities in Jerusalem, prevent friction and clashes at the holy places, and arrange pilgrimages and other religious rituals in such as way as to avoid conflict.

Because the Jerusalem question is extremely important to the three Abrahamic faiths, and many Israeli Jews and Arab Muslims believe in the centrality of Jerusalem and are not prepared to renounce the fundamental interests arising from their beliefs, it's crucial to start any political negotiation with the Jerusalem question. If the parties can find agreement on this issue, the other issues can also be solved.

Why I love to teach

Here I am happily organizing my courses for the fall. After a difficult year's absence, I find myself eager to get back to the classroom. After all, this is what I came here to do.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

But it's ironic that I recognize teaching as my raison d'etre.

I remember all too well my last year of college when my parents and in-laws (I married very young) tried to pressure me into becoming a teacher. Not for me. I was going to be an anthropologist. In Australia. Me, the wife of an Orthodox rabbi!

They were right, but for the wrong reasons. I love teaching, but not because it fits a mother's schedule. Rather, I love it because I love the whole process of learning and sharing knowledge.

I'm passionate about new ideas, about the way a new concept can penetrate our understanding and change our whole perspective.

Knowledge is exciting, transformative and inspiring. Every time we add new information, we engage all our systems. All of our vast stores of information might be touched by this new piece. All might be challenged or moved or displaced. Adding a bit of salt to the pot changes it forever. And it's such a creative process. I love initiating and participating in that process.

But more than that, I am also acted upon in the process. As my students learn, I, too, learn with them. They challenge me and open wide my own systems of information. Most significantly, when I teach, I'm not focused on adding that pinch of salt (though it's more often garlic), but rather in shaking up our preconceived notions of what food or soup is. (Please pardon my food metaphors – I'm planning my course on religion and food.)

Education is not so much about adding data as it is about teaching people how to think critically, how to interpret and analyze, how to ask questions, and how to rethink what appears to be self-evident. We have to chase away those stereotypes (not all Jews eat gefilte fish, or even chicken soup).

Real learning is about new thinking and new questions. In that paradigm, I, too, become a student, and I learn as much from my students as they might learn from me. So I love learning, because I am a perpetual student. I love to ask new questions, share information and watch how students and friends take it, shake up our world view and come out with new visions and new recipes for understanding. There is a wonderful rabbinic statement that applies to me: I learned a great deal from my teachers, but I learned the most from my students.

Thank you, my students of the past, present and future.

Lessons from Wannsee

Recently, we joined friends in watching the movie Conspiracy, a fictional re-enactment of the Wannsee Conference in January 1942. Stanley Tucci was a perfect, affectless Adolph Eichmann, while Kenneth Branaugh portrayed a reptilian Reinhard Heydrich, architect of the Final Solution.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

It was a stunning, 90-minute re-enactment of the fateful meeting of Gestapo, SS, army and Nazi bureaucrats as they were led by a sly Heydrich into agreeing to a "resolution" of the Jewish question.

All minutes of the meeting were to be destroyed and no official records kept. Only because one Martin Luther (!) left his copy in an archives do we know what transpired. The minutes reveal the subtle way in which the group was led to agree that Europe's Jews – beginning with German Jews and then those in the east, finally including those they thought would be found in a defeated England – would be "evacuated" and killed by gas.

Food, drinks and cigars were abundant for the participants in the meeting. The only thing missing was a voice calling on them to halt their plans. Fear for their own futures and loathing of the Jew drove them forward. And we know the result.

It was an auspicious time to see this film, as we are about to begin the three weeks between the 17th of Tammuz and Tisha b'Av, the time ben hametzarim. The 17th of Tammuz marks the beginning of the end for Second Temple Jerusalem, as the Romans breached the outer walls and began fighting their way into the city toward the Temple Mount.

These two things connected in my mind: days of destruction 2,000 years ago and the years of death and horror more than half a century ago. Both armies were ruthless and merciless in their efforts to destroy the Jewish nation. In fact Rome could be – from today's perspective – seen as, if not more merciful, then more limited in its intent, since Rome wanted only to destroy the nation-state. Jews in other parts of the empire – indeed even in the capital city of Rome – weren't molested.

The Nazis were much more thorough in their planning and efforts.

Years ago, on Tisha b'Av night, we walked the route that the Roman armies took, beginning with the pitiful remnants of the outer wall and winding our way into the Old City of Jerusalem until we stood at the Kotel. We imagined the mountain burning with such fierce heat that stones burst out of the supporting walls and fell around its base, where some can still be seen today. Lamentations could be heard on all sides as youth groups as well as old men in gabardines wept for the destroyed city.

So Jan. 20, I think, should be a second 17th of Tammuz. As the latter day sealed the fate of the uprising 2,000 years ago, so, too, did Jan. 20, 1942, seal the fate of European Jewry.

But these catastrophes don't define who we are, although they did shape us. After Tisha b'Av come the Haftorot of consolation, leading up to celebration of a new year. After the destruction of the Second Temple came scholars who created the rabbinic Judaism that we now practice. After the Holocaust came the chance to build a Jewish state.

One more thing: the rebellion against the rule of Rome brought no other community into its ranks. The Jewish fighters stood alone (in fact, they often quarrelled with one another, but that's another matter). There is a telling moment in Conspiracy when Branaugh as Heydrich reminds the group that emigration – letting Jews leave Germany – had been tried. "No one wanted them!" he exclaims triumphantly. See? They are alone and we can do with them what we wish.

It's all too true. There were few refuges on earth from the Nazis. We know that Canada's own homegrown anti-Semites kept the doors firmly locked against the victims.

But today, Israel has allies and the means to defend itself. In Canada, there is no comparison with those dark days of F.C. Blair's and W.L.M. King's willingness to see Jews die.

We now have power and allies. Let's use that ability to assure that others can be rescued before they, too, perish.

The limits of freedom of speech

Most Canadians strongly believe that freedom of speech is a value and a principle that is the lifeblood of democratic society.

The Jewish community shares this appreciation and places a premium on free thought, discourse and open debate. Freedom of speech is consistent with our tradition of lifelong learning, questioning and discussion.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

But throughout history, Jews have been victims of hate, repression and discrimination. That is why the organized Jewish community, through such governing organizations as Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), has also recognized that most freedoms are not absolute. When necessary, there must be limits on freedoms in order to protect the integrity and security of minority communities from harm.

This harm can follow as a result of hateful, vicious or even disrespectful expression – particularly when that expression encourages others to target minority communities and cause physical, emotional or psychological distress. There are different kinds of harm – but the effect of hate on survivors of the Holocaust and their children can be particularly traumatic.

This explains why more than 40 years ago, the organized Jewish community responded affirmatively to the creation of the Cohen Commission, following anti-Semitic rallies in Toronto's Allan Gardens. The Cohen Commission, in turn, ultimately led to the enactment of the current but rarely used hate propaganda provisions in the Criminal Code. These provisions have been employed to prosecute purveyors of hate such as James Keegstra and David Ahenakew. Not surprisingly, in some of these cases, the accused have defended themselves on the basis of the freedom of expression provisions in Section 2(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

The constitutional protection of freedom of expression is, of course, strongly supported by most Canadians. But many members of the Jewish community and others, such as the drafters of the Charter itself, realize that rights are not absolute. In fact, our constitution states that all rights in the Charter are subject to reasonable limits in this free and democratic society.

The anti-hate provisions in the Criminal Code are not the only legislative restrictions on free speech. Both federally and provincially, anti-discrimination laws – commonly referred to as human rights legislation – also contain prohibitions against certain kinds of expression that are viewed as discriminatory in nature.

These laws, however, have recently come under attack for being used in inappropriate circumstances. The attacks have focused on Section 13 of the Canadian Human Rights Act and similar sections of anti-discrimination legislation in British Columbia, Alberta and elsewhere. Most recently, they arose out of complaints by Muslim organizations against cartoons, originally published in a Danish newspaper, and other depictions and descriptions viewed as anti-Muslim. This had led to some controversial complaints and suggestions by some that the anti-discrimination laws affecting expression should be abolished.

What is the position of the organized Jewish community regarding these anti-discrimination provisions? The CJC supports these laws to ensure that another level of protection is afforded minorities in Canada.

At the same time, Congress proposes that a review of the substance and administration of these laws be undertaken to ensure that a line can be drawn between permissible and offensive speech, and that these laws are only used in appropriate circumstances.

The Canadian Jewish community is not alone in its concerns. In April 2007, the B'nai B'rith Anti-Defamation Commission in Australia supported a government proposal to order Internet service providers to refrain from hosting racist and anti-Semitic websites.

Some believe freedom of speech is absolute and that there should be no legal limits or constraints on its exercise. They argue that there should be a marketplace of ideas from which the truth would emerge. But there are limits on any marketplace. No commercial marketplace should allow the sale of toys that are dangerous to children or foods that are harmful to health. That is why consumer goods are regulated. Equally, laws are needed to ensure that hateful and discriminatory expression does not cause harm to vulnerable groups in society.

For hundreds of years, the law has recognized the harm caused by defamatory speech. Anti-hate and anti-discrimination laws essentially achieve the same objective by prohibiting group defamation.

In Psalm 34, we are warned, "Guard your tongue from evil and your lips from speaking guile." As a community, we should strongly support free speech while, at the same time, we should continue to censure unbridled expressions of hatred.

Wolfgang Lotz, Israel's 'champagne spy'

Spies have fascinated Israeli film director Nadav Schirman since he was a child. "I grew up idolizing James Bond," he said.

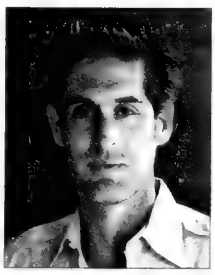
Schirman has parlayed his fascination with espionage into a gripping, prize-winning movie on one of Israel's most legendary spies, Ze'ev Gur Arie, or Wolfgang Lotz. The Champagne Spy, an Israeli-German co-production, took top honours in the documentary category at the 2007 Israeli Academy Awards and won the John Schlesinger Award for Outstanding First Feature at last year's Palm Springs International Film Festival.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Screened at the recent Toronto Jewish Film Festival, The Champagne Spy is about a Mossad agent in Egypt who melted into his undercover identity.

"Lotz's exploits in Cairo could make any James Bond fiction pale in comparison," mused Schirman, who made the movie with the support of the Israeli New Film Fund. "Espionage in glamorous circles. Fancy riding clubs. Exotic women."

Behind the facade was a person at odds with himself. Lotz grew addicted to his role, married a German woman while still wed to his wife and left the country for which he had risked life and limb.



Nadav Schirman

To Schirman, 36, The Champagne Spy is a cautionary tale about the place of family in a spy's career and the risks of assuming a double identity.

"Being a spy is a very lonely job" he said in an interview. "Lotz wanted someone to share his double life. Of course, it's crazy and goes against all the rules, but I still understand him. I think he felt very much at home in his second skin, living the life of a millionaire playboy. It's not surprising that he would want to hook up with another woman to reflect this new image of himself. There is a very high divorce rate among spies. Some have run off with women they met while on duty."

Lotz was born in Mannheim, Germany, in 1921. His Jewish mother was an actress and his Christian father was a theatre director. They divorced in 1931. With the rise of Adolf Hitler's Nazi regime, Lotz and his mother resettled in Tel Aviv. Lotz joined the Haganah, and during World War II, while serving in the British army, he was posted to Egypt.

He fought in the 1948 War of Independence and rose to the rank of major before being seconded to Israeli military intelligence in the wake of the 1956 Suez War.

Lotz was sent to Egypt – then Israel's most formidable enemy – to sabotage its budding missile program, which was developed by German scientists who had worked for Adolf Hitler, and to gather information about its weapons buildup.

Blond, blue-eyed and uncircumcised, with "Aryan" features, Lotz was the perfect candidate to pose as a wealthy German horse breeder who had been an officer in the Wehrmacht. As it happened, Lotz was in Egypt while his equally famous but doomed colleague, Eli Cohen, spied on Syria from his base in Damascus.

Lotz embarked on his mission from Paris, the European headquarters of the Mossad. Waiting for him in France was his wife, Rivka, and son, Oded. Typically, he would spend months in Cairo, return to Paris to recharge his batteries and reconnect with Rivka and Oded and then resume his activities in Egypt.

Lotz moved in Egyptian military circles and cultivated German expatriates. One of them, Waltraud Neumann, whom he met on a train, would become his lover and second wife. Mindful of his value, the Mossad grudgingly tolerated his bigamy.

Caught by the Egyptians in the mid-1960s, Lotz was put on trial as a German spy and sentenced to life imprisonment. He may well have been executed had his cover as an Israeli been blown. Waltraud was given a three-year sentence as an accessory.

Released after the Six Day War in exchange for some 5,000 Egyptian prisoners of war, including a handful of generals, Lotz was repatriated to Israel. He divorced Rivka and lived with Waltraud, but could not replicate in Israel the swanky life he had enjoyed in Egypt. A horse-breeding farm he bought with the Mossad's assistance went bust, and after Waltraud's death, he lost his bearings.

To pass the time and fatten his wallet, he wrote his memoirs, The Champagne Spy. After getting remarried, he settled in Germany, where he made a meagre living as a salesman in a Munich department store. He died in 1993, a broken man.

Several years ago, Schirman – whose father was a diplomat and Israel's consul consul general in Montreal from 1984 to 1989 – read Lotz's book. He was immediately intrigued, but unable to option it. "I was stuck," he said.

Wolfgang Lotz, left, an unidentified man in uniform and Waltraud Neumann in Egypt

One day, while Schirman sat by a pool as his son took swimming lessons, an older man engaged him in conversation. As they talked, Schirman told him he wanted to make a documentary on Lotz. Schirman had the credentials to make such a film. A graduate of Dartmouth College who had studied film in Tel Aviv and screenwriting at the University of California in Los Angeles, he had established a niche in Israel as a director of TV commercials. The stranger, who turned out to be Oded Gur Arie, said he could be of help. Two weeks later, Schirman got a call from him.

A 58-year-old business consultant who resides in Ann Arbour, Mich., and divides his time between the United States and Israel, Gur Arie remained silent about his father for 40 years. "I was proud to share his secret, and had no urge to tell my friends. My father's life depended on my silence."

But now he was ready to co-operate with Schirman, who has lived in Paris, Montreal, Brussels, Tel Aviv and the United States as his father, Shalom, filled a succession of diplomatic postings abroad.

Gur Arie showed Schirman eight-millimetre home movies of Lotz as he secretly visited Paris. "In those clips, I clearly saw how Lotz was gradually becoming more distant from his family, sinking deeper into his make-belief identity," said Schirman. "I knew I had a film there, an untold story about a spy. I saw a unique opportunity to examine the effect of spying on a family. Oded was extremely brave to open up."

Although The Champagne Spy unfolds from Gur Arie's perspective as a boy who adored his father, his testimony had to be supplemented by interviews with former Mossad officials. Schirman spent about a year gaining their trust. "You have to bear in mind that, for these people, exposure is the enemy. They thrive on anonymity and secrecy. But when they realized that my intent was not to criticize and reveal state secrets, but rather to tackle the emotional and personal aspect of their trade, they opened up to me."

Schirman also interviewed Nadja Kiesow, an Egyptian Muslim who was married to a German, who knew Lotz and who currently lives in southern France. "At first, she didn't want to discuss this affair, but I called again and again, and we had brief conversations in French. I presented myself as a Belgian director, since I was not sure how she would feel about Israel or Jews. After a year, she asked, 'Isn't Nadav a biblical name? Are you Jewish?' I hesitated before saying yes 'Why didn't you say so?' she asked. 'I have a lot of Jewish friends. We became very close, and today, she's like my adoptive grandmother."

Having finished the film, Schirman put on a special screening for some 400 Mossad agents and army intelligence agents and their families in Tel Aviv. The reaction was positive, and since then, the Mossad has used The Champagne Spy in group discussions about family and spying.

Gur Arie is pleased with Schirman's film, too. "I'm pretty much happy with it, though it misses some of my father's successes as a spy."

Although he has not forgiven Lotz for having betrayed and abandoned his mother, Gur Arie said he had a good relationship with him and considers him a hero. "He lived the life of Wolfgang Lotz. He was Wolfgang Lotz."

Volunteer helps kids to 'think before you act'

Uses chess to teach life skills to troubled children

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

When chess maven Ted Winick read an article about a day camp program that helps children with emotional challenges learn to control their anger, he immediately volunteered to teach them chess.

He said the article resonated with him, because he felt that the strategies utilized in chess, which basically boil down to "think before you act," would complement the skills the children were acquiring through a behaviour management program called SNAP.

He explained that SNAP, an acronym for Stop Now And Plan, was devised by the Child Development Institute, a Toronto-based mental health agency that serves 4,000 children under 12 and their families each year through a variety of programs.

The agency, which runs the camp where Winick has been volunteering, recently honoured him by naming him volunteer of the year, in appreciation of the services he has provided over the course of three summers.

He recalled making the connection with the agency in 2005, shortly after registering the Chess Institute of Canada, which he founded, as a charitable organization. "Our mission is basically a form of tikun olam, improving or repairing the world.

"I use chess to help the kids improve their life skills. Part of it incorporates the premise of thinking before you act and taking responsibility for helping others," he said. "My guideline or what I call my fundamental principal of chess, is consider the consequence of your actions before you do them, or think before you move."

Winick is now heading into his fourth summer at the camp, which has seen some 300 children with a variety of emotional and behavioural problems learn chess skills over the past three years.

The camp can handle 48 kids a month, he said. They are split into two groups of 24 each month – a younger group in grades 1 to 3 and another for grades 4 to 6.

"I go in twice a week and work with each age group to teach them principles of chess that can be adapted to life," Winick said. "I want to get these kids thinking so they can make better choices and start exhibiting better behaviour."

These are only a portion of the children, who have benefited from Winick's volunteerism. He offers chess to elementary school kids in the inner city through teenage mentors or by running classes himself.

"I'm training kids through their community service hours to be mentors and role models for the younger children," he said. "I am always looking for mentors. You don't have to be good in math. You have to be interested in the kids."

Winick noted that chess is becoming increasingly recognized as an educational tool.

"A number of countries and provinces are considering including chess in the curriculum, because of the academic benefits. It helps the children improve their math and reading skills, their concentration and their critical thinking skills."

He noted that when he first established the chess institute four years ago, most of the classes were after school and at lunchtime. "Now we're in 30 schools and the majority of classes are part of the curriculum.

"At the Paul Penna [Downtown Jewish] Day School, I run chess classes for every student as part of their curriculum."

Winick said that for centuries, rabbis have valued the skills developed through chess. "Ever since Abraham Ibn Ezra, one of the great medieval Jewish scholars, championed the game, Jewish scholars have long recognized chess as way of focusing the intellect."

On Aug. 1, Winick will be launching a new chess centre at Brunswick Avenue and Bloor Street, where he will be hosting a day that will incorporate chess and other games of strategy with sports and culture.

"The centre's chess education program will be for all age groups from four to 104."

He also runs the National Chess Camp at the end of the summer at Camp Wahanowin in partnership with the National Music Camp and the Nashman family.

Winick said he was honoured to be named volunteer of the year by the Child Development Institute. "It felt great. But more than that was the deeper satisfaction that my program is recognized as making a positive difference in the lives of these children."

For more information about the chess camps, chess education or the mentorship program, contact Winick at tedwinick@rogers.com.

all have a magic moment that opened our hearts. We came face to face with the good things and the bad things that drive humanity."

A defining moment for her, she said, was a banquet that took place on dancer Sharon Hampson's – of the children's singing group Sharon, Lois and Bram – 65th birthday.

"Fifteen elder women invited us to the banquet. There were 15 of us and 15 of them, and only one of them spoke English. The African women came in full traditional gear and tasted champagne for the first time.

"We proved that people can bond without language when we danced the horah together to drums, and when we all hugged and kissed good night."

Bleviss said that since she met Condello, "I have been moving in ways our culture does not promote. For the first time, it really feels good to be a woman. Dancing has freed me in ways I never thought possible. I may move less and less, but I will never stop."

The Vintage dancers will be performing in African outfits at a cabaret in November to raise money for a water reservoir in Dagbamete. For more information, e-mail Condello at sarina@sarinacondello.com.

Sandler made a difference despite MS

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Despite his own challenges and disabilities, Gary Sandler, in his 35-year battle with multiple sclerosis, was still able to be an inspiration and source of strength for many others who struggled with their own challenges.

Obituary

On July 1, Sandler, 56, suffered a cardiac arrest and died quickly and peacefully, just as he hoped he would, said his father, Al Sandler.

"He was overall, a great humanitarian, and the world is going to have a great loss because he was a mentor to hundreds of kids… He was a human being worthwhile being around, because he was so generous with his time and so good with children," he added.

Fay Sandler, Gary's mother, spoke about the kind of man her son was and his many accomplishments despite the obstacles he faced.

"He was intelligent and very kind and very full of life. He was one of those people who were larger than life," she said.

"He got MS at a very young age, about 23," she said, adding that he was determined to obtain his master's degree in business from York University and did so even after he was diagnosed with the condition in which the immune system attacks the central nervous system.

His mother said that following school, he worked for Wycliffe Homes, a construction company, for 10 years before he became a quadriplegic and decided to quit of his own volition.

"When he became a quadriplegic, he used that [experience] to do a lot of lobbying to get wheelchair accessibility to buildings in the city," Fay said.

"He started with Mel Lastman's Square. It was just being completed when he went up in his wheelchair… and he was appalled to find that the new square was totally inadequate in terms of accessibility. He met with the councillor and Mr. Lastman was involved, and they put a lot more money in and they re-did it to make it wheelchair accessible."

When he discovered that he had developed cancer in one of his kidneys, he decided that he would undergo the risky operation to remove the kidney.

"He could have just let himself die… but he decided to take the kidney out and said, 'If I survive, I will make a difference,'" Fay said.

His father explained that when he recovered, he lived up to his promise and became involved with the Hospital for Sick Children.

He got in touch with Arlette Lefebvre, a child psychiatrist who is on staff at SickKids, and they developed a website called Ability Online (www.ablelink.org).

"This program was designed to help kids of all ages who were sort of homebound and couldn't or wouldn't communicate. They were very depressed, they had no outlet for their feelings, they were frustrated, and it allowed them to interface with hundreds of other kids who may have had similar problems," Al said.

Gary's involvement with this program is one of the reasons he was one of the first recipients of the Courage to Come Back Award, given by the Clarke Institute of Psychiatry (now the Centre for Addiction and Mental Health) in 1993.

"Gary was the mentor or the point man of the program. As such, he became the godfather of all these kids. We keep getting letters and thank-yous from people he helped."

Friends and family have written messages of comfort to the family on the Steeles Memorial Chapel's online condolences book.

Sandler is survived by his wife, Vida, and his two sons, Daniel and Randy, as well as his stepchildren, grandchildren, siblings and parents.

Iran attack stories fuelled by speculation

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

In pursuit of a hot story, the media sometime rely on speculation rather than facts. This has certainly been the case in many recent reports about the likelihood of Israel attacking Iran's nuclear facilities.

The theories began percolating in the media after Israel staged a long-range military air exercise over Greece and the eastern Mediterranean. These June manoeuvres involved more than 100 F-16 and F-15 fighter planes, ostensibly in preparation for long-distance bombing assaults on Iran.

In "Strait front line in attack on Iran" (National Post, July 7), Matthew Fisher reported from the Canadian warship HMCS Protecteur, in the Strait of Hormuz, about what could happen "if recent Israeli and American threats to destroy Iran's nuclear program are carried out."

Fisher wrote: "As 40 per cent of the world's oil passes through the strait, any attack would cause a drastic spike in already volatile prices. If Iran responds by closing the waterway, as General Mohammad Ali Jafari, commander of the Revolutionary Guards, promised… some oil analysts have guessed oil might cost $500 (US) a barrel or more, with predictably calamitous economic consequences worldwide."

Fisher noted that Israel considers Iran's nuclear program an "existential threat." The fact that Iranian leaders have repeatedly called for the destruction of Israel means the Jewish state cannot just sit idly by while Iran becomes a nuclear power.

Israel is still counting on sanctions and diplomatic pressure from the international community to move Iran from its current course. But what if all else fails and Israel feels it has no option but to act militarily?

Fisher asked: "Could Israel successfully attack Iran? Could the Iranians really close the Strait of Hormuz or launch accurate missiles that could reach Israel?

"There are doubts on all counts, as there are doubts about whether Iran is within one or two years of building a nuclear bomb, as Israel says."

In "Mideast collision course" (National Post, July 5), Peter Goodspeed looked at what could prompt Israel to attack Iran. Goodspeed remarked: "The most obvious 'red line' would be proof Iran has produced enough highly enriched uranium at its Natanz facility to build a nuclear bomb."

Goodspeed wrote that "the U. S. intelligence community insists Iran stopped weapons research in 2003."

In fact, last year's U.S. intelligence community report, to which Goodspeed refers, only said there was a high probability that Iran had stopped its weapons program in 2003. But nuclear fuel enrichment, the most difficult part of the program, has moved ahead, while the weapons component could be restarted at any time. And many experts – not only in Israel – now believe the weapons program has been revived or was never really stopped.

Israel's assertion that Iran is close to building a bomb was underscored by Con Coughlin in "Iran has resumed A-bomb project, West says" (in the U.K. Daily Telegraph, July 7).

Coughlin asserted that "Iran's Revolutionary Guard, which has overall responsibility for the country's nuclear program, has set up several civilian companies to work on the program whose activities are being deliberately concealed from the United Nations nuclear inspection teams."

He reported that the Iranians are developing advanced gas centrifuges, which can greatly increase the speed of enriching uranium to weapons grade.

Coughlin also noted that, contrary to some reports that Iran might be prepared to suspend uranium enrichment in return for a package of economic incentives being offered by several world powers, Tehran has announced "that it has no intention of halting its uranium enrichment program."

After all, the very western countries, including the United States, that have promised to tighten economic sanctions on Iran have actually increased trade in the past year.

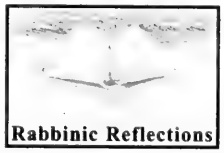
To improv the Torah

By RABBI YECHIEL M. GOLDREICH



The recent passing of Paul Sills was a true loss to the international performance art community.

Continuing in the tradition of his late mother, Viola Spolin, the founder of Theatre Games, he taught many students the value of improv performance. Improv maintains that faithfully following even the most random of offers can force a player into an act of creative discomfort. If you are told to act like a ballet dancer waiting at a bus stop, this creates dissonance as well as an interesting result. Heightening the stakes of the scene by detailing pirouettes onto the bus steps stretches the performer's flexibility and makes a situation even more interesting and of greater performance quality.

Improv theatre also provides an important model of how Torah Jews conduct themselves. Although the instructions are not random, they do often force us into creative discomfort. Our God-given list of life rules turns us into performers, ballet dancers at a bus stop.

We move to a music that no one else can hear. We follow instructions that the rest of the world knows nothing about. The tension between fitting into normal life and trying to properly follow the Torah produces creative dissonance, stretching our flexibility as a people and creating interesting solutions.

It took the infinite wisdom of the Almighty to let loose on the world a few million people who were instructed not to knit on Saturday or eat shellfish and see what we do to the place.

Despite our failings, we've done an admirable job so far.

The Torah rules themselves were never especially helpful to our lives. On the contrary, they usually pleasantly complicate things. Following the instructions of God has always been a labour of love. Skilled Torah scholars might disagree in determining how to carry out the essential parts of our performance, but at least they know the same tune. Although it may not be their direct intention, they enjoy learning and trying out new moves that they uncover in the heavenly will.

Sadly, not all Torah players understand it this way.

Some joyless souls exaggerate the creative tension. They think of it as painful. They create a very distasteful performance. On the opposite end, some apologists – well-meaning people – refuse to admit difficulties. Sometimes they speak of the material advantages of observing a Torah life. They too misrepresent the Torah to downplay the tension. A third group avoids the tension by changing the tune. They blather vaguely about "tikkun olam," turning the splendid music and breathtaking choreography into a muted, one-note, foot-stomping shuffle of their own creation. Perhaps this is all they themselves know, or perhaps they mistakenly doubt that the Children of Israel can handle the full range.

Whatever the case, we can only hope that every Jew can one day experience the full range of true beautifully complicated Divine Jewish expression.

May we all merit dancing in the circle that God will create for the righteous in the end of days.

Rabbi Yechiel M. Goldreich is the rabbi of Congregation Bnai Torah of Toronto.

A 95-year-old inspiration

IDEAS ON IDENTITY

By Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

"You are only as old as you feel." I learned from a wonderful 95-year-old woman that you are only as old as your attitude.

I received a phone call requesting information about my women's trip to Israel, a trip that specialized in both physical and spiritual activity, from a 95-year-old lady named Kitty. Oh-oh. I warned her: we'd be running from morning until night, eating dinner late and breakfast early. It would be a fast-paced experience, packed all day long. Long bus rides. Lots of learning sessions. She warned me in return: with all that activity, she was definitely up for it, but was I?

Our assumptions rose to the surface at our first pre-trip meeting. Ninety-five? Would we spend the trip worrying about her? Would she hold us back? Would we feel comfortable in her presence, to laugh or cry, letting our emotions show? Would she "mother" us all and somehow we'd feel patronized?

Our ageism cracked once we got to Israel. She led us in dancing at the top of the Ramon Crater. She was the first one to don the jangling scarf and learn belly dancing. She was the first one up on the camel, composing silly songs the whole ride to make us laugh. She squeezed every moment to its fullest. She asked pertinent questions, contributed to every session, sang every song, shlepped, laughed and cried, ate heartily and even drank at the bar with us more than once!

She was only disappointed when we wouldn't let her climb Masada. We made her take the cable car. When I reached the top, she greeted me with the exclamation, "Rabbi, I could have done it! And I will next time!" She exuded joy and passion. She was the essence of "l'chaim" – to life. She inspired us all.

As we get older, we keep redefining what old is. I used to think 30 was old, then 40, then 50. Now I simply don't know what "old" looks like anymore, because I've met people in their 40s who "act" old and people in their 90s who "act" young. But it's good to grow older, because, given the alternative, who wouldn't choose it?

No, not all older people will inspire us. Some are frail or ill, or have lost their memory. Some are truly crotchety old folks. Some don't grow in wisdom – they don't learn new ideas or try new things, and they're stubborn and set in their ways. But they have attained a degree of experience that's worth listening to, and they've lived through things we haven't and don't understand. Our community is, on the whole, wiser because of them, and we really don't engage them the way we should.

"Rise before the aged one," the Torah tells us. Kitty made us all stand up and look at ourselves anew.

Jewish Life

Paying for hostages

Money Matters

By Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

How much is a human life worth? While such a question may seem immoral to even ask, all societies place limits on the value of human life. We (thankfully) don't spend all our resources on health care, despite the fact that by diverting money to other endeavours, people will die.

Unfortunately, the realities of Jewish life forced our sages to deal with such tragic questions. Among the talmudic ordinances designed to promote tikkun olam – the betterment of the world – is that "one is not permitted to redeem captives for more than their monetary value," despite the fact that "there is no mitzvah as great as redeeming captives." Our commentaries have defined that value to be roughly equivalent to the value of a person's potential future earnings.

Individual needs are to be subservient to the needs of the community. Based on this ruling, the Maharam of Ruttenburg (in 13th-century Germany) refused to allow the community to ransom him from captivity. Only seven years after his death, with the payment of ransom, was the body released – the money given on condition that the "donor" be buried next to this towering rabbinic giant.

The Talmud posits two possible reasons why we must let the individual languish in captivity: the paying of an exorbitant ransom will have a detrimental financial impact on other communal needs, and giving in to kidnappers just encourages more of the same. The difference between the "practical" approach and "ideological" approach is whether we would allow a wealthy family member to pay the ransom themselves. While such a private ransom alleviates strain on community coffers, it nonetheless emboldens the kidnappers. Interestingly, the Talmud does not rule as to which reason is normative.

While such a discussion might be relevant when money is the motive – the Patty Hearst kidnapping comes to mind – it seems less so when dealing with political – i.e., terrorist – kidnappings in which monetary considerations play no role. In such cases, any wrong move can lead to death for the captives.

Interestingly, our commentaries are divided as to whether our refusal to pay too high a price for hostages applies even when there is an actual danger to their life. Do the normal rules of pikuach nefesh apply, whereby all is set aside in order to preserve the current danger to life? Or does the fear of strengthening the hands of terrorists compel us to potentially sacrifice the life of the current hostages so that even more people aren't placed at risk in the future?

In dealing with soldiers of the State of Israel at war, there are further complicating factors. In addition to concern for the individual soldier, there are national issues at stake. On the one hand, many have argued that the laws of pikuach nefesh have little or no application in a war situation – war by definition means risking one's life. On the other hand, doing whatever is humanely possible to rescue soldiers boosts the morale of all other soldiers. While the discussion in the Talmud is based on the assumption that the captives are redeemed alive, perhaps (and only perhaps) the concern for national morale might allow ransoming a dead body.

As the rabbinic decree forbidding us from redeeming captives was done for the overall benefit of society, there might be exceptional cases in which tikkun olam would warrant paying an exorbitant ransom. Thus, a Torah scholar, or even a young budding scholar, should be redeemed almost at all costs. So important is teaching, Jewish law insists that a teacher who is sitting shiva should get up from shivah and go to the "classroom" if the alternative is for his students to miss time from study.

Jews and the Olympics, Pt. 1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

In a few weeks, the entire world will be focused on Beijing, as elite athletes meet to compete in the 29th Olympic Games. Although Jewish competitors have shared in Olympic glory, historically Jews have had mixed feelings about the Olympics, ancient and modern. The fact that this year's Games are taking place in Beijing has added to the controversy.

In his essay "Why the Olympic Spirit Lacks a Jewish Neshamah," Eliezer Segal suggests that "whereas Jewish objections to Greek sports were primarily due to their inherently pagan character – as well as to their immodesty and frivolity – the Romans introduced a new dimension to the arena: cruelty which even surpassed that of professional hockey." One notable supporter of athletics was Israel's first chief rabbi, Abraham Isaac Kook, who believed in the importance of maintaining a healthy mind in a healthy body. That is, as long as the healthy body would permit Jews to better perform their religious duties. [tinyurl.com/5rfszv]

Richard Greenberg says that Jews can learn valuable lessons from Olympic athletes. In Olympics & Kavanah, he draws a parallel between the intense concentration that athletes use to visualize their goals and the kavanah, focus, used in the performance of mitzvot and recitation of prayer. However, Greenberg concludes by drawing a distinction between sports and Judaism. "In sports, winning is everything. But in Judaism, trying your very best can also get you to the medal stand." [tinyurl.com/5pg734]

Rabbi Mitch Smith is a certified sports psychologist who has worked with Israeli national teams. "To be the very best in life, we can take our cue from the gold-medal athletes. If we dream dreams for ourselves, if we summon the dedication and commitment to those dreams and take the steps necessary to achieve them … and if we cast our portion with something larger than ourselves, then we can hold our head proudly as we take our place on the gold medal podium of life." [tinyurl.com/6428qe]

As for these particular games, Jewish organizations have deliberated whether they should adopt a stand given China's human rights record. A coalition of 185 U.S. rabbis and Jewish community leaders recently released a statement urging Jews to boycott these games. "I am suggesting that Jews not spend their discretionary income supporting a regime that supports genocide in Darfur and suppression in Tibet, and provides missiles to Iran and Syria," Rabbi Daniel Freelander of the Union of Reform Judaism told the New Jersey Jewish Standard. "I think Jews can watch the Olympics [on television], but there is no positive reason for them to be present at the games." [tinyurl.com/4namjk]

In separate statements, the Anti-Defamation League, Agudath Israel and the Orthodox Union suggested that a Jewish boycott is inappropriate. "We, too, are deeply concerned about reports of human rights violations in China," said the Agudath Israel statement. "We believe, however, that it is presumptuous, and perhaps even counterproductive, for a group of private citizens to urge a boycott of the Beijing Olympics – and to direct their appeal specifically at members of the Jewish community." [tinyurl.com/5nkwrn]

Whether you are staying home or have tickets to the Games, there is much to learn about Jewish life in China. Jews may have arrived as early as the Han Dynasty in 231 BCE, and the story of Jewish community of Shanghai during the World War II is well-known. There is much more history, and the Wikipedia entry on Jewish life in China is a great starting point. Check out the excellent links at the bottom of the entry. [tinyurl.com/2msl9m]

Although only about1,000 Jews live in Beijing, a city of 17 million, kosher visitors to the ancient capital needn't go hungry. Dini's Kosher Restaurant offers western and Chinese food all under Chabad supervision. [kosherbeijing. com] Business is booming with tourists, and the restaurant is even attracting local clientele. Waiters bring new Chinese customers a handout to introduce kashrut, which is called jie shi in Chinese – clean food. Assistant manager Zhao Haixia has to explain the exotic fare like matzah ball soup and chopped liver. Some foods are more challenging to the local palate than others. "In China, eating cold fish doesn't sound so good," Zhao said. "Gefilte fish is a hard sell." [tinyurl.com/4u3mcl]

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Saving a life 'is an overriding mitzvah'

Or, people might actually be afraid of donating an organ. Why? Perhaps they give credence to the preposterous statements they may have heard, and attributed to some otherwise sage individuals, to the effect that if you donate an organ, you will come into the afterlife without that organ, as a punishment for having saved someone's life! This is so ridiculous as to defy comment, yet it circulates and does its own incalculable damage.

Imagine that God would punish someone for having fulfilled the supreme mitzvah of saving a life. Or that God, who generates life, cannot generate another kidney. Or that someone who donates a heart will walk around in the afterlife without a heart!

By the way, what happens to those who did not donate a life-saving organ, but nevertheless had a lung or kidney removed because of cancer? Do they likewise get punished for having cancer? The more we splice this, the more absurd it sounds, because it is absurd.

Not absurd is the presumption made by many that Judaism insists on burial after death, and that by donating an organ, that body part is not buried. The premise is correct, but the conclusion is not. The Torah obliges us to bury those who have died. That is clear. Equally clear is that saving a life is a vital mitzvah that is praised and encouraged as the most noble deed that we are humanly capable of.

Until this generation, these two concepts never met after death, because organ donation was not a viable medical procedure. That has changed in the past few decades, such that organ donation is now part of after-life care. The human body is sacred, both in life and after death. If after death, one can save a life with a body part, that is an overriding mitzvah, pikuach nefesh, that pre-empts the other competing mitzvah obligations.

We understand that one must treat the Shabbat as an ordinary day in order to save a life. The same logic applies to the mitzvah of burial, namely that the rule of mandatory burial is waived for that organ or part (cornea) used to save life, or sight, as the case may be. Admittedly, it will take more than a few years to have an entire faith community re-adjust thinking that dates back thousands of years, thinking that has given birth to a noble Jewish reflex: death followed by funeral and burial, done as soon as possible with no delays.

The reality is that donating organs after one has passed from the world is a difficult concept, and it takes only a slight blip to convince people to back off from it. We continue to face an acute shortage of organs, to the extent that every three days, a person in Ontario dies waiting for an organ.

Principle pre-empts other competing religious obligations

And to be fair, there are challenges, the most critical of which is assuring that the person donating an organ is dead according to halachic definition. For this, we have a major difference of opinion surrounding the issue of brain stem death, specifically whether it is a sufficient criteria to establish that the person is dead according to Jewish law.

The Halachic Organ Donation Society (HODS) has many rabbis associated with it who have signed their organ donor card. They have made this known in a public manner, and they have endorsed the brain-stem death concept. The issue is still not finalized, but it's still possible to be an organ donor even with this challenge. And in many places in Canada, DCD, short for donation after cardiac death, has been implemented to help save lives.

Since the principle of organ donation is a most laudable concept, it remains for us to find acceptable halachic mechanisms to make this possible. Those mechanisms are readily available.

Perhaps the best imagery to help change our mindset is to think of what we would want to happen if, God forbid, we would need an organ, for ourselves or for a loved one. We would want that organ to be readily available. In other words, we have no trouble being recipients. Therefore, we should think about being donors, because without donors, there are no recipients.

Another piece of imagery issue deals with the legacy we want to leave for posterity. Our wills deal mainly with our material possessions – who gets what after we are gone. Of even greater importance is what values and ideals we leave for our children and grandchildren for them to enlarge upon in their own lives. And added to the equation is what we want to do with our bodies – how much life we are ready to save with the body entrusted to us by God. What a marvellous legacy that gift of life would be.

Speaking of legacy and myths, I'd like to venture into another end-of-life-care matter related to the late Sam Golubchuk, of blessed memory. He is the Winnipeg man who wanted to live, who wanted to be treated so he could continue to live. He had suffered brain damage and was in a compromised state, but he was still able to communicate with his family in some manner.

His wishes clashed with the desire of some doctors and other health care providers to remove him from life support and let nature take its course, a course regarding which you can well imagine its direction and intent. This dispute, as it developed, was scheduled to be aired in court. Sam passed away before his case came to trial.

Sam did not leave any organs for donation, but he left his heart and soul with us. He left his courage, his determination and his fighting spirit. And he left a most important legacy.

There is a myth about this case that needs to be addressed. The fight that Sam's children waged on his behalf was not about imposing Jewish law on Canadian society. It was about the right to live, which is a most fundamental human right. The fact that most Canadians in Sam's state might have opted for being kept comfortable is totally irrelevant. What is relevant is that Sam – for reasons that he, like everyone else, is entitled to – wanted to live. No one had a right to deny him, or anyone else, that choice, that right.

The media, in their frenzy on this matter, poured a goulash of issues into the mix that were at best misleading and at worst inflammatory. The picture painted was of a fundamentalist Jew who was costing the province a fortune, who was jeopardizing health care, who was putting doctors into the uncomfortable position of having to care for someone they did not want to treat, to the point where a few of them actually resigned so as not to have to look after him.

The Golubchuks held their ground, and good that they did. In so doing, they did everyone a supreme favour. Until the next challenge, if it ever comes, people can rest more assured that if they want to live, even if others in their state would not, they will be looked after. Even more important is that no one, no matter what their position, will have the right to decide unilaterally, and against a patient's desires, who should live and who should, well, you know what.

The Golubchuk matter was not, is not, and should never be allowed to become a "Jewish" issue per se. The Golubchuk case transcends Jewish borders. It is a Canadian issue, a human rights issue, a "right to live" issue. As Jews, we are obligated to be concerned, because a Canadian human rights issue is by definition a Jewish issue.

And Sam Golubchuk, in his own way, was more than a organ donor. He was a donor, and champion, of life itself.

Palestinian village sues Montreal firms for war crimes

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Two Montreal companies and their director are being sued in Canada for war crimes for constructing residential units for an Israeli settlement on lands claimed by the Palestinian village of Bil'in, in the West Bank.

Legal documents filed last week in Superior Court in the District of Montreal allege Green Park International and Green Mount International, acting as agents of the government of Israel, are violating a host of international laws that govern conflicts, as well as Quebec's Charter of Rights.

Also being sued is Annette Laroche, sole director and officer of the two corporations. Two million dollars in punitive damages are sought, as well as an order to cease construction.

The court documents allege the defendants, "on their own behalf and as de facto agents of the State of Israel, are… aiding, abetting and assisting and conspiring with the State of Israel in carrying out an illegal purpose."

Mark Arnold, the Toronto lawyer who is acting for Bil'in and the village head, Ahmed Yassin, said the gist of the case is the assertion that Israel is violating the 4th Geneva Convention, which prohibits a state from transferring its population into territories it occupies. Canada has incorporated that provision into its domestic law and it applies to Green Park and Green Mount. Arnold said the lands in question are under the jurisdiction of the municipality of Bil'in and are part of Israeli-occupied Palestinian territories.

"Israel's policy is to put [its] population in the lands of the village of Bil'in, and that's wrong," he said.

However, an expert in international law suggests the suit is problematic at best, and faces jurisdictional and factual hurdles.

Ed Morgan, a professor of law at the University of Toronto and the immediate past president of Canadian Jewish Congress, called the claim "creative." But, he added, "I can see a few potential legal impediments to it."

The plaintiffs could run into a problem in dealing with the concept of "sovereign immunity," he said. That's the principle that prevents a Canadian from suing a foreign government or its agents. If the plaintiffs pursue its alternative claim, suing the companies and alleging they acted on their own behalf (thus removing the sovereign immunity defence), then the Geneva Conventions and other war crimes law would not apply, Morgan said.

Other legal obstacles include the question of extraterritoriality – applying Canadian law to a situation that has no real and substantive links to Quebec. And there is the question whether the village and its leader should have been the plaintiffs. It's likely the village did not own the land, which was most probably formerly Jordanian-owned state land, Morgan said.

Arnold said Israeli courts have refused to take jurisdiction on settlement issues, calling them non-justiciable. But he said there are important links to Canada that would give a Canadian court jurisdiction,: the companies "are registered in Quebec and as such are required to comply with the laws of Canada and international law."

The concept of sovereign immunity does not apply. "In this case, the wrongdoer is Canadian, subject to [Canadian law]," he said.

As to whether the village of Bil'in was the proper plaintiff, "the village has municipal jurisdiction," he said. "It is our belief the village of Bil'in has municipal jurisdiction over the land of Bil'in."

Bil'in, home to about 1,700 Palestinians, is 18 kilometres west of Ramallah and adjacent to the Israeli settlement of Modi'in Illit. The construction project calls for 42 new buildings containing 1,500 apartments, Ha'aretz reported.

OSCE to fight anti-Semitism in media, academia

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The parliamentary assembly of the Organization for Security and Co-Operation in Europe (OSCE), the world's largest regional security organization, has adopted another resolution against anti-Semitism.

At its 2008 annual meeting, held late last month in Astana, Kazakhstan, the 56-member body – comprising states from Europe, Central Asia and North America – passed a three page resolution titled On Combating Anti-Semitism, Especially its Manifestations in the Media and Academia, with a particular focus on the Internet.

One year ago, the assembly passed its Kiev Declaration, a comprehensive, six-page section on combating anti-Semitism, racism, xenophobia and "other forms of intolerance" throughout Europe.

Canadian senator Jerry Grafstein, the vice-president of the OSCE parliamentary assembly and a driving force behind the resolution, told The CJN last week that the latest motion is "far-reaching" and asks OSCE member governments to study it and report back next year.

It also addresses anti-Semitic "movements afoot" that target Jews online, he said.

In its preamble, the resolution acknowledges previous efforts by OSCE members to fight anti-Semitism and lauds the 2006 publication of the All-Party Parliamentary Inquiry into Anti-Semitism in the United Kingdom.

"Incidents of anti-Semitism occur throughout the OSCE region and are not unique to any one country, which necessitates unwavering steadfastness by all… to erase this black mark on human history," reads the sixth paragraph of the document.

Grafstein said that while the resolution passed by about two-thirds after its committee approval process, it was not easily done.

"There was a heated debate. The Nordic states and Britain in particular were against it," Grafstein said, adding those members thought that the resolution's phrasing might make people think that any critique of Israel would be construed as anti-Semitic.

The same countries also argued against the Kiev Declaration last year.

Grafstein said two sections in particular gave pause to dissenting members.

The first is section 16, which calls on OSCE member-states to condemn "the use of double-standards in media coverage of Israel and its role in the Middle East conflict."

Additionally, section 17 asks media outlets in OSCE member states to "have discussions on the impact of language and imagery on Judaism, anti-Zionism and Israel and its consequences."

Grafstein said he countered challenges to the inclusion of these sections by arguing that there should be no concern about valid criticism of Israel, "just the relentless, onslaught of criticism against Israel," citing a disproportionate amount of resolutions brought against Israel at the United Nations over the last 50 years.

He said the Germans and Americans were the "greatest supporters" of the Astana resolution.

Other provisions of the resolution include calling on members to prevent distribution of anti-Semitic TV programming; urging editors to refrain from publishing anti-Semitic material; developing a code of ethics to deal with anti-Semitism in the media, and preparing standards on "academic responsibility" to protect Jews and other minority students from harassment.

The resolution also contains "implicit criticism" of the upcoming 2009 Durban Review Conference in Geneva, Grafstein said.

In its final sections, the Astana document asks any OSCE member states who are participating in the conference to ensure that it will "not be misused as a platform for promoting anti-Semitism."

The first such conference – the United Nations World Conference Against Racism – was held in Durban, South Africa, in 2001 and was widely panned as a blatant anti-Semitic and anti-Zionist gathering that was hijacked by NGOs and Muslim states out to vilify Israel.

The OSCE parliamentary assembly will hold its fall meetings in Toronto from Sept. 18 to 21, when Grafstein said he will chair a discussion on issues facing the Middle East.

Similar suit filed in U.S. against other Lebanese banks

They are represented by professor Ed Morgan of the University of Toronto's International Law and Counter-Terrorism Project (he is also immediate past president of Canadian Jewish Congress); Montreal lawyer Jeffrey Boro, immediate past president of CJC's Quebec region, and Nitsana Darshan-Leitner, founder and director of the Israel Law Center (Shurat Hadin), an independent organization whose mission is to take the perpetrators and financial supporters of Islamic terrorism to court in democratic countries.

Nitsana Darshan-Leitner

While the 2001 Terrorism Act allows the government of Canada to prosecute acts of terrorism against Canadian citizens that occur anywhere in the world, this is the first time a private civil action has been taken on behalf of Canadians harmed by terrorism in Israel, Morgan said.

The claim alleges that, since 2004, the LCB permitted the Yousser Company for Finance and Investment and the Martyrs Foundation to maintain accounts and "to freely transfer substantial amounts of Hezbollah funds and to carry out significant financial transactions, within and without Lebanon, by means of wire transfers, letters of credit, checks and credit cards provided by LCB."

The amounts are said to have been "many millions of dollars," according to the Israel Law Center.

The centre was also involved in a similar lawsuit filed July 7 in the United States against several other Lebanese banks on behalf of a group of Israeli victims of Hezbollah attacks during the war, which lasted 33 days during July and August 2006.

The LCB, originally the Lebanese branch of the Royal Bank of Canada, according to the Quebec claim, is listed by the federal government's Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions as a regulated financial institution, and is therefore subject to Canadian law. The plaintiffs are not implicating the Royal Bank.

The suit details that several Hezbollah rockets struck the property of the plaintiffs, making them uninhabitable, and that they suffered psychological stress and that one of the women's health was seriously jeopardized.

Sappir, who was five months pregnant at the time, went into early labour, had to be hospitalized, and gave birth prematurely. She and her mother were relocated to a shelter for bombing victims for several months.

The Shalmonis were visiting Canada in July 2006 when a Hezbollah rocket partly destroyed their home, delaying their return to Israel by several weeks. They then had to live in a small apartment in Tel Aviv with 12 other people for several more weeks and lost employment income. They say their three children have been especially traumatized by the attack.

The $6.15-million sought includes $1 million in "punitive, exemplary and aggravated damages" for all the plaintiffs.

The Lebanese-based Hezbollah is identified by the federal government as an "Islamist terrorist organization" and, since 2002, it has been a criminal offence to directly or indirectly support it materially, including, as is specifically spelled out, provide financial services.

While Canada has not specifically named the Yousser and Martyr groups in its legislation, Morgan said, U.S. officials have drawn a clear link between them and Hezbollah.

The U.S. Treasury Department has identified Yousser as "Hezbollah's unofficial treasury, holding and investing its assets and serving as intermediaries between the terrorist group and mainstream banks." The department described Martyrs as "an Iranian parastatal organization that channels financial support from Iran to several terrorist organizations in the Levant, including Hezbollah."

Ed Morgan

Moreover, the plaintiffs claim it is "public knowledge" in Lebanon that these two groups are associated with Hezbollah.

The suit states that the LCB had "full knowledge that Yousser and Martyrs are part of Hezbollah's financial arm and that the financial services were being provided to Hezbollah… LCB and its management, officers and employees were grossly negligent in omitting to take measures to comply with section 83.03 and 83.08 of the Criminal Code and failed to take any reasonable steps to satisfy themselves that accounts and funds in LCB were owned or controlled by or on behalf of a listed terrorist group."

Darshan-Leitner said in a press release that the lawsuit "is only the beginning of the uncovering of Hezbollah's extensive financial network in Canada." However, it's not alleged that any of the financial transactions took place in this country.

Morgan said he expects the first court appearance to take place in August.

"This is very much a test case," he said, but he added that he's confident it will be heard by the Superior Court, because the defendant, the LCB, is operating in Canada, and its Montreal branch is, in fact, its only overseas outlet.

Suing Hezbollah directly would not be possible, because it has no official representation here, and civil action against a foreign government, such as Lebanon, is not possible under Canadian law as it currently stands.

A group of more than 50 Israeli citizens injured by Hezbollah bombings or who had relatives killed by Hezbollah attacks two years ago have filed a lawsuit in a Manhattan federal court against five other Lebanese banks.

These institutions are alleged to have provided financial services to Hezbollah's fundraising arm, the Islamic Resistance Support Organization, and it's alleged that U.S. currency was made available to Hezbollah through unidentified U.S. banks.

Lone Jewish director of public education retires

Led turnaround at Ottawa school board

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

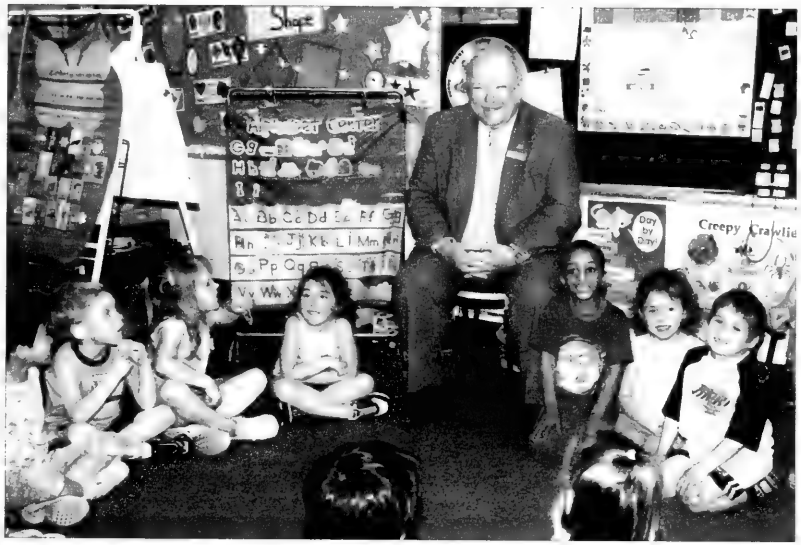
OTTAWA — Lorne Rachlis, the director of education of the Ottawa-Carleton District School Board (OCDSB,) the largest public school board between Toronto and Montreal, has retired after 37 years in the field of education, the last five in his present position.

From his early years as a science teacher, Rachlis progressed through the ranks to increasingly senior and challenging positions. "There are some people who enjoy doing the same thing over and over, but I needed to do something completely different about every five years, and my career allowed me to do that," Rachlis said.

Beginning as principal of the night school at Bathurst Heights Secondary School in what was then North York in 1975, he expanded the evening program from mainly interest courses and English as a second language courses to include a large selection of credit courses. He also extended the program through the summer by making it North York's adult summer school site, and then he expanded the program into daytime hours.

When Rachlis left in 1980, it was the largest adult continuing education program in North York.

"Over a five-year period as night-school principal, I turned what had been a small, winter night school into a full-year program, in effect creating one of the first adult day schools in Ontario," he said.



Lorne Rachlis in class

"The day school alone had 800 adults enrolled, with 800 adolescent students, and the non-credit day, evening and summer programs had 6,000 registration annually," he added.

As director of the Avon Maitland District School Board in Stratford from 1998 to 2003, he was instrumental in creating an e-learning distance education centre.

During the mid-1990s, Rachlis created a Grade 11 archeology course in Ottawa that allowed students to take a senior level credit for their diploma while spending three weeks in Israel. They spent a week on a kibbutz and then participated in archeological digs. Although the course was popular, the cost contributed to its demise.

Rachlis received an award, among several others, for creating and implementing the former Ottawa Board of Education's anti-racism and ethnocultural equity education policy. "The Ministry of Education used our processes and plans as an example to other school boards," he said.

Rachlis took the job as OCDSB director in August 2003, when the board was under provincial supervision after failing to balance its budget. It was created in 1998 out of a merger of two local boards. After almost five years of school closings and a re-organization, its budget is balanced and new schools are now being built.

> 'I will miss the opportunity to make things better for the next generation'

As well, Rachlis has overseen new initiatives such as the Education Foundation of Ottawa, the Outdoor Education Council and the Ottawa Student Transportation Authority, which were all created during his tenure.

Board chair Lynn Scott also noted that Rachlis "was the guiding force behind the now annual Student Recognition Awards, which recognize secondary students from across the district who are making a difference in their schools and communities."

As the only Jewish public school director in Ontario, Rachlis credits his religion with helping him grapple with complex decisions in his career. "My faith is at the core of my being, and it is through that moral centre that I filtered my actions as a son, a husband, a father and an employer."

A life-long member of Ottawa's Temple Israel synagogue, Rachlis served two terms on its board of directors and sat on the education committee.

Reflecting on his retirement, Rachlis commented: "I will miss the wonderful people I work with, the opportunity to make things better for the next generation through education, seeing the talents and inquisitiveness of children."

Rachlis will not be leaving the field of education completely, however. This fall, he will be teaching two courses in the master's of education program at the University of Ottawa.

Canadians to research water management in Israel

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — There are those who might describe Christine Melnick, Manitoba's minister of water stewardship, as a Zionist.

Melnick has visited Israel – both as part of official missions and on her own – four or five times over the past few years. And she is so impressed with the Jewish state's accomplishments that she has persuaded her cabinet colleagues to come up with $250,000 for the University of Manitoba to send masters and doctoral students to Israel for a year at a time to research water management.

The funding will be given out in 10 annual $25,000 scholarships.

"These important new scholarships will support scholarly development in a range of areas, including nanotechnology, water conservation and water reuse," Melnick said. "Today's students are tomorrow's leading voices on water protection, and these scholarships will give our young people a unique international experience as they complete their studies."

The new scholarship program, to be administered in partnership with the Jewish National Fund of Canada, will allow the Manitoba students to study at Israeli educational institutions such as the Weizmann Institute of Science.

"We worked out the funding with our Israeli partners," Melnick said. "Each student will be in Israel for one calendar year. We wanted to be sure that the student could afford decent housing and food, and be able to go out to a movie now and then."

The grad students would be paired with Israeli host families, to help out with their expenses and to make their stay more enjoyable.

It was while Melnick was on her most recent visit to Israel – a personal journey – in January 2007 that she learned a lot about Israel's record of water stewardship research. While speaking for the provincial government at the most recent JNF Negev Gala in June, she related how Rami Kleinmann, who was the JNF shaliach for Canada at the time, took her around to different Israeli water research projects.

"I was impressed that Israel has this entire infrastructure based on water stewardship," she said. "We have plenty of water in Manitoba, but we don't do a good job of managing it. We have a lot we can learn from Israel about water stewardship. Why reinvent the wheel when we can learn from Israel's expertise?"

The successful applicants for the program, Melnick noted, have to commit to working in Manitoba for two to three years after their return. "We will have positions for them in the Department of Water Stewardship, where they can apply their new-found knowledge. We expect that there may be quite a demand for their services."

Melnick said that she is not aware of any other government or university in Canada with a similar relationship with Israel. The first scholarship candidate will be announced at the upcoming international symposium on water management scheduled to take place in Winnipeg in August.

Melnick noted that the symposium and the new scholarships build on a partnership between the Jewish National Fund and Manitoba Agriculture, Food and Rural Initiatives in the interchange of agricultural and food-production technology.

Hillel goes green

By RIVA GOLD
Special to The CJN

MONTREAL — Like a childhood monster, Hillel is going big and green.

This summer, Hillel hopes to become significantly more sustainable and environmentally friendly, with a wide range of "green" projects planned for the year to come.

Samantha Banks, Hillel Montreal student president, started the initiative in May.

"Environmentalism is all the rage, and I'm really passionate about it," she says. "Looking at the pathetic backyard of Hillel House, I realized it was definitely time to go green."

Hillel's plan follows several other student-led initiatives to promote sustainability on campuses across Montreal. Concordia University has been called the most green-friendly university in Canada and has brought in guests speakers such as activist David Suzuki and former U.S. vice-president Al Gore to talk about the environment.

McGill University has also had a very active green movement and support for the project has been widespread.

"Students have noticed that there are ways we could be more efficient, more sustainable," says David Kogut, outreach co-ordinator of Jewish Campus Service Corps.

"They realize it, and through them, we realize it. Our members have expressed an interest in conserving energy and have proposed a number of projects."

Four major green Hillel campaigns are expected to run this year, with a particular emphasis on the compatibility between Judaism and environmental sustainability.

Rabbi Dov Whitman has suggested a Green Shabbat challenge, and the connection between Judaism and animal welfare has also been a popular topic amongst students.

Other plans for the year include rabbi-led sessions, talks on Israeli environmentalism and even a benefit concert for the environment.

Topics for sessions are set to range from the impact of toxic cleaning products to the water shortage in Israel.

"What we really want is to give students a broader perspective and an initiative to go green," Banks says.

Until then, Banks and her team are working on improving the Hillel House on Stanley Street.

"We're starting by adding recycling bins and composting, and helping the kitchen become more sustainable… Baby steps," she concedes, "but every hand helps."

Kogut notes that they also have high hopes for the Hillel backyard, where he hopes to grow fruit, which would be free for students. In the future, they plan to install light sensors, low-pressure shower heads, waterless urinals, bike racks, and two-flush toilets.

Banks and Kogut both feel that the Jewish student community is a great place for this initiative.

"Every community has a special responsibility towards the environment," says Kogut.

"It's crucial that everyone jumps in and helps. Just by putting a can in a recycling bin… it helps," Banks adds. "Once we reach this community, we can reach out to all of Montreal."

So far, students from across the country have readily offered their input and have come up with several project ideas. Hydro Quebec and the Office of Energy Efficiency have offered support, and funding options are presently being discussed.

"As much as I believe it's a fad, it's a very beneficial one, and I want to help get Jewish communities in on it," Banks says.

Child support: for how long?

Family Matters
by
John Syrtash
B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Counsel
Garfin Zeidenberg LLP
Family Lawyer & Mediator for 26 years

Question. If I'm married do I still have to pay the same amount of child support?

Answer. Yes. Even if you earned a small living and your ex-wife married Donald Trump you would still have to pay the same amount.

The amount you pay under the Child Support Guidelines is based entirely upon your gross yearly income, usually found at line 150 of your tax return for last year. The basic table amount payable is not based upon the recipient's income except in calculating payment for "extras", like orthodontics, post-secondary school tuition, certain extra-curricular activities (like hockey) and daycare costs.

Then you pay in proportion to each other's gross income. But the Court never considers the new boyfriend or husband's means, unless one is reconsidering spousal support.

Question. I am paying child support for children eight years and 12 years old. Until what age does child support have to be paid?

Answer. It is not by an age limit that Canadian law answers your question. Child support under the Divorce Act is payable until the children are no longer "children within the marriage."

This is generally understood to mean: no longer dependent. If a child uses his parent's residence as a home base (i.e. vacation breaks, weekends etc.), then child support is payable as late as the end of his first post-secondary degree, like a four-year B.A, although some decisions have gone beyond that.

If the child drops out of school and "bums around", then he's usually no longer dependent and child support ceases after a Court order says so.

Then again, if he's a drug addict and "bums around", one Judge declared that the addiction was a mental illness so the child was still dependent because of his "disability."

So, in many cases, child support is payable as long as it takes to find a good lawyer to stop it.

Hospital's high-risk pregnancy unit gets DVDs

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Melyssa Aronson and her husband, Michael Goldberg, were grateful for the care she received from Dr. John Kingdom of Mount Sinai's fetal medicine unit during three high-risk pregnancies.

They wanted to thank him in a tangible way and decided to donate a DVD library to the in-patient high-risk ante/postnatal unit and the neonatal intensive care unit (NICU) of Mount Sinai Hospital. The library was dedicated to Kingdom and the maternal fetal medicine group in May.

The DVDs include children's movies such as Mary Poppins; new releases and box sets from TV series such as Friends; old movies, like Casablanca and Spartacus new films such as the Harry Potter and the Oceans series, along with action movies and comedies.

The DVDs were donated by friends and family, and by Rogers Cable and other cable companies.

The DVDs are kept at the nurses' station on seven south – the hospital ward where most of the high-risk maternity patients stay – in a cabinet donated by IKEA. Five portable DVD players are available. Aronson said that the plan is to eventually have a player for every room.

Aronson, a genetics counsellor at Mount Sinai, knows only too well what it means to go through a high-risk pregnancy, including staying on bed rest so that the baby remains in the womb as long as possible. Her first baby, Noah, now seven, was born at 24 weeks' gestation.

While Noah is doing well in Grade 1 at Wilshire Public School, where he just received a courage award, his eyesight is poor and he has learning disabilities, which is not uncommon in very premature babies.

Aronson was considered high risk for her next two pregnancies as well, so she maintained close contact with Kingdom and the maternal fetal medicine group.

"I wanted to do something to help the women on seven south and especially to honour Dr. Kingdom. But Dr. Kingdom insisted that the whole unit be honoured."

Kingdom said he was humbled by Aronson and Goldberg's tribute.

Mount Sinai has the largest and most diversified high-risk pregnancy program in the country, Kingdom said. Each year, the hospital cares for 2,000 new high-risk patients and 1,000 women who previously had a high-risk pregnancy.

"We are a national centre for fetal therapy, such as for congenital heart disease," Kingdom said.

Mount Sinai is part of the Fetal Alert Network (FAN), an initiative of the Ontario Ministry of Health to help pregnant women whose babies may have birth defects. A high-risk pregnancy is not only difficult for the mothers, Aronson pointed out. Their older children who come to visit are tense and frightened, and the DVDs serve to entertain them as well as occupy them while the parents have some time to be together or talk to the doctors.

About Nutrition

Q. I am wondering if it is OK to drink tomato juice. I know many juices are high in sugar.

A. Tomato juice is great to drink, as it is much lower in sugar than fruit juice or other vegetable juices such as carrot juice, and it has very few calories, only about 60 calories per eight-ounce serving. Tomato juice is packed with vitamins and prostate-protecting lycopenes, and it has the added bonus of being filling without having a lot of calories. I think tomato juice is a good thing to order in a restaurant, on a plane, at a bar or at a cocktail party. It will help fill you up so that you don't load up on bread, hors d'oeuvres or salty, fried snacks. The only possible negative element here is that some tomato juice brands have a fair amount of sodium – so watch for that on the label.

Q. With summer approaching, I love berries, cherries, grapes and similar fruit, but I am never sure what a proper serving size is of these fruits?

A. Most people are surprised to learn how small a serving of these kinds of fruit are: one serving of grapes or cherries is about 10, a serving of strawberries is 1 cup, and for other berries, it is ½ cup. Don't shy away from these very nutritious little gems – blueberries, raspberries, blackberries, strawberries, cherries and the like are all full of fibre, antioxidants, vitamins and minerals. So enjoy!

Q. I have heard a lot about probiotics, and now I am seeing the word prebiotics. Are they the same thing?

A. Prebiotics are basically the tools for your body to create or grow or retain probiotics – the good bacteria that live in our gut and that we want living in our intestinal tract. Prebiotics typically come from inulin, a type of fibre found in some whole grain breads and cereals. Prebiotics help to feed the good bacteria so that they multiply and flourish and thus improve our digestive health. Both are very worthwhile as part of a balanced healthy diet.

Planning essential for senior years

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Estimates are that 21 per cent of the population in Canada will be over 65 by 2011. And the fastest growing demographic is people over 85 years of age.

These statistics, provided by financial security advisor Harold Goldberg, were the focus of a seminar held recently at the offices of usefulideas, a financial planning company in Toronto.

Goldberg pointed out that because people are living longer, they will need more money over the long term and an assured retirement income.

"If you preplan, you have a better chance of ensuring that the money you have will still be there and enabling you to plan your estate and adapt for inflation."

You must recognize, he said, that very likely, you will be, in some measure, dependent for five to 10 years, needing either some degree of home care or residence in a long-term care facility.

"These costs are not covered by government," Goldberg said. Neither are a number of drugs.

Also, he said, more people are self-employed and are therefore not part of any pension plan. "You have to take care of yourself."

The most common investment, he said, used to be the GIC, which, in the 1980s, gave 10 to 12 per cent interest. "Now you are lucky to get 2½ to four per cent – all taxable, and not even taking inflation into account."

The fear that you will run out of money is a very real one, he said.

Joel Rose, a principal at usefulideas, addressed other worries that can arise from the longer life span. For instance, he said, "women live longer than men. If your husband becomes ill, you will look after him. But if he dies, who will care for you?"

Other considerations, especially if you need long-term care, Rose said, are that staffing is frequently insufficient and personal care is at a minimum and you worry about who will look after you after you are in a facility if you can't advocate for yourself. This does not begin to address concerns about who will look after your money, he added. The yearly cost of private care for 34 hours a week is calculated at $37,544, Rose said. "That leads to a big hole in your funds."

Joanne Rose, also a principal of the company, noted that there are different phases of retirement. "Costs don't always escalate over the years – that's why planning makes good sense."

However, she said, planning should be done with care. "You need a contract. Then you need to understand the contract. You need an adviser who is able to explain things and is willing to take the time to explain."

The bottom line, she warned, is that 40 years of work now has to finance 40 or more years of retirement.

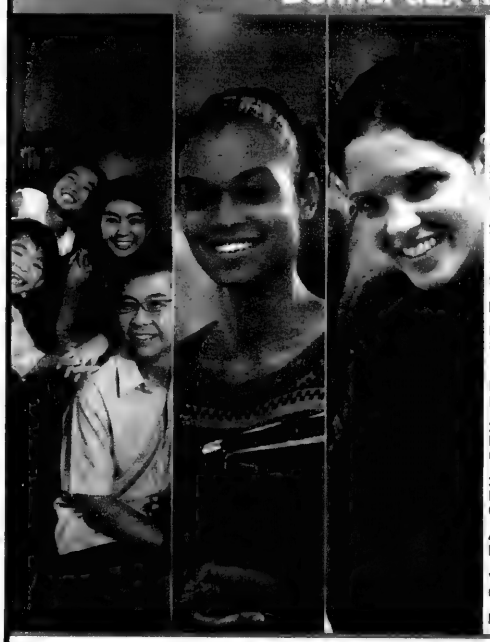
Giving newcomers a head start
Donner aux nouveaux arrivants un bon départ



The Government of Canada believes in immigration. We want more newcomers to join us and be an important part of Canada's future. That's why we are improving our immigration system by:

1. Creating a more flexible, fair and responsive immigration system
The changes to Canada's immigration laws will help to attract the skilled workers Canada needs most and ensure families are reunited faster.

2. Helping internationally trained individuals
The Foreign Credentials Referral Office was created in 2007 to help newcomers get the information they need to have their credentials assessed and recognized in Canada

3. Increasing settlement funding
The Government of Canada has invested $1.4 billion* more in settlement funding, which includes language training and job search and employment services to help newcomers succeed and make a new home in Canada.

4. Reducing the Right of Permanent Residence Fee
The federal government reduced the right of permanent residence fee from $975 to $490.

* Excluding Quebec. In Quebec, the Canada-Quebec Accord gives the province the exclusive responsibility for providing settlement and support services to all immigrants in Quebec in exchange for financial compensation from the Government of Canada (approx. $198.2 million in 2007-08)

Learn more at www.cic.gc.ca or call 1 800 O-Canada (1-800-622-6232) TTY: 1-800-926-9105

Le gouvernement du Canada croit en l'immigration. Nous voulons accueillir plus de nouveaux arrivants et que ces derniers jouent un rôle actif pour assurer l'avenir du Canada. Voilà pourquoi nous améliorons notre système d'immigration en prenant les mesures suivantes :

1. Créer un système d'immigration plus souple, plus équitable et mieux adapté
Les modifications apportées à la législation canadienne en matière d'immigration contribueront à attirer les travailleurs qualifiés dont le Canada a le plus besoin, ainsi qu'à réunir les familles plus rapidement.

2. Aider les personnes formées à l'étranger
Le Bureau d'orientation relatif aux titres de compétences étrangers a été mis sur pied en 2007 pour aider les nouveaux arrivants à obtenir l'information dont ils ont besoin pour faire évaluer et reconnaître leurs titres de compétences au Canada.

3. Accroître le financement en matière d'établissement
Le gouvernement du Canada a investi un montant supplémentaire de 1,4 milliard de dollars en fonds d'établissement, notamment pour financer les cours de langue et les services d'orientation et d'aide à la recherche d'emploi pour permettre aux nouveaux arrivants de s'intégrer avec succès au Canada.

4. Réduire les frais relatifs au droit de résidence permanente
Le gouvernement fédéral a réduit de 975 $ à 490 $ les frais relatifs au droit de résidence permanente.

 Exclut le Québec. Au Québec, l'Accord Canada-Québec donne à la province la responsabilité exclusive des services d'établissement et d'intégration des immigrants au Québec en échange d'une compensation financière du gouvernement du Canada (environ 198,2 millions en 2007-08).

Israel not afraid to take action against Iran: Barak

By YUVAL AZOULAY
AND YOSSI MELMAN
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak said last Thursday he favoured the use of diplomatic pressure and sanctions against Iran's nuclear program but cautioned that Israel was "not afraid to take action."

"Currently, the focus is international sanctions and vigorous diplomatic activity, and these avenues should be exhausted," Barak said during a speech at a Labor party meeting.

However, he added that "Israel is the strongest country in the region and has proved in the past it is not afraid to take action when its vital security interests are at stake."

Barak's remarks came hours after Iran test launched a second round of missiles in the Persian Gulf before dawn last Thursday. Last Wednesday, the Islamic republic tested nine ballistic missiles it claimed were capable to striking Israel.

Last Wednesday's tests prompted the United States to declare that it would defend its allies at all costs.

Last Thursday, Iranian state radio reported: "Deep in the Persian Gulf waters, the launch of different types of ground-to-sea, surface-to-surface, sea-to-air and the powerful launch of the Hout missile successfully took place." Iranian satellite channel Press TV said Hout was a torpedo.

Israeli experts have said that the missile launched as part of large-scale military exercise in Iran on Wednesday is not a more capable version of the Shahab-3 ballistic missile.

Revolutionary Guard Commanders said that the nine missiles tested were medium and long-range weapons, including some that are capable of striking Israel.

General Hossein Salami, head of the Revolutionary Guards Air Force, claimed on Iranian television that a Shahab-3 long-range ballistic missile had been tested, which is capable of travelling longer distances, with greater accuracy, and with a larger payload.

However, Uzi Rubin, who was a program director of Homa, under which Israel developed the Arrow anti-missile system, is convinced that this was not a new version of the Iranian ballistic missile.

"From what I saw, this is an old version of the Shahab-3, and contrary to their claims, it is not capable of reaching 2,000 kilometers, only 1,300 kilometres," he said last Wednesday.

Rubin raised the possibility that a version of Shahab-3, with a 2,000-kilometre range, has still not been tested or is still not operational.

"Without being hasty, I note that the Iranians have a tendency to exaggerate to a certain extent the capabilities of their missiles," he said.

The test-firing of missiles was aimed at showing Israel and the United States that Tehran is capable of responding to threats against its nuclear installations.

Recently, a large-scale Israeli air force exercise, comprising approximately 100 aircraft, carried out a sortie to a distance of 1,500 kilometres over the Mediterranean – the same distance from Israel to some of Iran's nuclear installations in Isfahan. The air armada included fighters, aerial tankers, electronic warfare aircraft, and search and rescue helicopters.

Iranian officials have strongly suggested the country's missile test last Wednesday was itself a warning to Israel not to attack Iran's nuclear facilities. Israel has left that option open.

Is an attack on Iran a big risk?

By YOSSI MELMAN
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The standard assumption is that a military attack by the United States or Israel to prevent Iran from developing nuclear weapons would be disastrous for the attackers and would threaten the stability of the entire Middle East.

Various experts outline doomsday scenarios for such an occurrence and warn especially of Iran's harsh reaction. Fearing the reaction of the ayatollahs has a paralyzing effect. Even before the first shot has been fired, Iran can credit itself with a success. It created an image of an omnipotent country that will not hesitate to use its power to respond and avenge a military operation against it. This is an impressive psychological achievement.

But a new paper, to be published this month in the United States, sketches a different and more complex picture. The paper is The Last Resort, by Patrick Clawson and Michael Eisenstadt of the Washington Institute for Near East Policy. The main point, notes Clawson in an interview with Ha'aretz, is that the success or failure of a military attack depends on many variables, and not just the degree of damage the attack would cause.

What are these variables?

The type of weapons chosen for the attack – will nuclear or conventional weapons be used? Who attacks – the United States or Israel? Will the attack cause serious collateral damage to the surroundings, that is, causing a lot of civilian casualties? Will only the nuclear sites be attacked, or other regime targets? After the attack, will President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad announce Iran's departure from the Nuclear Non-proliferation Treaty? If the attack completely destroys Iran's nuclear program, that is one thing, but if it does not, that is a different story. Then Iran will be able to continue to develop its nuclear program and the world will no longer care.

Nevertheless, what would be deemed a success – if the attack does destroy the nuclear facilities and it leads to a broad consensus in Iran that nuclear weapons are dangerous for the future of the regime or the nation? In other words, success or failure is determined by the political result of the military attack. The primary objective of the military option has to be to convince Iran to cease its nuclear program and that it's not worthwhile to continue. Destroying the nuclear facilities is not an end in and of itself – it is merely a means to an end. It is necessary to create the political conditions that will increase the chances for the success of the attack.

And what will be a possible result of an Israeli attack? Again, my answer is that it depends. Israel has to create the circumstances in which world public opinion will understand Israel and its motives, even if it regrets the attack.

That is more or less what happened with the attack against the nuclear facility in Syria. Israel benefited from President Bashar Assad's hostile attitude to the world, and therefore the international community showed understanding of the Israeli air force's attack. Israel did not have to do much because Assad did the job for it. In this respect, Israel also benefits from Ahmadinejad and his statements. They help Israel present its position to the world and explain the threat it faces.

Do you share the sweeping assessment of most experts that Iran's reaction, if attacked, will be harsh and painful? No. Iran's record when it comes to its reactions in the past to attacks against it, or its important interests, is mixed.

When the Taliban assumed power in Afghanistan and persecuted the Shiite minority there, Iran mobilized military forces on the border and threatened to respond, but in the end it did nothing. The same occurred when the United States shot down an Iranian passenger airline in 1988: Iran threatened to avenge the incident, but in the end the exact opposite happened. Not only did Iran not respond, but also the incident hastened its decision to agree to a ceasefire in the war with Iraq for fear that the United States was about to join the war on Saddam Hussein's side.

In another incident during the war, Iranian boats attacked an American naval force that set out to mine the Persian Gulf. The United States did not expect Iran to react, and was surprised. This did not stop it from sinking half of the Iranian fleet in response.

Iran has lately been threatening that if it is attacked, it will close the Straits of Hormuz and block the flow of oil, and thereby damage the world economy. But this is a problematic threat, since it would also affect Iran's friends and supporters, such as China and India. I have no doubt that in such a case, they would be angry at Iran.

But most experts estimate that in the event of an Israeli attack, the Iranians will respond with force and launch Shahab missiles at Israel.

It is possible, but first, the Shahab missiles are not considered particularly reliable. Iran deploys them without having done hardly any significant tests. Second, the Shahab's guidance system is not very accurate. The missile's range of accuracy is up to a kilometre. And finally, Israel's aerial defence system – the Arrow missiles – would certainly intercept quite a few Shahab missiles. Moreover, Iran's firing missiles at Israel would enable Israel to respond in a decisive manner.

My assessment is that contrary to the impression that has been formed, Iran's options for responding to an attack are limited and weak.

French Jews demand al-Dura probe

By DEVORAH LAUTER
JTA

PARIS — The organized Jewish community in France is publicly calling on President Nicolas Sarkozy to launch an investigation into the controversial television broadcast of an alleged Israeli shooting of a 12-year-old Palestinian boy.

Last week's call by CRIF, the umbrella Jewish organization, increased the pressure on the French government to intervene in the eight-year-old debate over the authenticity of the September 2000 video report by France 2 TV and its Jerusalem correspondent, Charles Enderlin.

The call for a probe lent new legitimacy to concerns that the broadcast was staged and sparked a new debate in the French media over the issue.

The video helped fan the flames of the second Palestinian uprising and spurred anti-Israel and anti-Jewish sentiment across the globe.

It showed Mohammed al-Dura and his father cowering in terror while trying to shelter themselves from gunfire. The film then cut to a slumped, motionless Mohammed lying in his father's lap.

Israel, after initially apologizing for the incident, said a subsequent investigation showed its troops could not have struck the boy from their positions.

Until recently, much of the French media tiptoed around the issue. The few French intellectuals who questioned the tape's authenticity were branded extremists.

The controversy stayed alive with the lawsuit involving a little-known media watchdog, Philippe Karsenty, who was sued for claiming the France 2 broadcast was a fake.

In May, an appeals court ruled for Karsenty, reversing a 2006 decision that had found him guilty of libel.

The anticipated public debate following that ruling, which included an exhaustive court examination into the Karsenty's claims, was slow to make French headlines. It was partly silenced as well by a petition signed by more than 300 French journalists and intellectuals denouncing the Paris court's decision for allowing "anyone" to "smear with impunity the honour and reputation of news professionals."

Now the issue is back in the limelight. It took editorials by left-leaning, respected figures such as France's former ambassador to Israel, Elie Barnavi, and the July 2 public appeal by CRIF to help crack the shell of what some have termed French "ideological and corporate protectionism" surrounding the issue.

"The winds are turning," said Pierre-Andre Taguieff, the author of La Nouvelle judéophobie, analyzing repercussions of the al-Dura broadcast.

Taguieff, the research director at the National Center of Scientific Research, was stonewalled at first by much of the French media and intellectual elite for his early, vehement questioning of the Enderlin report. "We're evolving now toward a real debate," he said.

Stéphane Durand-Souffland, the journalist responsible for covering the al-Dura story for the French daily le Figaro, considered by many to be the most important paper in the country, said that "the CRIF is a serious organization. If they ask Sarkozy to create this committee, it means it is important."

Seeking Sarkozy's intervention in media controversy

Durand-Souffland told JTA in a telephone interview that the CRIF demand and Barnavi's editorial in the left-leaning magazine Marianne, both proposing the same investigative committee, were more significant than Karsenty's claims.

Durand-Souffland covered the original Karsenty trial in 2006 but not the appeal.

"Nobody in France knows who Karsenty is," he said.

Durand-Souffland downplays the importance of the al-Dura incident and the Karsenty libel trial, but others say the al-Dura incident played a role in the surge of anti-Semitism in France following the outbreak of the second intifadah.

"The manifestations of violence against France's Jewish community were extremely strong" in 2000 and 2001, recalled the CRIF president, Richard Prasquier, during last week's news conference calling on Sarkozy to open an investigation.

"The Israeli-Palestinian conflict was transferred to France, and in that conflict the image that was truly emblematic was that of the al-Dura child," he said when asked why the CRIF should get involved in what some see as a Middle East problem. "It contributed to the beheading of Daniel Pearl and lynching" of Israeli soldiers.

Taguieff compares the al-Dura incident to the infamous 19th-century Dreyfus Affair in which a Jewish French army officer was wrongly accused of treason.

"The al-Dura affair is one of the major affairs of the beginning of the 21st century," Taguieff told JTA. "It has a symbolic strength that reminds a bit of something from the Dreyfus Affair, even if this is not an innocent man who is wrongly being accused – it is the Israeli army. And it is the Israelis who are being accused in the end of having killed a child in cold blood, almost with pleasure.

"The old anti-Jewish stereotype of the blood libel reappeared with the al-Dura affair, which is why it is extremely significant."

Sarkozy has yet to respond to CRIF's public appeal. Prasquier says he has written letters to the French president in the past on the subject and never received a response. He says the Karsenty trial paved the way for a more public demand, which he hopes will lead to a French committee of independent experts to investigate the subject.

If Sarkozy remains silent, Prasquier does not rule out convening an international "meeting" to address the issue. But he expresses hope it won't come to that.

"I have hope in France," Prasquier told JTA.

Karsenty says that Sarkozy's much-touted battle against the insistent problem of anti-Semitism in France will be put to the test by CRIF's public demand.

"Prasquier wants to put Sarkozy against the wall," Karsenty said. "If Sarkozy continues to cover up this anti-Semitic lie, we can doubt in the sincerity of his love for Israel and his fight against anti-Semitism. You don't fight anti-Semitism just by putting more police in synagogues."

Obstacles stand in the way of creating such a committee. The Israeli government has shown no inclination to launch an investigation into the tape's authenticity, and the Israeli Supreme Court ruled earlier this month against stripping Enderlin of his press credentials.

Both reasons could be used to suggest an investigation is unnecessary, Jewish community leaders say. That argument was raised during last week's news conference when an unidentified journalist asked why it was necessary to delve into the affair when "even the Israeli government had showed no inclination to do so."

Though Enderlin on his blog has favoured an investigation, he also questions it: "Why propose an international investigation all the while knowing that Israel refuses to have one?"

It is also unclear whether France 2 TV would co-operate with any investigation.

On the Jewish radio station RJC, the director of France 2 TV responded to CRIF's proposal last week. Arlette Chabot agreed to an examination of Mohammed al-Dura's father, Jamal, and his purported wounds from the attack.

The cause of the wounds, displayed in a France 2 TV followup to the 2000 incident, were identified by an Israeli surgeon as scars from a procedure he completed on Jamal in 1994 at the Sheba Medical Center at Tel Hashomer.

However, while assenting to Jamal's possible examination, Chabot did not definitively agree to the investigation proposed by CRIF. She said she believed the Jewish group had taken sides with Karsenty.

Chabot later said she would not oppose an investigation organized "without prejudice."

Olmert to quit if he loses

Ehud Olmert has agreed to step down as prime minister if he loses a leadership election in the Kadima Party. Under terms of a July 9 deal between Olmert and his biggest Kadima rival, Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, the party will hold a leadership election by Sept. 25. Should Olmert be ousted as Kadima chairman, his successor would form, and head, a new government by November, sources said. Olmert is widely expected to run for re-election in Kadima, though he hasn't confirmed this. Ha'aretz reported July 9 that he won't run. The early Kadima leadership vote was set during a power struggle last month between Olmert and Defence Minister Ehud Barak, whose Labor Party is Kadima's biggest coalition partner. Barak has conditioned remaining in the government on a shake-up in Kadima and signaled he would agree to stay on under Livni.

More questions for PM

Ehud Olmert faced a third round of questions by police in the Talansky case last week. The police had new queries about the prime minister's ties to Morris Talansky, a U.S. financier who testified to having given Olmert more than $150,000 (US) in cash handouts and unpaid loans. Olmert has denied the contributions were bribes and has vowed to step down if indicted in the case. Talansky was scheduled to make a second appearance in Jerusalem District Court this week, where he was to face cross-examination by Olmert's lawyers.

Facing a water crisis

Israel's water situation is facing "the worst crisis in 80 years," the head of the country's water authority said. Uri Shani, director of the Israel Water Authority, told reporters that Israel's major sources of drinking water, including the Sea of Galilee and the mountain aquifer, are below their "red lines," meaning they're not recommended for use. To alleviate the crisis, the Water Authority has started to pump water from tributaries that empty into the Sea of Galilee – water that wasn't expected to reach the sea or be used until 2010.

Anti-racism meeting held

More than 700 educators from around the world attended an anti-racism conference at Yad Vashem. Titled "Teaching the Shoah: Fighting Racism and Prejudice," it aimed to promote dialogue among educators dealing with the challenges of Holocaust education in countries with large multi-ethnic populations. Some of the 164 workshops dealt with teaching the Rwanda genocide, the challenge of Holocaust education for students with a Muslim background, and using the Anne Frank diary to combat prejudice in the classroom. The conference attracted participants from 52 countries.

Peres to join Olympians

Israeli President Shimon Peres will represent Israel at the opening of the Beijing Olympics. Peres will fly with Israel's Olympic delegation to the Aug. 8 launch of the Games in the Chinese capital, his office said July 10. According to Israel Radio, Chinese authorities have arranged hotel accommodation for Peres within the Olympics compound – an unusual move that will allow him to walk to the ceremonies, which take place on Shabbat. More than 40 athletes will compete for Israel in the Games, the Jewish state's largest-ever delegation.

Gates to get award

The American Friends of the Hebrew University, the school's U.S. fundraising arm, has convinced Microsoft founder Bill Gates to accept the inaugural Einstein Award, the group said last week. The award, to be presented to Gates in December at a gala dinner in New York, is named for Albert Einstein, who helped found the university. It will be given only rarely to those who have made a significant impact on humanity, according to the group's executive director, Peter Willner. Friends officials say this is the first time Gates is accepting an award from a Jewish or Israeli organization. Willner said Gates decided to attach his name to the university because of its vast work and research in sustainable agriculture.

Olmert won't be able to recover from this interrogation

By AMIR OREN

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Analysis

At noon last Friday, when the white cars with the blue flashing lights sailed on, Ehud Olmert ceased to be Israel's prime minister. Officially, certain procedures will still be required for an orderly transfer of power, but for all practical purposes, Olmert's tenure ended last Friday morning. A jaded public is no longer moved by the police interrogations of him: the shots of police arriving at the prime minister's residence have become boring.

But make no mistake: Olmert will not be able to recover from this latest interrogation in the corruption investigations against him and from the public response to its contents, once they are revealed. Reports of Olmert's interrogation will mean expediting the pace of his ouster from weeks to hours.

Two years ago, on the eve of Eldad Regev and Ehud Goldwasser's abduction on the Lebanese border, Olmert visited Israel Defence Forces headquarters and heard reports that filled him with satisfaction. But one of the generals, planning division head Yitzhak Harel, warned him that processes over previous years had created "a hollow army." Last Friday, as police Brig.-Gen. Shlomi Ayalon and his team prepared to interrogate Olmert, it must be said that in the Olmert case, the police have proved not to be hollow. Their conduct over the past two months has made up for earlier embarrassments and mishaps. In their handling of the Olmert case, the Israel Police has succeeded in demonstrating itself to be a professional organization that does not show favouritism, even when the suspect holds the country's top job.

Preparations by Ayalon's team of investigators were shrouded in secrecy, as if they were safeguarding strategic surprises – affairs yet unknown – and not just tactical surprises from the realm of envelopes. It's very possible that Olmert prepared well for the last war, utterly blind to the real threat impending in another sector.

If this turns out to be the case, the investigators and State Prosecutor's Office will be able to notch up an immense achievement. Last week, Olmert, his lawyers and spokespeople exhausted their energy on U.S. businessman Morris Talansky's cross-examination, on the legal inquiries in the United States, and on scandalous verbal sparring, without breaching the security wall of the police and prosecution.

As on the eve of his first interrogation two months ago, Olmert would have failed to know what questions were about to hit him and generate credible answers to them. The interrogators possess a fundamentally incriminating version of events, and Olmert will have to work hard to contradict it. He is a step away from an indictment on offences of fraud, aggravated breach of trust, and maybe also bribe-taking.

The corruption case against Olmert has been compared to a table with three legs. Even if each leg is slightly weakened, the others would still remain solid enough together to support the case.

So it will be useless to Olmert if the cross-examination finds that Talansky gave him only four envelopes in three places and not eight envelopes in five places. His problem last Friday morning was that he might discover that the investigators are bringing into his official residence another table, or tables – that in this battle, the Talansky affair is not the only aspect of Olmert's corruption troubles.

The moment of truth has arrived for Olmert, for Israeli society and for the political system that unthinkingly raised him up to the prime ministership and is about to bring him down.

Jewish refugees brief European Parliament

BRUSSELS — The European Parliament recently held hearings for the first time on the plight of Jews who were forced to flee their homes in Arab countries.

One witness, Prof. Carole Basri, an American whose family came from Baghdad, called the forceable displacement an act of "ethnic cleansing."

Basri said the political measures put in place by Arab countries were designed to displace their Jewish populations.

Iraqi-born Edwin Shuker told the hearing "we lost everything we had, we could not even take our family photos."

Shuker, president of the group Justice for Jews from Arab Countries (JJAC), gave a detailed account of the "black period" his family suffered under the nationalist Baathist regime in Iraq.

"Two refugee populations emerged from the Arab-Israeli conflict, both suffered, both were victims and justice requires equal consideration and redress," he said.

Late last year, researchers for JJAC uncovered documents dating to 1947 that showed that the Arab League counselled its members in ways of removing Jews and confiscating their properties. The Arab League's proposed law was approved by Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Iraq and implemented by other nations.

JJAC "found a paper trail that showed the displacement of up to one million Jews in Arab countries did not occur by happenstance," said JJAC executive-director Stanley Urman. "It was state-organized, state collusion led by the Arab League as a weapon in their struggle against the State of Israel."

The hearing was organized by Paulo Casaca, a member of the European Parliament. He said the rights of all ethnic and religious minorities in the Middle East should be protected, and he deplored the fact that the rights of Jewish and Christian refugees are virtually unrecognized by Europeans.

1948...They Were There

From Manitoba to Machal: Winnipeger recalls Israel's birth

'I felt a strong commitment to the future State of Israel, and these were desperate times'

By JENNY HAZAN
Special to The CJN

Three years ago, Alec Chapnick of Winnipeg, Man., had some shrapnel removed from above his eye.

Some 30 years prior, he had some taken out of his knee. Chapnick says there's plenty more where that came from, but not all of it can be safely removed with surgery.

"It's amazing how these things are still with me, 60 years later," said the 79-year-old Canadian veteran for Israel, who was injured by a landmine during his volunteer military service for the fledgling State of Israel during the War of Independence in 1948. "I guess they always will be."

When the United Nations declared its partition plan in November 1947 and Arabs from all six nations surrounding Israel began to show signs of imminent attack, Chapnick, then just 18 years old, was moved to act.

He became one of 3,500 people from 46 countries – including 1,250 from Canada and the United States – who rushed to serve as volunteers, Machalniks, in all branches of the emerging Israel Defence Forces. The volunteers also helped with Aliyah Bet, a movement of 10 clandestine ships that altogether shuttled 31,000 so-called illegal immigrants, Holocaust survivors from Europe, to Palestine.

Chapnick had just graduated from high school when he packed a bag and told his parents he was off to look for work in Toronto. Instead, he hopped on a train to New York City, where he had an appointment with representatives from the Haganah, the pre-state Jewish militia in Palestine.

"It was very difficult to get to New York then," Chapnick recalled. "The American authorities were stopping Jewish youngsters of military age from Toronto and Montreal at the border."

Chapnick was stopped in Niagara Falls, and after customs officials found a tallit in his backpack, they refused him entry into the United States. Eventually, after a few tries and a few more train rides, he made it across the border.

"I was determined to get there," he said. "So I did."

For Chapnick, volunteering for Israel was important because of his own family history. A Polish-born Jew, he moved to Winnipeg in 1930 with his immediate family when he was less than a year old. "The whole country [Poland] was full of anti-Semitism, and Jews that could get out, got out," he explains.

They left most of his family behind, and all but two of his cousins ended up perishing in the Holocaust.

"I felt a strong commitment to the future State of Israel, and these were desperate times," Chapnick said. "I felt it was my duty to volunteer."

When he finally arrived in New York, he made his meeting as planned, and in three days, he was on a ship, the SS Marine Shark, along with 30 other young Canadians, bound for France. Once in France, the Haganah confiscated their passports and issued each volunteer false displaced person papers. In France, the Canadians joined other volunteers from around the world in a DP camp, where they conducted basic training for a month before their next ship came in.

Then, late one night, their ship, a three-mast fishing sailboat, arrived to pick them up. "It was terrible," Chapnick recalled. "It was a four-man boat, and they piled 154 of us onto it. The place stunk of fish. There were no toilets or lifejackets. We had a fire on the boat, and the motor quit. There was only biscuits and orange juice."

After more than two weeks at sea, the little boat finally landed off the coast of Tel Aviv. Immediately, they were detained at a British army base north of Caesarea. The morning after they arrived, Chapnick, along with three other Canadians, escaped to Kibbutz Ramat Yohanan, and finally, in mid-June 1948, they made it to the Tzrifin artillery base south of Tel Aviv.

All four of them were assigned to the 72nd Infantry Battalion. "There was only one weapon for four guys, and I was the fourth guy on my rotation, which means that three men had to die in order for me to get a rifle," Chapnick said.

"For the first six months, we didn't get uniforms. We fought in civilian clothes."

Chapnick's first mission was to Mishmar Haemek in the Jezreel Valley. There, he decided to switch units and join the anti-tank forces. "In those days, you could do that," he explained, adding that at the time, soldiers didn't have numbers or dog tags, and everyone was learning as they went along.

Chapnick was re-assigned along with five others. On their first mission, they hit a landmine. Everyone but Chappy, as he was affectionately called by his fellow comrades, was rushed to the hospital in Afula.

"I flew up in the air and I had shrapnel in my leg, face, and arms, but the other guys were in much worse shape," he said. He was operated on the following day, but "they couldn't get it all out."

After a week in hospital, Chapnick was sent out to battle again, this time as an officer. He hitchhiked back to his base, was assigned to a new unit, made up of two soldiers from his old crew and three new ones, and headed out to Kfar Giladi, a battlefront on the Lebanese border. They patrolled there for nearly a month.

Then, on Oct. 21, 1948, his unit was sent to Be'er Sheva to take part in Operation Yoav.

"I remember the night, because it was my 19th birthday," Chapnick said of the six-hour battle that ended in Israel's victory over the Egyptian army. "I told myself I couldn't die that day, and I never fired a shot."

After almost two months patrolling Be'er Sheva, Chapnick was sent to Eilat, via the Scorpion Path. "This was the most boring time of my life," Chapnick said of the six weeks he spent in the southern town. "There was nothing there, save for a hut built by a British archeologist who was exploring the area."

When the war began to wind down with the signing of the various armistice agreements, 1½ years had passed since Chapnick joined up. He, along with 15 other Canadians and South Africans, decided to start a moshav at the northern end of Tel Aviv on the HaYarkon River. They called it Beth Hever.

Alec Chapnick

Chapnick later returned to Winnipeg, intending only to stay for a month to visit his parents before returning to the new moshav, but while he was there, his father fell ill.

"Eventually, I didn't go back," said Chapnick, who recently retired from a 50-year career with the London Life Insurance Company in Winnipeg.

He didn't return to Israel for 28 years. When he finally did go back, he was shocked at what he saw.

"I thought I knew Israel, but things had changed in so many ways," said Chapnick, who was pleased to discover that his moshav, now known as Kfar Daniel, still existed.

While there, he reunited with the remaining six founders and their families. He was also delighted to discover that the British archeologist's hut had been preserved in the courtyard of one of Eilat's large luxury hotels.

Since that initial trip, Chapnick has returned to Israel with his family eight times. His last trip, in 2003, was with a group of Birthright Israel youth from Canada. He was one of six Canadian veterans for Israel who joined groups of Jewish youth on their first 10-day trip to Israel to teach them about the places they had served in 1948.

"I was there at such an important historic time. I was there for the first Yom Ha'atzmaut parade. I voted in the first Israeli election. But for anyone who is 60 or younger today, Israel has always existed for them. They don't remember a time before there was a state," Chapnick said.

"It was quite an interesting experience for them, and quite an emotional one for me."

Jewish actor grows up on screen

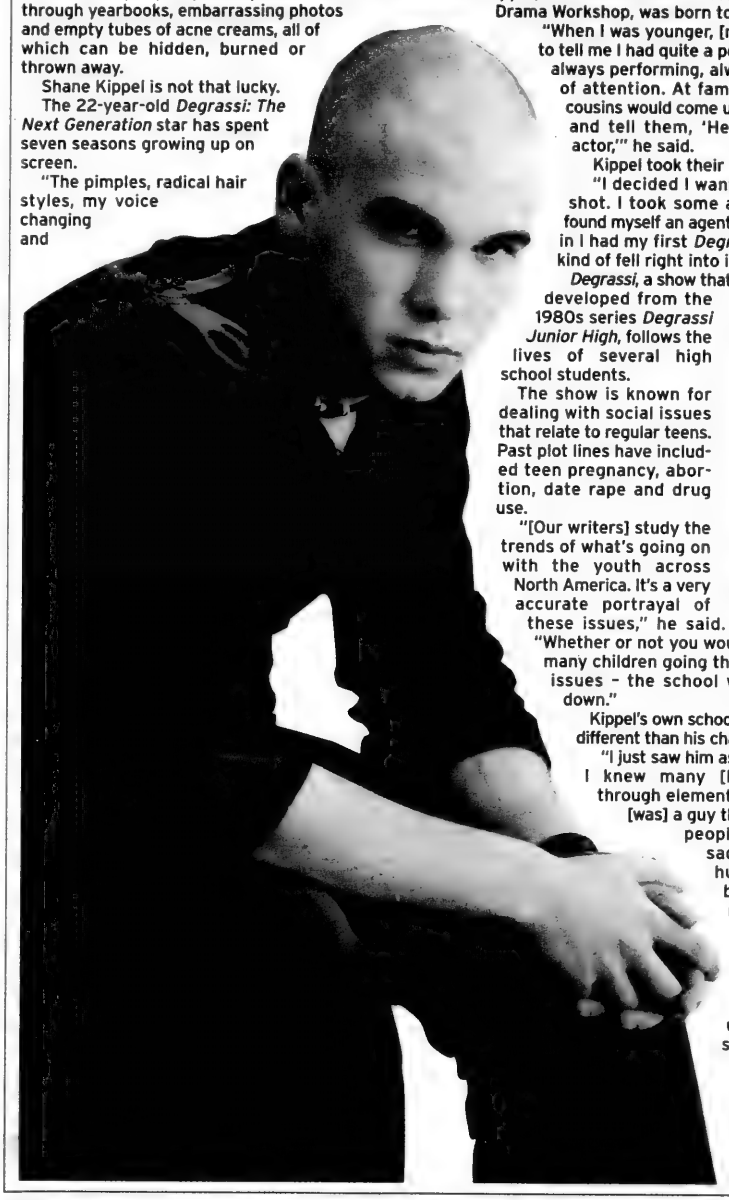
By RITA POLIAKOV
CJN Intern

For most people, puberty is documented through yearbooks, embarrassing photos and empty tubes of acne creams, all of which can be hidden, burned or thrown away.

Shane Kippel is not that lucky.

The 22-year-old Degrassi: The Next Generation star has spent seven seasons growing up on screen.

"The pimples, radical hair styles, my voice changing and cracking, all this stuff is easily accessible," he said. "When I'm 40, I'll still see how I looked when I was 14 and really want to crawl under a rock."



Kippel, who trained with Second City and the Drama Workshop, was born to act.

"When I was younger, [my family] used to tell me I had quite a personality. I was always performing, always the centre of attention. At family gatherings, cousins would come up to my parents and tell them, 'He should be an actor,'" he said.

Kippel took their advice to heart.

"I decided I wanted to give it a shot. I took some acting classes, found myself an agent and six months in I had my first Degrassi audition. I kind of fell right into it."

Degrassi, a show that developed from the 1980s series Degrassi Junior High, follows the lives of several high school students.

The show is known for dealing with social issues that relate to regular teens. Past plot lines have included teen pregnancy, abortion, date rape and drug use.

"[Our writers] study the trends of what's going on with the youth across North America. It's a very accurate portrayal of these issues," he said. "Whether or not you would ever find as many children going through as many issues – the school would be shut down."

Kippel's own school life was a little different than his character, Spinner.

"I just saw him as a typical bully. I knew many [bullies] going through elementary school. He [was] a guy that liked to bug people for his own sadistic sense of humour. I got bullied in elementary school, and it was cool to get to play the opposite of what I was used to," he said.

Kippel's high school experience was different than that of his friends. Unlike most teenagers, he had a full-time job.

"I feel I grew up and matured a lot faster than many of my friends. It kind of laid the groundwork to have me be financially secure and to know how to budget properly," he said.

Along with the financial benefits of acting, Kippel also enjoys working with the cast of Degrassi.

"What's great about us is we're a cultural mosaic. We have Christians, Catholics, Jews, Muslims, we have every different type of skin colour," he said. "We all formed mutual respect for each other, we watched each other grow."

Kippel is one of several Jewish actors in the cast.

"In my personal life, I find it very important to celebrate holidays," he said.

"I'm very defined as a Jew, but it doesn't define who I hang out with and respect in any way."

Kippel's favourite Degrassi episode was when his character dealt with cancer.

"That was just my epitome of hard work and intensity," he said. "I work closely with my acting coach. It's a draining experience. I'm trying to go to very dark places that I didn't even know I had."

> Playing a cancer patient forced Kippel to tap into "dark places" within.

Kippel, who was born in Toronto, admits that his experience as an actor would be very different across the border.

"It would be much more glamorous [in America.] If we were an American drama, we would be making $500,000 to $1 million an episode. We would be on magazine covers, we'd possibly be followed around by paparazzi," he said. "[In Canada] it's a much more humbling experience. You get to focus on the art much more. We're removed from red-carpet events."

As his acting career develops, Kippel would like to get into comedy.

"It's still in the works," he said of his comedic career. "I've taken notes from the best comedians, who say when they notice funny things in everyday life, they write it down. I was doing that for a very long time. I've written half a [standup] routine," he said.

With the help of his friends, Kippel decided to turn his routine into a script, while they were working on a short film at the same time.

"It's more of an artsy piece. The entire point of the short film is just to show what we can do with different camera angles. After we build a portfolio, I'll really get down to forming jokes."

While the young actor is considering attending York University, he would like to continue acting for as long as possible.

"There are so many things you get to experience, so many different people you get to meet," he said. "I want to be a working actor at some level for the rest of my life."

Jewish actors lighting up Stratford this season

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

They hail from two different cities and have different skill sets, but Marc Kimelman and Sam Strasfeld are two Jewish actors breathing life into the same play at the Stratford Festival this year.

Strasfeld, 27, and Kimelman, 28, both appear in Cabaret, an evocative musical set in the late 1920s and early '30s just as the Nazis were about to tip the scales of German society toward unspeakable evil.

The Canadian Jewish News reviewed the play on June 12.

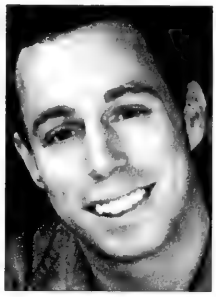
During a break in their hectic schedules last week, Strasfeld, a native Winnipegger, and Kimelman, a Torontonian, spoke to the paper about how Cabaret has had an impact on them from a Jewish perspective.



Marc Kimelman

Sam Strasfeld

Strasfeld, now in his third season at Stratford, plays a character named Kalman Ratz and said he felt deeply connected to the play.

"Being in Cabaret... feels like my family's history. My grandparents were from Poland and fled the Nazis to find shelter," Strasfeld said. "I'm a first-generation Canadian on my father's side, and this story resonates with me. The last scene of the show... the other day it broke my heart because [the central Jewish character] Herr Schultz, condemns himself to death by choosing to stay in Germany and not go to America. Because he still has hope for Germany, but you know that things are only going to get worse" for the Jews.

For Kimelman, who is debuting this year at the festival as one of the play's "swings" – actors who, when necessary, take over small parts at a moment's notice – the experience has been deeply moving.

"The show I did previous to [Cabaret] was Fiddler on the Roof. So I've had an interesting year where these two shows have allowed me to connect with my ancestors as I never have before," he said. "With Cabaret, I've had the luxury to do research on that time period and reconnect with my people."

At one point, Kimelman had to rehearse dressed in full Nazi garb. The experience reduced him to tears, he said.

"I couldn't look at myself in the mirror. I was just weeping. I was a mess," he recalled. "But I realized it was important to tell this story as genuinely as we can."

Strasfeld said that in April he organized a mass Pesach seder for the cast of Cabaret, as a means of creating a familial feel for the production and to help his fellow actors get a sense of what it means to be Jewish.

"Cabaret is about inclusion and the seder is one of my favourite activities," Strasfeld said. "I know not everyone will get to experience one, so it was wonderful to do for them. There is such an incredible devotion to our art [in Stratford]... for me that's one of the things I love about it."

Kimelman concurred, saying that the casts and crews in Stratford "push you to do as much as you can [and] they really excel at doing new things with musicals."

Strasfeld added that Frank Moore, the actor who plays the central, Jewish character in Cabaret, Herr Schultz, loved the seder experience.

"Herr Schultz's storyline is tragic. The woman who he's in love with can't see past his religion," he said.

Aside from their work together in Stratford this year, both Kimelman and Strasfeld have worked extensively in Ontario's arts industry and are thoroughly enjoying life in their chosen profession.

Kimelman is an accomplished choreographer, whose work can currently be seen on CTV's Degrassi: The Next Generation.

He has also worked with renowned soul singer Chaka Khan and with Canadian folk-rock icon Neil Young.

Google Kimelman's name to view some clips of him in dance rehearsals and public performances. He said his technique was heavily influenced by the dance stylings of Gene Kelly and Michael Jackson.

"When I was a kid, I used to dress up in a leather jacket and do after-dinner shows at home for my parents... and go crazy dancing like Michael Jackson," Kimelman said, laughing.

Strasfeld, a talented dancer and choreographer in his own right – he trained with the Royal Winnipeg Ballet – recently provided tap-dance choreography for the Soulpepper Theatre production of Time of Your Life and just finished a turn as Clay Aiken in the Mirvish production We Will Rock You.

"That was so much fun. The character was soooo far removed from myself," he said, laughing at how acting can sometimes bring you to roles you never thought you'd play.

"But that's the beauty of our profession, getting to play all these parts," he added.

Having started acting and dance early on in life, both men know the importance of approaching the arts world with a solid mixture of drive, humility and self-promotion.

Asked what advice they have for aspiring actors, Kimelman responded, "Branch out to as many teachers as you can. I never stayed at any one acting or dance studio for too long. That really benefited me as a teen. Be a sponge and take in what many teachers have to offer. Don't get too comfortable and get yourself out there. Go to interviews and show your face so people know you."

Strasfeld concurred, adding, "You're not gonna succeed in this industry unless you're passionate about it. And see as much theatre as you can. The more you can immerse yourself in all aspects of this world, the better."

Strasfeld considers himself fortunate to have steady work doing what he loves. And while he would happily branch out and try new venues for acting, such as TV and film, he admits that his theatre schedule leaves little room for other projects. Not that he's complaining.

"The human race loves song and dance. I'd love to see a revival of the old classic, Gene Kelly [dance] films for a new generation," he said.

As for Kimelman, he's excited by the current abundance of reality TV dance shows such as So You Think You Can Dance.

"That's now come to Canada, and people will really be able to see the talent we have to offer," he said.

Kimelman added he plans to take some time off soon to travel and perhaps settle down in New York for a time, where there is "an abundance" of dance opportunities on Broadway and TV.

Catch them both in Cabaret while you can.

The play runs to Oct. 25. For more information, visit www.stratford-festival.on.ca.

Malta – a small country with a big heart

By MYRIAM SHECHTER
Special to The CJN

VALLETTA, Malta — Every country I have visited had something special to offer.

When we were planning to visit Malta, I knew beforehand what that special thing was going to be: its intense sense of history, spread over 7,000 years, starting with the mysterious, megalithic monuments predating the pyramids by a millennium. Through the centuries, there had been more or less friendly conquests by Phoenicians, Carthaginians, Romans, Byzantines, Arabs, Normans, Aragonese, French and finally the British.

I was also counting on being attracted to Malta's charming Mediterranean setting. Straddling the sea between Europe and Africa is a string of three lovely islands: Malta, the main island; Gozo, green and slower paced; and Comino, practically uninhabited but one of the main summer tourist playgrounds with its beaches and beautiful Blue Lagoon.

I was excited to explore Maltese (Malti), a fascinating Semitic language originating with the Phoenicians and augmented by the period of Arab domination, sprinkled with many inserts from the nearby Italian speakers.

I was also curious about the British tradition left from 150 years of British presence, a legacy that influenced the way of life of the Maltese in different ways, most noticeably in the fact that all Maltese speak English as well as Maltese and that they drive on the left side of the road.

I got all this, as expected, and much more.

Indeed, Malta's history is unique and quite extraordinary, but what touched me most during our visit to Malta was the people, these friendly, gregarious, generous, exuberant people. We made many friends in Malta – our hosts from the apartment we rented, the bakers next door, taxi drivers and people on the street.

We loved the food, basically Mediterranean, but also with local favourites such as the mouth-watering pastizzi, pastries filled with cheese or peas, and the local drink, the flavourful Kinnie, a soft drink made with oranges and herbs.

Due to its small size and efficient transportation system, Malta is easy to explore. We enjoyed the capital city, Valletta, with its gorgeous auberges of the Knights of St. John fame. The auberges were the living quarters of the various groups of knights. We also enjoyed the Co-Cathedral, replete with art; the stately Grand Master's Palace; the steep streets; the many museums, restaurants and shops; and the superb panorama from the Upper Barakka Gardens over one of the best harbours of the Mediterranean.

We travelled all over the islands: from Marsaxlokk, a lovely fishing village with the colourful luzzu boats, to stately Mdina, a city where quiet and serenity reigns, and to the historic Citadel of Victoria on Gozo Island.

The traditional brightly painted fishing boats luzzus owe their design to the Phoenicians. Still in use today the luzzu has survived because it tends to be a sturdy and stable boat even in bad weather. [Robert Shechter photo]

EL AL IT'S NOT JUST AN AIRLINE, IT'S ISRAEL

Eye on Arts

By Bill Gladstone

SUMMER LITERARY COLUMN: ADVENTURES OF A YIDDISH LECTURER

I believe that Isaac Bashevis Singer, Philip Roth, Norman Levine and probably numerous other Jewish writers have penned comical stories and reminiscences about their experiences delivering lectures on various subjects to Jewish audiences. To this list we must add the relatively unknown name of Abraham Shulman.

An American essayist and former contributor to the New York Daily Yiddish Forward, Shulman published Adventures of a Yiddish Lecturer, about 30 years ago, a collection of humourous stories about his cross-country podium experiences. I first read this obscure volume years ago and found it just as funny when I read it again this summer.

Singer, who like Shulman was a longtime writer at the Forward, wrote a short introduction commending his colleague's book and noting the difficulties inherent in giving lectures to Jewish audiences, particularly first-generation immigrants that he saw as being full of contradictions and inconsistencies.

"It isn't easy to lecture to such people," Singer observed. "They ask countless questions; they're full of just and imagined claims and grudges. They're disappointed by a world which didn't follow the plans which their leaders had mapped out. They are always pathetic, often tragic, and frequently comical."

Shulman arrived in New York from Europe in the '50s and spoke briefly at the Forward's reception in his honour. Afterwards a man from an important Jewish agency told him, "You have the tongue of a speaker. It's a gold mine," and invited him onto the Yiddish lecture circuit. Shulman hit the road to speak on such subjects as Yiddish literature, folklore and Jewish humour.

Once, scheduled to address a Jewish society near New York, Shulman arrived to find the members in the midst of a heated quarrel over whether to allow "strangers" to purchase plots in their cemetery. They couldn't even agree over the proper protocol of introducing their guest speaker, who had been crammed into the evening's agenda. When one member rose to welcome him, another jumped up to object that the first had been out of order. After half an hour the chairman motioned Shulman to the dais, announcing that his topic was Jewish humour and that "he will be as brief as is humanly possible." When Shulman started to tell a joke the chairman raised his hand, saying "Let's stick to brass tacks."

At another lecture on the humour of Menachem Mendel Seforim, the chairman demanded strict decorum from the audience, inhibiting their laughter even while Shulman was reading one of Seforim's funniest passages. "Mr. Birenbaum," the chairman berated one man who couldn't control himself, "if you want to laugh, you may go home. There you may roar like a wild donkey. Not here. This is a cultural institution."

Shulman once arrived at an empty hall, wondering if he had made a mistake. Several minutes after he was due to begin, the audience arrived in two buses and filled the room. Someone in their society had died and they had just come from the funeral. His topic was "The Sublimity of Jewish Humour."

On another occasion only a few executive members turned up for his serious lecture on Fyodor Dostoevsky. Soon after he began, he was interrupted by the secretary, who had just remembered that another person, Mrs. Zaydenbaytel, was in the building. The chairman insisted she be fetched immediately. Mrs. Z. was reading a book by Sholom Aleichem in the library and preferred to stay where she was; the chairman, however, was adamant that she "must fulfill her duties as a member and take part in our cultural activities." Mrs. Z. again refused to budge; the secretary and treasurer were sent back to her a third time. "Two minutes later the door opened with a loud bang. Mrs. Zaydenbaytel, a massive woman, was brought in by the secretary and the treasurer, both tightly holding on her elbows."

Defiantly, she kept reading her book, occasionally chuckling very loudly. Finally, the chairman signaled Shulman to stop, and told Mrs. Z. she could read if she wished but absolutely had to stop disrupting the lecture with her laughter. "Impossible," she replied. "You simply can't read Sholom Aleichem and keep your mouth shut."

Once, Shulman was about to begin a lecture on Isaac Bashevis Singer when a middle-aged woman with heavy makeup and large earrings began scrutinizing and flirting with him. Why do "they all come running," she wondered aloud, observing that he didn't seem particularly handsome, virile or muscular? "I'm curious about your power," she told him, adding that she had made a list of all his "conquered fortresses" and wouldn't mind becoming a conquered fortress herself.

Mystified, Shulman sought to extricate himself as he heard the master of ceremonies summon him to the podium; the woman blocked his path. "He's not calling you," she said. "He's calling someone named Shulman." When Shulman explained that his name was, in fact, Shulman, she glared at him in disbelief. "You're not Isaac Bashevis Singer?" she asked. As he began his lecture, she noisily stormed to the door and demanded her money back.

Israeli reality TV show promotes aliyah

By AMY SOBERANO
Special to The CJN

An Israeli reality television show that is similar to Big Brother will put the process of making aliyah onto the international screen.

HaOlim (The New Immigrants) is set to launch this fall and will introduce the concept of Israeli immigration into the burgeoning synthesis of television and reality.

"We want to share the experience with people who haven't made aliyah and want to know what it means," said Noam Shalev, managing director of Highlight Films, which is producing the show.

HaOlim will follow eight English-speaking Jews as they attempt to begin their lives as Israeli citizens. The contestants, half of them men and half women in their 20s, will share a Tel Aviv home and pool their finances in partial simulation of the kibbutz lifestyle.

Equipped with little or no knowledge of Hebrew, the olim must compete against one another in various tasks that mirror the different challenges olim faced building the State of Israel. As the show progresses, contestants will be eliminated based on votes cast by the Israeli audience, as well as by online viewers in the Diaspora. The process will also include three judges, who interview and evaluate the participants.

"The candidates we're looking for are mostly young and single, and want to start their adult life in Israel," said Shalev. "Younger audiences will be attracted to it, but I think every Jew with some Zionist connection, or who wants to know more about Israel and what it means to live here, will find a lot of interest in the show."

The series will conclude with the crowning of the Ultimate Oleh, a title supplemented by a golden ticket into Israeli society, complete with a luxurious beachfront apartment in Tel Aviv, a new car and a dream job.

Because Highlight Films is still conducting the final stages of the candidate interviews and the show has yet to air, the potential contestants are legally prohibited from offering any insight into the future of the series.

However, HaOlim will soon be accessible to people all over the world through online streaming.

According to Shalev, many Jews, although familiar with the idea, do not understand the reality and implications of moving to Israel.

"It's an abstract term," he said. "If you live outside of the country and all you know about Israel comes from the news, then you think it's a place of war and violence on the edge of survival. It's not like that. People do live good lives here, and I think Jews around the world should know that."

Kessia Lurie, 20, who is seriously contemplating making aliyah from Los Angeles, said that HaOlim may not portray the harsher realities of the process and therefore may not be consistent with the producers' initial goals.

"Although it will promote aliyah to the broader audiences, it might minimize the difficulties that people face as olim in this country without the constant support of a TV series," she said. "When you're an oleh, you might not have any support to fall back on."

Although somewhat skeptical of the program's ability to encourage people to move to Israel, recent oleh Debbie Katz is hopeful that it will indeed affect positive change in the Jewish community.

"I really hope that the show does fulfil the goal of promoting aliyah because this country needs people to come, along with all of their education, ideas and ideologies, to help the state progress," Katz said.

Maltese-Jewish community numbers 90

History stares you in the face wherever you visit on the islands: extraordinary megalithic temples can be explored on Malta and Gozo. The Knights of St. John's fortifications, cathedrals and palaces tell not only of centuries of warfare but also of architectural and artistic achievements.

The history of Malta also attests to a continuous Jewish presence on the islands. The small Jewish community goes back 3,500 years, when Israelite mariners from the seafaring tribes of Zebulon and Asher arrived in Malta, together with the Semitic Phoenician settlers. Menorahs carved on the walls of catacombs in Rabat confirm the existence of a community living here during Roman times.

During the Middle Ages, Jews settled here from Sicily, Sardinia, Spain and North Africa, and lived an independent and prosperous life. The majority were shopkeepers and merchants, but some held prestigious posts, such as Abraham Safardi, who was the island's chief physician.

In 1492, the Jews of Malta, like those of Spain, were told to either leave or convert to Catholicism. Many of the names found today in Malta carry the heritage of the conversos: Ellul, Salamone, Azzopardi.

During World War II, Malta rescued thousands of Jews from Nazi Europe, accepting them without a visa.

The current Jewish community, about 90 people, includes longtime residents, as well as more recent arrivals, both Sephardi and Ashkenazi. A very resourceful group of people, they bring in matzah from England and kosher wine from Israel, and a rabbi from Jerusalem officiates during High Holy Days.

A view of the "three cities" from Valletta's Barakka Gardens. The harbour was severely bombed by the Axis in World War Two.

Abraham Ohayon, the synagogue president, keeps an eye on the community activities that include a Hebrew school, Shabbat services and bar and bat mitzvah preparation. The community is in close contact with Israel.

Alas, our two weeks in Malta flew by too fast. On my last day, a quiet sunny day, I returned to my favourite place, the Upper Barraka Gardens. I sat there with the turquoise Mediterranean sparkling below, with a view of the three fortified cities of Cospicua, Vittoriosa and Senglea across the harbour, and my can of Kinnie next to me, revisiting my freshly acquired memories of a great visit, of superb views, incredible history and the nicest people.

A moderate Arab voice from Jordan speaks out

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Marwan Muasher is a key political figure in Jordan. The chief spokesperson of Jordan's delegation at the 1991 Madrid Middle East peace conference, he was subsequently the first Jordanian ambassador to Israel.

He was then minister of information, ambassador to the United States, foreign minister and deputy prime minister. For about the past year, he has been a senior vice-president of the World Bank.

And now he has written an important and timely book, The Arab Center: The Promise of Moderation (Yale University Press), in which he describes his role as a peace envoy and a force for constructive change in the Arab world.

Muasher, a liberal reformer who abhors Islamic radicalism, admits that Jordan's 1994 peace treaty with Israel was "a leap of faith for his country and himself." Although he considered himself "a champion of Arab-Israeli peace," he hesitated before accepting the ambassadorship to Israel, his relatives having encouraged him to turn down the job.

His first impression of Israel was that it was more developed than Jordan, but that it was by no means a superpower. Tel Aviv struck him as a melange of old Beirut and Europe.

He was determined to speak about the Arab-Israeli dispute candidly, but not in a spirit of confrontation. Still, he wanted Israelis "to know that peace with Jordan could not substitute for a permanent agreement with the Palestinians and that all the problems with the Arab world had not been solved."

During his first few weeks in Israel in 1995, he worked out of the Dan Hotel in Tel Aviv, receiving a flood of Israeli Arab visitors. Muasher, a Christian whose mother is a Palestinian from Jaffa, had a special interest in Israel's Arab minority and visited almost every Arab community in his 10 months in Israel.

Among Israeli Jews, he recalls, he was "an instant celebrity," being invited to their homes, functions and events. As a result, he formed lasting friendships with Israeli Jews.

He learned that Israelis live with a deep sense of insecurity and constantly seek reassurance. He also discovered that many Israelis are from Arab countries and appreciate Arab culture, a fact he should have known had he done his homework. In the end, he found Israelis to be "very defensive [and] aggressive."

Muasher has a firm grasp of the issues and states his opinions clearly.

After the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks in the United States, he notes, Jordan stepped up its efforts to promote "a model of tolerant Islam" and sought "to rally the silent moderate majority" of Muslims into rejecting "radical teachings." Later in his book, he refers to Al Qaeda's "deviant form of Islam" and its "crime against humanity."

Mostly, though, Muasher deals with the dynamics of the Arab-Israeli conflict, whose details he has mastered.

Jordan's policy was to facilitate peace by means of relevant United Nations resolutions, he says. "The old notion of wiping Israel off the map was deemed unrealistic, not only by Jordan but also by Egypt."

He charges that Israel was not really serious in negotiating with the Palestinians until the 1993 Oslo accords, saying that its web of settlements in the West Bank pre-empted the land-for-peace formula, as set out in UN resolutions 242 and 338.

He adds that the Labor party's "Jordanian option" and the Likud's "Jordan is Palestine" mantra was nothing less than a "conspiracy" to establish a Palestinian state outside the Palestinians' historical homeland in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip at Jordan's expense.

Muasher explains that King Hussein severed legal and administrative ties with the West Bank in 1988 to ensure that the effects of the first Palestinian uprising would not spill into Jordan.

In his view, the Palestinians only agreed to participate in the Madrid conference thanks to Jordan's persistence.

"Madrid was a watershed in the history of the Arab-Israeli conflict," he observes. "The conference was the sum of decades of efforts by the moderate Arab countries and the international community to negotiate a peaceful settlement to the conflict."

He believes that Israel's participation was "not genuine," claiming that the Israeli prime minister of the day, Yitzhak Shamir, used it to "buy time to build more settlements in the occupied territories."

The Oslo accords, he writes, took Jordan completely by surprise. Jordan was initially apprehensive, fearing that Israel and the Palestinians had "cooked up something against Jordan's interests." But once the dust settled, he acknowledges, Jordan realized that Oslo could be beneficial for the Palestinians and itself.

According to Muasher, King Hussein and then-Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin laid the basis for the Israeli-Jordanian peace treaty at a meeting in London in May 1994.

Rabin assured King Hussein that Jordan's vital interests, particularly concerning Jerusalem and Palestinian refugees, would be taken into consideration. "This set the stage toward resolving other pending issues – borders and water being the most prominent."

Marwan Muasher meets Yitzhak Rabin on April 11, 1995.

As foreign minister, Muasher worked assiduously to ensure that the Oslo process would succeed. One of his first objectives was to convince Yasser Arafat, then president of the Palestinian Authority, "to take serious action against suicide bombings," which, he thinks, hurt the Palestinian cause. "Arafat gave us nothing," he laments.

Muasher takes credit for having convinced U.S. President George W. Bush to adopt the 2003 "road map" peace plan, which eventually fizzled out. He blames Israel and the Palestinians for the failure.

"The Palestinians could and should have done a lot more to deal with the security situation by closing the arms factories, confiscating illegal weapons, freezing funds that were going to illegal organizations, closing the cross-border tunnels through which arms were being smuggled, and implementing a comprehensive security plan."

Israel violated the spirit and letter of the road map, he says, by launching incursions into the West Bank and by refusing to ease measures at checkpoints, release far more Palestinian prisoners and halt targeted assassinations.

In particular, Muasher is critical of Ariel Sharon, the then-prime minister who, he says, was "not interested" in a "permanent solution."

Condemning Israel's separation barrier, he says it has "severely damaged the prospects of a two-state solution and continues to stymie negotiations today." Its true purpose, he says, is to unilaterally establish Israel's new borders.

In the final chapters, Muasher talks about the urgent need of Arab governments to promote such long overdue reforms as good governance, economic well-being and inclusive decision-making. He warns that "radical ideologies" will triumph unless these reforms are implemented.

Arguing that reform has been impeded by the Arab-Israeli dispute, he urges "the Arab and Israeli centres" to defeat the extremists.

For peace to prevail, however, Israelis and Arabs must agree on a solution that meets the needs of both sides.

Easier said than done.

Montreal wrestler on his way to Beijing

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

David Zilberman is beyond thrilled. On Aug. 21, the 25-year-old Montrealer will be in Beijing, competing in his first match there and hoping to be on his way to a medal as a freestyle wrestler at the Olympic Games.

He is one of only 20 freestylers from around the world in his weight class – 96 kilograms – getting the nod to go to China.

It's select company, and Zilberman, who stands five-foot nine-inches tall and is all lean muscle, knows it and appreciates it.

"It's a dream come true to be able to go to represent my country, something I've wanted to do from the moment I started wrestling," he said in a telephone interview. "The selection was very tough, very tough. Everyone was fighting for those last few spots."

They were fighting at the three-day Swiss Grand Prix Selection Tournament in Martigny in mid-April, the first wrestling selection meet for Beijing, where wrestlers from more than 40 countries competed.

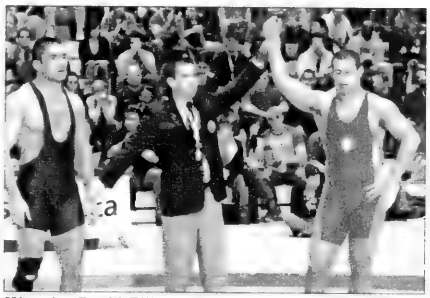
Zilberman came home with a bronze medal, and that was enough, since the top four wrestlers from each weight class in Switzerland were picked for Beijing.

Getting there was worth the wait, he said.

"Everyone is really happy, really excited for me. It's a great thing to have my friends and family behind me, the people that I train with to be so positive and supportive of it all. It's really special, really an emotional thing."

Zilberman will also go as a member of the famed Montreal Wrestling Club based at the YM-YWHA. The club was set up at the Y more than 20 years ago by Zilberman's coach and dad, Victor, who has an established reputation as one of Canada's finest – and toughest – coaches, and who is leading the Canadian team to China.

Victor Zilberman trained Montreal's best wrestlers at the club, as well as at Vanier College and Concordia University. For a number of years, the club left the Y in the late 1980s, before eventually returning in the 1990s and developing a new generation of talent under Zilberman. At least one other Montreal Wrestling Club wrestler, Martine Dugrenier, is a sure thing for Beijing and another, Cleo Ncube, is a definite possibility, David Zilberman said.



Wrestler David Zilberman, right, is named victor of a match against Khetag Pliev of Toronto at the 2008 Canadian Olympic Team Trials last December in Toronto.

"Yeah, he's a good coach, a very good coach," he said with a laugh. But having his own father oversee him makes no difference, Zilberman insisted.

"It's no different with the Olympic Games than it is with the World Championships or World University Championships or the Nationals," he said. "He's my coach, he's my father, but we're past all that now. It doesn't change a thing."

With his selection, David Zilberman joins a not-so-long list of other Jewish Canadians who have also gone for gold at Olympic Games of the past, among them Phil Oberlander (1964), Garry Kallos (1984) and Andy Borodow (1996), the latter two having also trained under Victor Zilberman's wing.

Still, it's all a far cry from where David was about a decade ago, when he finally agreed to take up wrestling at his father's urging, even though he was mostly a baseball and hockey fan.

Zilberman has been hitting the mats ever since, getting huge support from Canadian wrestling figures like Montreal's George Reinitz, a former national champion who has picked up the tab for the Y's modern wrestling facilities and has been a longtime booster.

Zilberman, who majors in leisure sciences at Concordia University, has racked up scores of wrestling medals and titles over the decade, including athlete of the year at Concordia, being named an "all-Canadian" and senior nationals champion several times, and been at or near the top other times at the World University Wrestling Championships and Seniors World Championship. Zilberman started his wrestling career competing at 74 kilos, but moved up little by little until hitting the 96-kilo mark in 1996.

Zilberman said in general he tries not to get nervous prior to the weigh-in, an approach he will no doubt take to Beijing, since "it wastes my energy."

Zilberman also said that the draw will be important. "The draw is always important, but since they're only taking 20 wrestlers from each weight class, it means they're the best wrestlers in the world. So there's no easy draw at the Olympic Games."

Jews make baseball all-star teams

JTA

NEW YORK — At least three players of Jewish descent made the lineups of Major League Baseball's all-star teams.

Boston Red Sox first baseman Kevin Youkilis was named as an American League starter for the game played at Yankee Stadium. Ian Kinsler, the second baseman from the Texas Rangers, was penciled in as a reserve for the American League.

Milwaukee Brewers outfielder Ryan Braun was to start for the National League.

Youkilis, whose nickname is "The Greek God of Walks," openly identifies as Jewish. In explaining his charity work, he once told mlb.com, "In my religion, the Jewish religion, that's one of the biggest things that's taught, is giving a mitzvah, forming a mitzvah."

He also said, "I was always taught as a kid giving to charity. You're supposed to give a good amount of charity each and every year."

Both Braun and Kinsler have Jewish fathers and reportedly identify as half-Jewish.

Singing in the office

It was a strange clinic day. What made that day strange, in a positive way, was that two of my long-standing patients sang for me.

Over the years, each of them, at times, sang in my office but never both on the same day. One may ask why a patient would sing for the doctor – could it be because I am a medical specialist who focuses on singers with voice problems? However, that's not the case. I am a geriatrician; the majority of my patients are over 80.

The Senior Side of Life

The first patient who visited my office that day is afflicted with Parkinson's disease. He is an accomplished and renowned cantor, and is well-known in the community. He struggles along with his family and his physicians to find ways to improve his functioning.

At one point, he could not vocalize sufficiently to sing. Fortunately, now, during the best of times, he is able to sing a beautiful and sustained cantorial tune. On this particular day, after some time to talk, out it came, a beautiful and lyrical sound – first he sang in my office and then while showing me his gait in the hallway, so all in the vicinity could benefit from the purity of his sound.

My second patient was a woman who is always accompanied by one if not two devoted family members. She suffers from dementia but still lives at home with the help of her supportive family.

Ever since I met her, she has told me how much she loves to sing, and some years ago, during the early part of our interaction, I had told her that my maternal grandmother sang in a Yiddish choir in New York and that not only did I hear lots of Yiddish singing as a child, I also accompanied her on the piano when she practised for performances.

Invariably after our medical visit, the patient would tell me she was going to sing me a Yiddish song. In the earlier days, she would sing one of a number of songs with all the lyrics. As time has gone by and her language skills deteriorated with the progress of the disease, the lyrics have become less robust, but the melody has remained true and her voice clear and lyrical.

This woman's recent visit to me ended with her singing My Yiddishe Mama, in which the only lyrics were the title words and the rest was humming and "la la la-ing" – but on beat and in tune. I sat, smiling at her as she sang, and when she was finished, I told her how much I enjoyed her singing for me. When I asked if she would come to see me again for a followup appointment, she replied, "Of course, I always want to see you and sing for you."

Over the years, medical colleagues have asked me how I am able to look after patients who are old, have many illnesses and may be quite demented. "How can you really speak to them with any satisfaction," I am often asked.

I have frequently heard from medical trainees that some of their supervisors paint a rather negative picture of elder-care. I am saddened by this as many of these young medical students and post-graduate trainees have a natural inclination toward the elderly.

I try to counter the negativity of others – sometimes being in a clinic in which two patients sing is a perfect and lyrical antidote.

PEACH CRISP

- 1 c sugar
- 1/2 tsp cinnamon
- 1/8 tsp salt
- 1/2 c flour
- 1/2 tsp grated nutmeg
- 1/4 c orange juice
- 1/2 c granola without dried fruit
- 1/2 stick unsalted butter, semi-soft
- 3 lb peaches, peeled, sliced 1/4" thick

Preheat oven to 375°F. In a food processor, process sugar, flour, granola, spices, salt and butter until small clumps are formed.

Spread peaches in a lightly greased 13"x9" baking dish. Toss peaches with juice and top with crumb mixture. Bake in middle of oven until topping is golden and peaches are tender, 35-40 min. Cool slightly and serve warm with ice cream.

Lessons from a lost culture

Epi on Education

Here I sit in Essaouira, Morocco, on vacation remembering some of the lessons I learned here in the 1980s. I served with the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (the Joint) first as an educational consultant and then as country director for most of the time between 1981 and 1988. I came to help a once-great community in its disintegrating years and came away learning more than I taught and getting more than I gave. The lessons I learned have stayed with me ever since, for example:

Seymour Epstein

• Language acquisition is mostly about motivation, not technique. The level of Hebrew in Moroccan Jewish schools was higher than anything I had ever witnessed in North American or European schools, despite poor texts, teachers without training and sad school environments. Synagogue participation and strong family support were the primary motivating factors. And I improved my French without a teacher very quickly, because I had absolutely no choice.

• Computers have destroyed the prodigious memory bank that was once resident in the human brain. Moroccans live mostly in an oral-aural culture and remember facts, names, numbers and texts to an extent that most of us would not believe. How many times did I see Moroccan men pray the full Shabbat morning service, pronouncing each word out loud without ever opening a siddur? And what about women who could sing long verses of Moroccan music without reference to a text? Reading the Torah "cold" without preparation never ceased to amaze me. Knowing texts by heart provides an intimate access that's far superior to an Internet connection.

• Jews' centuries of coexistence with their Muslim neighbours produced a harmony that was truly multicultural. Of course, there were many tense moments, but both Muslims and Jews of a certain age have vivid memories of the kind of mutual respect that allowed for separate lifestyles that interacted in complex ways. There was virtually no intermarriage, and yet the music in mosque and synagogue was similar beyond belief. It all made ethnic street festivals in Toronto look silly in comparison!

There were many more lessons, but as I walk the streets of the medina of Jew-less Essaouira (once Mogador, home to a proud Jewish community), I feel a certain melancholy for a lost world that could still teach us things we never knew.

Epi (Seymour Epstein) is the vice-president of Jewish Education at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

An ode to 'headless drivers'

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

I'm lucky, because some people notice when I take time off from writing this column. That is nice. Thank you.

Often when I stop by a convenience store or a small business, or ride a cab, I wonder about the people working "the floor," where there is little hubbub. Do they have the drive to express an idea publicly, one that might be mulled over by others, and are they missed when they take time away from their job?

URBAN WRITER

I am intrigued by the "quiet people." In a short story that I once wrote titled Goat's Tails and Cow's Feet, I called them "headless drivers." By that I meant that there are people who drive by me on the street each day who live their own full lives, yet we'll never truly intersect. I see them, but I'll never know them. To me, they may as well be have no heads.

When I engage such people in conversation, the inevitable occurs. We enter into meaningful talk about things such as family, politics, food and religion. I like to test the waters and sometimes toss out a tidbit about Israel. I figure it's my chance to be an emissary, and/or to get a pulse on what's going on in the street in regard to us.

Many of these headless drivers are often not really so quiet. Despite the fact they don't write a column or rage publicly about the ills of society, they have much to say, and they articulate it well.

Most recently, I launched into a discussion with a Christian woman living in northern British Columbia who counsels native Canadians. She's not a trained therapist, but she's been sharing her wisdom for 20 years and has garnered the trust of Aboriginals in that area – not an easy feat. She has no website, and she looked at me strangely when I asked her if she had ever been honoured for her work.

We are gala people, but not everyone else is.

I, like you no doubt, enjoy my taxi rides, not only because I get a chance to be mobile while closing my eyes to think distant thoughts, but because I can talk to a stranger about rare and intimate things with little or no risk. It's part of his or her job, and I sense that these headless drivers are the last great conversationalists in the world.

While in Ottawa recently, an Iranian cabby told me that his first girlfriend was arriving in Toronto for a visit. She wanted to see him. She had never stopped loving him. I advised him against seeing her. He is a family man. I gave him my card and asked him to let me know what he decided. I was curious. He responded, "We'll see. I might." I told him I understood and we parted ways. He was a friend for a moment – as he would be to dozens of people that day – and that was the way it was supposed to be. He was clear about that.

I knew I would never see him again. That was fine, however, because I learned something from this quiet person. He shared with me the intricacies of his familial relationships and the senselessness in testing the genuine spirit of his marital love. He didn't need my advice. The Iranian taxi driver knew a pile more about relationships than I do.

I'm lucky that I write this column, and there are those who notice when I'm not around. But the same can be said about the quiet Filipina woman behind the counter at my favorite coffee joint. I know when she is absent, and many others do as well.

It could be that the quiet people, the headless drivers, might just make their mark while serving another cup of coffee or travelling another quarter mile.

Obama tours the land

U.S. presidential hopeful Barack Obama visited Israel last week as part of a foreign policy tour of Israel, Jordan and Europe. Obama met with key political leaders in Israel as well as with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas in Ramallah. Here he is being briefed by Minister of Defence Ehud Barak and Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni while seeing the country from the air in a helicopter. At right, Obama, speaks from in front of the memorial statue to Janush Korczak at Yad Vashem. Please see related story on page 25. [Israel Sun photos]

Survivors' service directory published

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The first national directory listing services and programs for Canada's 17,000 Holocaust survivors has just been published.

Five thousand copies of the Canadian Guide to Programs and Services for Holocaust Survivors will be dropped off at social service agencies, community and Holocaust memorial centres and synagogues across the country.

The nine-page pamphlet, which is free and can be accessed on the Internet through the Jewish Information Services of Toronto's website, was created to help survivors and their families navigate what can be "a very confusing social service system," said Melanie Simons, national social policy co-ordinator for Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC).

The guide is the initiative of several organizations: CJC, the Canadian Jewish Holocaust Survivors, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and Jewish Information Services of Toronto.

"It will assist survivors and their families link up to services such as home care, emergency assistance for items like hearing aids and dentures, as well as to recreational programs such as the Baycrest's Cafe Europa and Holocaust commemoration activities," Simons said.

In addition, the guide will be helpful to survivors who have not yet applied for services they are entitled to, including restitution programs, she said.

Sidney Zoltak, co-president of Canadian Jewish Holocaust Survivors, credited Simons with having conceived the guide. "She and the Jewish Information Services of Toronto created it."

The News in Brief

Canada

Swastika Targets Katz

WINNIPEG — Winnipeg Mayor Sam Katz won't ask police to investigate the people who hung a sign with a swastika surrounded by the words "Danger" and "Katz," a spokesperson told the Winnipeg Free Press. The paper photographed a man placing the sign in a window of an apartment on a major west end street. A spokesperson for the mayor, who is the son of Holocaust survivors, said that Katz "has very thick skin."

Israeli Drones Win Bid

MONTREAL — Ottawa will spend $100 million to buy at least 12 Israeli-made Heron UAV drone aircraft to use in Afghanistan, Canwest News and strategypage.com reported. The Heron UAV is made by Israeli Air Industries, which beat out a bid by fellow Israeli defence contractor Elbit Systems for its Hermes 450 drone. The Heron spy drones will replace aging, French-made Sperwer aircraft.

Zukerman Feted

OTTAWA — About 60 friends, colleagues and relatives of Pinchas Zukerman gathered July 19 to surprise the National Arts Centre Orchestra's music director on his 60th birthday. The event took place at the NAC Salon. The Tel Aviv-born violinist and conductor has been music director since 1998.

World

Wiesel Attacker Guilty

SAN FRANCISCO — The man accused of trying to kidnap Elie Wiesel was convicted July 21 on lesser charges. A jury found Eric Hunt, 24, guilty of false imprisonment and a hate crime. His trial lasted nine days. In February 2007, Hunt pulled the Nobel Prize-winning writer and Shoah survivor from a San Francisco hotel elevator and tried to force him to deny the Holocaust. Hunt also faced kidnapping and stalking charges. His defence said he had a bipolar disorder.

Survivors To Be Paid

NEW YORK — The Claims Conference has won payment for Jewish survivors of the Nazi siege of Leningrad. It said Germany will make a one-time payment of $4,000 to siege victims now living in Israel or the West. Thousands of Jews are thought to meet the criteria. Some one million Leningrad residents died during the siege, which began in 1941 and lasted 900 days, including 800 Jews who were massacred in Pushkin, a suburb.

Iran Makes Nice?

TEHRAN — An Iranian vice-president made a rare claim that Iran feels friendship toward Israel. "Today Iran is friendly with the peoples of America and Israel," Esfandiyar Rahim Masha'i, who is in charge of tourism and cultural affairs, said July 20. "No people in the world is our enemy, and this is a source of pride," he said at a tourism fair in Tehran. The remarks clashed with Iran's policy against coexistence with Israel. By referring to the "people" of Israel, he may have meant Iran is friend to Jews, not Israel.

Olympian Arrested

ADDIS ABABA — Israel's entrant for the Olympic marathon was arrested while visiting his native Ethiopia. Ayele Seteng, 53, who immigrated to Israel from Ethiopia, returned there for the final stretch of high-altitude training and was arrested in a long-running debt dispute. Israel is worried that Seteng, who is expected to face a trial, could miss the Beijing Games next month. Israeli Sports Minister Raleb Majadele urged the Foreign Ministry to push Ethiopia on the issue. Seteng came 20th in the marathon at the 2004 Athens Games.

President Misses Rally

BUENOS AIRES — Argentina's president skipped the annual protest marking the 1994 bombing of the AMIA Jewish centre. Neither Cristina Fernandez de Kirchner nor her predecessor and husband, Nestor Kirchner, were at the July 18 rally in front of the rebuilt centre, unlike in previous years. The event marked the 14th anniversary of the 1994 terror attack, which killed 85 and wounded hundreds.

Muslim Jailed For Attack On Jewish Teen

CALGARY — A Muslim man who attacked a Jewish girl and her friends in Calgary has been handed a one-year jail sentence from a provincial court.

Mustafa Taj will also serve a year of probation, ruled provincial court Judge Bill Cummings, the Calgary Sun and Calgary Herald reported.

The judge ruled the assault was a hate crime.

Taj, 21, was convicted in May of attacking four Calgary teenagers in November 2006 as they waited for a commuter train. He slapped and pulled the hair of Nichola Cordato, then 16, who identified herself as Jewish, after saying, "I'm Muslim and hate Jews." When friends attempted to intervene, he punched them in the face and kicked one in the stomach and ribs. He threw another friend onto the train tracks and spat on him.

Taj previously had assaulted a black man after swearing at him for being Sudanese and African.

Zareinu preschool to offer 'reverse integration'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Zareinu Educational Centre is known for its work with special needs children, including those who have cerebral palsy, Down syndrome and autism spectrum disorder.

This year, the 19-year-old school, which is housed in the basement of Thornhill's Sephardic Kehila Centre, will also welcome "typical" children into its preschool, which can accommodate full-day and half-day students and serves children from age 2½ to 5.

"It's kind of a reverse integration model," said Zareinu's principal, Mitch Parker, who came up with the idea and has seen it used elsewhere.

"It's an unusual model, but it's a really good model," said the school's preschool co-ordinator, Pat Resnick, a native of Johannesburg who has been in Toronto for 23 years and is a professor of early childhood education at Seneca College.

Pat Resnick

Among Parker's reasons for instituting the new model are to provide an opportunity for special needs students to be integrated, to sensitize typical learners, and to offer a perk to staff in the form of on-site preschool for their children during working hours.

The program is also open to non-staff, but spots are limited.

Resnick noted that the preschool is geared to "the whole child. As well as focusing on cognitive development – reading and writing, a little math, Hebrew – we focus as well on social skills."

Every child in the program has an individual education plan, Resnick said. "We look at every child's strengths and work on areas that need working on."

In fact, she said, diagnoses of special needs students are considered "sort of secondary."

Disabilities in young children are "not as clear-cut" as they are in older people, Parker added.

Mitch Parker

While special needs children will continue to receive individual therapies such as physiotherapy and speech therapy, the typical children "will certainly benefit from group activities" such as music and speech, Resnick said.

She noted that some children have attended the preschool in the past "to be monitored" and ended up developing typically. She does not believe that reverse integration will "slow down" the learning of typical students. "Every child [at Zareinu] moves at the rate they should be moving."

As well, she noted, the program teaches respect for others, as well as understanding.

"Some people may talk verbally, some people may communicate with a device – it gives an understanding that people can communicate differently," Resnick said.

"They will just see that [the special needs students] are children. They like the same things. They do the same things – maybe differently. I think it teaches respect for diversity."

A magical Music Man

From the editor's desk

At one point in the playful repartee in The Music Man, being performed at the Stratford Shakespeare Festival, the elegant, somewhat standoffish but ever insightful librarian asks: "What makes Shakespeare and Beethoven great?"

With that throw-away question, the audience is forced to confront just one of the many profound, universal issues of life – the elevating power of truth, the debilitating distress of dissembling, human frailty, the nature of beauty, and the restorative quality of love – that are the provocative but matter-of-fact subthemes of the story and the music in the often overlooked but immensely gratifying musical written by Meredith Wilson and Frank Lacey.

The deep relevance of the questions that underpin the musical is one of the reasons the Stratford rendition of play is so wonderful. The other reasons relate, of course, to the outstanding cast of players assembled by director Susan H. Schulman.

For those readers who may not be familiar with the play, it tells the tale of a travelling con artist who targets the unassuming, simple folk of a small, rural, midwestern U.S. town in the early years of the last century. His ruse entails selling musical instruments and marching band uniforms. He must contend with both the trust and the suspicion of the townsfolk, and then unexpectedly, the stirrings of unfamiliar emotions of his own. The townsfolk too, in the end, must contend with new emotional and other forces that are let loose by the flimming and flamming of this smooth talking, elusive and evasive Music Man.

This is Schulman's sixth season at Stratford. She was a superb choice by the festival's artistic director Des McAnuff. Her experience in theatre is at the highest level. Her previous Stratford credits, for example, include To Kill a Mockingbird, Fiddler on the Roof, Man of La Mancha, The King and I and Hello, Dolly!

"At first I thought the storyline, the book, was old fashioned," she told The CJN recently on the phone. "But the score and the music are enduring.

"My main aspiration for the play was how to make the story not seem old-fashioned and fussy. For when you read the lyrics and the script, they are incredibly moving."

Schulman's production carries her aspiration, like a charge of warm, stimulating electricity, directly to the hearts of the audience. It succeeds in endearing the play and the players to the audience members.

Schulman has assembled an outstanding company of creative, talented actors, singers, dancers, set designers and choreographers.

Skill and energy pour off the stage.

Jonathan Goad deftly portrays the Music Man, Prof. Harold Hill, smooth-talking, confident, brazen, bold yet vulnerable as well.

Lee MacDougall as the mayor is excellent: a pompous blowhard who knows less than he thinks but enough nevertheless to retain the chain of office.

The mayor's wife, played by the iconic Fiona Reid, routinely steals her scenes. She is simply that good. She demonstrates exquisite timing, playful comic exaggeration in the delivery of lines, expression and movement. Her performance proves, yet again, the truth of the theatre adage that there are no small parts.

But the luminous jewel in the diadem of Schulman's production is the performance of Leah Oster as Marian Paroo, the librarian. She conducts herself on stage with near entrancing elegance and dignity of bearing. Her singing is masterful, finely controlled, full-ranged and rich, even in the high register.

"I was very happy to cast Leah Oster for her Stratford debut," Schulman enthused. It was indeed an astute decision.

The interaction among Marian, her troubled young brother Winthrop (Christopher Van Hagen) and their mother (Michelle Fisk) is sweet and, at times, stirringly heart-rending.

The Stratford production of The Music Man provides large offerings of theatrical delights: exhilarating ensemble dancing that is typically athletic, high kicking, high stepping and high jumping; top quality singing and harmonics; innovative, modern staging and set design; fine acting; and a classic, timeless story, in whose predictable twists and turns we can find the faint familiarities and small comforts of our lives as well.

Jonathan Goad, the Music Man, spins with Leah Oster, Marian Paroo, the librarian.

Schulman spoke with pride about "the thrill of Stratford."

"People should come and have a wonderful time," she urged. "After seeing The Music Man, many in the audience leave the theatre feeling better than when they walked in."

Her observation was not self-promotion. It was statement of fact, for The Music Man is a magical theatre experience.

My colleagues and I at The CJN convey our best wishes to our treasured Urban Writer, Avrum Rosensweig, for a full and speedy recovery.

SeeJN CELEBRATING 60 YEARS OF ISRAEL

ZIONIST VISIONARY

Ze'ev Jabotinsky died on the 29th of Tammuz (Aug. 4), 68 years ago, in 1940. He was one of the Zionist leaders whose vision contributed to the founding of the State of Israel. Born in Odessa on Oct. 18. 1880, Jabotinsky was a soldier, orator, journalist, thinker and leader. Throughout his life, he advocated the importance of Jewish self defence. In World War I, while serving with the British Army, he helped form the Jewish Legion. In 1925, he established the Revisionist Party because he opposed and sought to revise the terms of the British mandate for Palestine, which he believed unjustly denied the Jewish people their patrimony east and west of the Jordan River. He founded the party's youth movement, Betar, and a para-military, self-defence organization called Etzel, the national military organization that was known as the Irgun. The Revisionist Party later evolved into the Herut Party and later into the Likud Party. Jabotinsky died while in the United States on a mission to organize Jewish participation in the Allied war effort. His remains were reinterred in the Mount Herzl Cemetery in Jerusalem in 1965.

Community helps send terror victims to camp

By RITA POLIAKOV
CJN Intern

It's a Monday afternoon and around a dozen teens are lounging by the pool, chatting amongst themselves.

Girls in bikinis dry themselves off as groups gather around the barbecue, concentrating on dressing their hot dogs.

These teens have many things in common. They enjoy barbecues, they like to socialize, they're all from Israel and they're all victims of terror.

And they were all going to camp in a few days.

For the past four years, the One Family Fund, a group that helps victims of terror in Israel, has been sending Israeli youths, aged 12 to 14, who have been affected by terror to Canadian camps.

This year, for the first time, they will be partnering with other organizations to reach more children.

One of these is Yaldeinu, a charity that helps Jewish communities worldwide. With the help of the International Christian Embassy Jerusalem, Yaldeinu is sending five children to Camp Gesher.

Another group of Israeli kids will be hosted by a number of Bel Ewart cottagers in an initiative organized by Ari Belzberg and Emanuel Greenberg.

Volunteers from organizations such as One Family and Yaldeinu are sending terror victims to camp in Ontario this summer. Pictured from left are campers Sean Kuchnik, Yuval Dadon, Shir Benshimol and Shalom Katar (seated), along with organizers and volunteers Karen Breslin, Bernie Little, Pam Albert, Rhonda Wolf, Michael Ettedgui and Jack Benaim.

Pam Albert, executive director of One Family's Canadian branch, emphasized the sense of community that has developed through this project.

"This is a wonderful model. It shows how [different] organizations can work together. It's a program where there's no boundaries in terms of who can help," she said.

Albert said the organizations' motives were simple.

"I think we feel that our hands are tied here," she said. "We're sitting with an incredible life in Canada. We look at the lives affected by terror. It's such a tangible way to give a real kid a hug, to help them."

This year, One Family is sending 20 kids to Camp Timberlane, with the help of Bernie Little, head of fundraising and a Timberlane alumnus. Little raised some $70,000 for transportation and living costs.

"Aside from approaching friends, I approached alumni. The response was fantastic," Little said. "People care. It's very frustrating to be here. When you give to other charities, you don't see where the money's going."

For the Israeli campers, the funding means that they can spend a few weeks just being kids, which is one of the reasons Rhonda Wolf volunteered with One Family.

"We want them to take their mind off everything. The majority of the kids are coming from Sderot," Wolf said, referring to the southern Israeli town that faces constant rocket barrages from neighbouring Gaza.

"They can't have a life outdoors in the summer. Israel is so beautiful, and they have to stay inside. That's not fair. We want to show them the great outdoors."

Chaim Avner, 14, has been coming to Camp Timberlane through this program for several years.

Four years ago, Avner's father was killed in a suicide bombing in Jerusalem.

Apart from getting to travel, going to Camp Timberlane gives Avner an opportunity to be a regular kid in a safe environment.

"I love this," he said of the camp. "I like the skate park, tennis, soccer. All the guys, whatever you want, they'll do for you. If I'm upset, they come and help, they joke with me. All the time, you're not alone."

Michael Ettedgui, the founder of Yaldeinu, sees this as an opportunity to connect Israeli and Canadian campers.

"It'll imbue in them a sense of peoplehood. There's no doubt that they will remember the kindness they were shown by children their own age in Toronto. They'll have real friendships with Jewish children in North America."

Before the kids got on the camp buses, they spent a few days in Toronto staying with host families and exploring the city.

This is all thanks to community businesses and volunteers.

Roots gave free merchandise to each child, while Cosmic Bowling donated a night of bowling and a free dinner. Each camper also got a backpack full of camping supplies, which was donated from a bar and a bat mitzvah.

"The Israeli community here is very strong," Wolf said, adding that volunteers don't have to be Israeli, or even Jewish, to help. "Everyone that has children understands."

The One Family Fund is also organizing a Sea to Sea charity hike in Israel. For more information, visit www.onefamilyfund.org, www.seatoseahike.org, or call 416-644-4955.

Young JNF leaders to go back to camp for Sderot

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

On Aug. 13, hundreds of Jewish twentysomethings and thirtysomethings will return to camp in an effort to help the children of Sderot.

Late last year, JNF Canada's newly formed JNF New Leadership committee, made up of young friends and acquaintances, decided it was time to give back to the community.

To do so, the members, all in their late 20s and early 30s, decided to launch their activities with a chesed-filled night of fun and fundraising with a summer camp theme. The event, called "One Summer Night," will be held at Toronto's C-Lounge club, 465 Wellington St. W.

Proceeds will be used to send hundreds of children from Sderot to Nes Harim, a JNF-run summer camp in the Jerusalem Hills.

"It is an opportunity for the children to finally live as 'kids' without the constant fear of terror," JNF New Leadership said on its event website.

Camp is where many on the committee first met and became friends, and it holds lots of shared, fond memories, said the event co-chairs, Toronto lawyers Sean Werger and Michael Rubinoff.

"I went to all my old camp friends… we were talking about ways to get our [demographic] more involved," Werger, 31, told The CJN over coffee recently.

Werger said JNF agents in Israel will choose children from families "in most need" in Sderot to attend the camp.

Parents will also accompany their children to the camp so that they can all get a respite from the almost-daily bombardment of their town by Qassam rockets from Gaza and instead "go on creative excursions, trips and be shown the rest of Israel so they can understand why they're so important to the country," he said.

Werger said that in addition to the primary goal of helping the children of Sderot, he and Rubinoff hope this event launch for JNF New Leadership will spark more interest in JNF and elicit more community participation from their peers, as well as help de-mystify what the organization actually does for Israel.

"Anyone you ask about JNF, they refer to them as 'the tree planting people.' Yes… but we're also involved in creating security roads and we're the leading environmental movement for Israel," Werger stated.

Rubinoff, 31, said he was happy to discover how good it feels to get more involved with the community.

"As you come back later in life, you begin to see the relevance of the JNF and how they're a vital organization," he said.

"There was a connection to the JNF early on in [grade] school as kids, with the little blue boxes and stuff, but we're rediscovering them now as adults. We want to engage people our age for the long term."

Werger added that there are currently 22 people on the New Leadership committee for the event, 21 of whom never had dealings with JNF before.

For now, the "One Summer Night" fundraising party is strictly a Toronto affair, but Werger and Rubinoff haven't written off speaking to people their own age around the continent about combined events later on.

"We decided to launch a modest event to begin with and set ourselves up as successfully as possible," Rubinoff said, indicating that committee members "reached out" to other Jewish youth communities in Canada to assess interest, but in the end, they opted for a local coming-out party.

"Down the road, we may look more international," he added.

So far, "One Summer Night" has managed to bring in dozens of corporate sponsors through the work of committee members, and Werger expects all 350 tickets, priced at $100 apiece, to sell out.

"I'm excited about the party," Werger said. "It's an upscale event where we'll serve s'mores [and] we'll have a raffle where guests can win his and her prizes, such as a set of Calloway golf clubs and jewelry."

The night will also feature the new-folk music of emerging recording artist Jeremy Fisher – who's been described as a cross between Paul Simon and Bob Dylan – as well as DJ Steve Fernandez.

Lifting stones, marking their graves

There are two fewer names now in the box on this page (Let Them Go) that lists the soldiers of the Israel Defence Forces who are missing in action. The names of Sgt.-Maj. (res.) Ehud Goldwasser and Sgt. First Class Eldad Regev have been removed from the list. It was our hope – and the hope, we trust, of the civilized world – that they would be set free to the embrace of their grateful families and thankful nation to resume the lives that their Hezbollah abductors had so viciously interrupted.

Alas, only their remains were released.

Their families mourn still.

The nation still sways in sadness and anger.

Even as the bodies of the two soldiers were being transported by the Red Cross to the chaplains of the IDF, the propriety of the "prisoner" exchange was fiercely debated in Israel. For the sake of the families, some writers conceded, the exchange was necessary. But for the state, they complained, it was a strategic blunder, a dangerous disincentive to the murderous terrorists and their agents from kidnapping and killing again. Indeed, the debate has not subsided.

Joining that debate however is not our purpose. We hope and we trust that Israel will be able to re-assert its deterrent capability against enemies who celebrate as heroism and freedom-fighting the crushing of the skull of a four-year-old child.

Seldom has there been a clearer lens than that of the "prisoner" exchange to shine such true light upon the differences between Israel and those who still strive to deny it a rightful place in the Middle East. The words of the Goldwasser and Regev families themselves are the hands holding that lens secure.

"Over these past two years," said Goldwasser's mother Miki, "we have discovered a different nation, wonderful and distinguished, one that embraces and loves. An untold number of Jewish communities and youths all came to our aid, we are moved to tears by the magnitude of the love this people is capable of."

Regev's brother Ofer echoed the very same theme Goldwasser's parents: "I am proud to belong to [a nation] that loves, and not one that hates."

Shlomo Goldwasser, Ehud's father added: "If [Hezbollah leader Hassan] Nasrallah's great achievement was to conceal the fate of our sons, then I pity him and the Lebanese people. If Hezbollah's great achievement is the release of [convicted terrorist Samir] Kuntar, who is nothing but a repulsive murderer, then I pity them."

The return of the two soldiers' remains means the Goldwasser and Regev families can move on with their lives no longer burdened by the icy stones of uncertain fate and desperate possibility that weighed for two years upon their hopeful hearts.

Now lifted, those cold, dark stones will mark the graves of the men they loved but are no more.

25 years ago in The CJN

Israel stood firm on its decision to redeploy its forces in Lebanon to a more defensible position. In response to U.S. fears the action would lead to a divided Lebanon and continued violence there, Israel said it was committed to withdrawing behind the internationally recognized border between the two countries.

Israel, Hezbollah prisoner swap (1)

I find the prisoner exchange with Hezbollah shocking and appalling ("Israel, Hezbollah reach prisoner swap," CJN, July 3). It's very nice for the government to claim a higher moral standard with its conduct, but at the same time, it exposes soldiers to unprecedented dangers, because to capture a soldier alive is now obsolete, since kidnapping him dead or alive will bring the same price. Logistically speaking, that simplifies the task of the terrorists and makes the life of a soldier very cheap. Furthermore, immediate medical attention for injured soldiers will now be obsolete, as there is much less incentive to keep them alive. And the price for abducted soldier Gilad Schalit will go up into the stratosphere.

I have to admit that if the dead was my son, I, too, would give the terrorists anything they want. But would it be right? Would it be fair to all the soldiers, their parents and the country itself? Can a country become totally paralyzed by extortion and blackmail? It's vital for Israel to pass a law stating that there will be no negotiations with kidnappers unless proof of life is given.

Israel, Hezbollah prisoner swap (2)

I disagree with everyone who believes that the Israeli government made the wrong choice to return the two missing soldiers ("Israel, Hezbollah reach prisoner swap," CJN, July 3). What most people do not realize when they insult Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and state how he should not be in office is that he did a huge mitzvah. As I learned in my Jewish studies last year in school, when a fellow Jew is in captivity, it is an obligation to do everything we can to set him free. There is no "if" or "unless" in this law. It must be fulfilled no matter the cost. That is why Olmert and the Israeli government made the right decision regarding the recent prisoner swap. That is why they need to do everything they can to free abducted soldier Gilad Schalit.

Palestinians not held to account

Bernard Katz certainly has a right to his opinion, and I am happy that he has a chance to express it so loudly and so often in The CJN – that is his right and privilege in a free press ("How Israel defends itself," CJN letters, July 17).

This time, however, he touched a nerve, and he really needs to re-think his views on Israel.

Israel does not "frequently commit acts of terror against non-combatant civilians," as he contends. The terrorists live in close proximity to population centres and purposely shoot and then hide among their families and inside their mosques and schools. Does this fact make retaliation and apprehension of killers unnecessary and immoral? No.

He also lambastes many other aspects of Israeli defence, including the successful security fence. His positions are no different than those expressed by Arabs and Palestinians in terms of wanting the right to attack Israel without acknowledging its right to a vigorous and effective defence.

If I read him correctly, he is saying that Palestinians need not account for their violence and terror, and Israel must never retaliate or hold any of them responsible by fighting back. Katz's views, if taken to their logical conclusion, would mean the end of the State of Israel.

Open discussion about 'Israel-Palestine'

The meeting CJN columnist Lawrence Hart wrote about, which was to have taken place at Hamilton's Temple Anshe Shalom on June 25, did in fact take place – at the nearby Westdale Library ("We're our own worst enemy," July 10).

The meeting consisted of two group discussions. Participants (about 20) viewed a part of a TVO program on Israel, which provided the starting point for the discussions.

Rabbi Jordan Cohen of Anshe Shalom and several of his congregants attended the meeting. Contrary to Hart, there were no "speakers." Two members of the Alliance of Concerned Jewish Canadians (ACJC) made brief presentations, outlining the organization's aims and principles.

Open discussion about Israel-Palestine among Jewish Hamiltonians without fear of recrimination was what the meeting was about. ACJC Hamilton feels this is an important value to establish in the Jewish community.

"Who is a Jew?" debate returns

By RABBI DAVID GOLINKIN

In May, Rabbi Avraham Sherman and two other judges of the High Rabbinical Court of the Chief Rabbinate ruled that all of the conversions performed by Rabbi Chaim Druckman and Israel's National Conversion Court since 1999 are retroactively annulled, and that Rabbi Druckman and his fellow judges are disqualified as judges.

On May 30, Jonathan Rosenblum defended that decision in the Jerusalem Post, as if it affected only one convert in Ashdod and as if "Rabbi Sherman was stating the overwhelming consensus of halachic opinion." We shall demonstrate below that this ruling and that article have presented this complex issue in a totally one-sided and inaccurate fashion.

This decision has severe national implications for the State of Israel. As a result of it, some 300,000 Russian immigrants who have made aliyah under the Law of Return since 1990 are not halachically Jewish. Through great effort, the Joint Institute of Jewish Studies set up after the Ne'eman Commission in 1998 and the National Conversion Authority have converted many thousands of Russian immigrants who studied for one to three years in very serious courses. Rabbi Sherman's ruling retroactively annuls all of these conversions.

Furthermore, this ruling will deter all future conversions. If a conversion can be annulled many years after it is performed, it means that all conversions are conditional, so why bother converting at all?

This ruling is a desecration of God's name, and it makes a mockery of thousands of converts and hundreds of teachers and rabbis who have worked so hard to convert them.

This episode shows once again that the Chief Rabbinate of Israel, which was founded by religious Zionists, is now a haredi institution opposed to all lenient approaches within Jewish law.

Finally, the haredi position has already led to an absurd situation: he who is strict regarding conversion is lenient regarding intermarriage. In the past, this was a Diaspora phenomenon, but now, with the mass aliyah from the former Soviet Union, if we do not convert Russian immigrants, they will marry our children and grandchildren!

Rabbi Sherman's ruling is based primarily on one major premise: a convert must accept all of the mitzvot before converting and observe all the mitzvot after converting. If not, he is not Jewish and his conversion can be retroactively annulled. Furthermore, judges who performed conversions without this requirement are ipso facto disqualified from serving as judges.

He relies on rabbis Feinstein, Grodzinsky, Sternbuch, Auerbach, Kook, Schmelkes, Yosef, Kanievsky, Shach and Elyashiv. Almost all are haredi rabbis who are opposed to modernity, Zionism and the State of Israel.

Rabbi David Golinkin

Their strict approach to kabbalat mitzvot (the acceptance of mitzvot) stems from two sources.

Rabbi Yitzhak Schmelkes penned this revolutionary responsum in 1876: "A person who converts and accepts the yoke of the mitzvot, but does not intend in his heart to observe them, God desires the heart, and he is not a convert." This approach has no precedent in 2,000 years of halachic discussions about conversion. Indeed, Rabbi Schmelkes was aware that his ruling contradicted the well-known halachic principal that "dvarim shebalev einam dvarim" (things of the heart are not things).

The second source for the haredi position is a passage in the Talmud, Bechorot 30b: "Our Sages taught:... if an idol worshipper came to accept [lekabel] the Torah except for one thing, we do not accept him. Rabbi Yossi bar Yehudah says: even if the exception be one of the minutiae of the scribes [i.e., the sages]." The major medieval codes of Jewish law such as Maimonides, the Tur and the Shulchan Aruch ignored this passage. It was revived by 19th and 20th-century rabbis who wanted to reject most converts.

Thus, for example, Rabbi Moshe Feinstein repeatedly states in his responsa that a convert must accept all of the mitzvot, "and without accepting mitzvot, even one detail, behold it is written in Bechorot 30 that we do not accept him."

The normative position, however, is found in another passage in the Talmud, Yevamot 47a-b. If a person comes to convert, you ask him if he knows that the Jewish people is "persecuted and oppressed. If he replies 'I know and yet am unworthy' he is accepted forthwith, and is given instruction in some of the minor and some of the major commandments... He is also told of the punishment for the transgression of the commandments... And... he is informed of the reward granted for their fulfilment... He is not, however, to be persuaded or dissuaded too much. Kibel [if he accepted/consented], he is circumcised forthwith... [Afterward, when he is immersed] two learned men must stand by his side and instruct him in some of the minor commandments and in some of the major ones. When he comes up after his immersion, he is deemed to be an Israelite in all respects."

This braita, from the second century or earlier, was quoted or paraphrased by Maimonides, the Tur and the Shulchan Aruch.

The key phrase is "kibel" – if he accepted/consented. This obviously does not refer to acceptance of all the mitzvot, because he has only been instructed in some of the minor and some of the major mitzvot. So what does it mean?

Rabbi Ben-Zion Meir Hai Uziel (1880-1953), first Sephardi Chief Rabbi of the State of Israel, explained as follows: "It is clear from [Yevamot 47a-b] that we do not demand of him to observe the mitzvot, and it is also not necessary that the Bet Din knows that he will observe them, for if not, no converts will be accepted in Israel, for who will guarantee that this gentile will be loyal to all the mitzvot in the Torah? Rather, they instruct him in some of the mitzvot so that if he wants, he should go away and so that he cannot say later 'If I had known I would not have converted.' And this is before the fact, but after the fact, if they did not instruct him, it is not indispensable... [It] is permissible and a mitzvah to accept converts, even though we know that they will not observe all the mitzvot, because in the end they will observe them."

Other prominent Orthodox rabbis who have taken lenient approaches toward kabbalat mitzvot include Chief Rabbi Unterman and Rabbis Kluger, Mashash, Moshe Hacohen, Berkowitz and Angel.

Thus the entire "house of cards" built by Rabbi Sherman rests on just one card: that all poskim agree that all converts must accept all mitzvot. Indeed, this has been the position of most Ashkenazi haredi rabbis since 1876. But it is not normative Jewish law. Normative Jewish law for 2,000 years has followed Yevamot that a convert accepts the halachic system and its rewards and punishments, not all of the mitzvot, which he has yet to learn. To say that a rabbi who rules differently is unfit to judge is the equivalent to saying that a person who waits three hours instead of six hours between meat and milk does not keep kosher. Different halachic rulings are based on different sources and they are equally legitimate.

I hope and pray that the Supreme Court of Israel will overturn this mistaken and destructive ruling.

I hope and pray that the State of Israel will start to appoint modern Orthodox and other qualified rabbis as dayanim. If not, the Chief Rabbinate will have to be abolished, because it will have cut itself off from most of the Jewish people.

Finally, I hope and pray that the State of Israel will make every effort to welcome converts, for it is written that "a convert is more beloved by God than the multitudes who stood at Mount Sinai" and "a convert who comes to convert, one reaches out a hand in order to bring him under the wings of Heaven."

Rabbi David Golinkin is president of the Schechter Institute of Jewish Studies in Jerusalem.

Diaspora presses Olmert on conversion issue

By JACOB BERKMAN
JTA

NEW YORK — Diaspora Jews are stepping up pressure on Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert to intervene in a dispute in Israel over conversions to Judaism.

Leaders of the United Jewish Communities federation umbrella organization sent a sharply worded letter to Olmert on July 9 urging him to assign his cabinet secretary "to oversee conversion."

At issue in this case is a dispute over who can perform conversions and which conversions should be considered valid by Israeli religious authorities.

The petition followed a Jewish Agency resolution, adopted at its mid-June board of governors meetings, "to act immediately to advance the conversion issue."

"As leaders of the American Jewish community, we are writing to you to express our deep concern regarding the untenable instability that has characterized the conversion system in Israel over the past few months and ask for your personal involvement," the UJC's chairman, Joe Kanfer, and its CEO and president, Howard Rieger, said in their letter.

(A UJC spokesperson told The CJN that the letter was also sent on behalf of the Canadian Jewish community.)

Calling out Olmert publicly is an unusual step for the UJC, which generally attempts to avoid placing public pressure on the Israeli prime minister.

Conversion long has been a flashpoint in Diaspora-Israel relations and within Israel itself, as the Orthodox-dominated Israeli rabbinate has squared off with non-Orthodox denominations over the "Who is a Jew" debate. The rabbinate consistently has refused to recognize Reform or Conservative conversions, and as it continues to adopt increasingly stringent conversion standards, a growing number of Orthodox voices are voicing alarm as well.

The most recent flare-up in this religious struggle came in the spring, when Israel's Rabbinical High Court dismissed Rabbi Chaim Druckman, the head of the Conversion Committee, which was set up to facilitate the conversion process.

In dismissing Rabbi Druckman, who was considered relatively lenient on conversion, the court said it would annul thousands of conversions of immigrants from the former Soviet Union that he had approved.

The move rankled modern Orthodox rabbis, the Conservative and Reform movements, and the UJC, which holds that the conversion issue is central to its effort to create a sense of "Jewish peoplehood" between Diaspora and Israeli Jews.

A group known as the co-ordinating committee, comprising officials of the UJC, Jewish Agency and the agency's international fundraising arm, Keren Hayesod, meets with Israel's prime minister three times a year, and conversion is always brought up, Nachman Shai, the director general of UJC-Israel told JTA.

While the conversion issue has been framed as a question of respecting the identity and practices of Diaspora Jews, critics of the Chief Rabbinate are stressing the predicament of some 300,000 immigrants from the former Soviet Union who are not recognized as Jewish.

These people were eligible to immigrate to Israel under the Law of Return, which requires only that a prospective immigrant have at least one Jewish grandparent. But they're not recognized by Israel's religious authorities because they don't have a Jewish mother or have not undergone an Orthodox conversion.

The result is a host of social problems, starting with their inability to wed Jewish Israelis, since marriage is controlled by the Chief Rabbinate.

The recent letter from UJC comes at a time when many see Olmert as a lame duck because of political scandals that ultimately may force him from office. But Shai said it's an open letter to the Prime Minister's Office, not necessarily Olmert.

"If it is not Olmert, it will be someone else," he said.

In a letter dated July 16, Olmert responded to the UJC, thanking Kanfer and Rieger for their concern and stating recognition that "conversion in Israel is a national priority. I am determined resolve the current conversion crisis and improve the process of conversion in Israel."

Olmert added that the issue of conversion "remains a central part of my agenda as prime minister."

Compassion before justice

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

The armchair politician that I am is incensed at the recent prisoner exchange between Israel and Hezbollah. To free Samir Kuntar so that his fellow terrorists can gloat and claim victory while he resumes his murderous activities, in exchange for no more than two Israelis in coffins looks like bad politics. Only a weak prime minister fighting for his political survival and surrounded by an inane bunch of cabinet ministers could have agreed to it.

It's one thing to bring back live prisoners to reassure the soldiers that they will always be looked after by their government, but to suffer so much anguish for this seems unwarranted. Indeed, no price is too high to free Gilad Schalit from the clutches of Hamas, but the situation of Ehud Goldwasser and Eldad Regev, of blessed memory, may have required a tougher response.

However, as a Jew, and in spite of the sadness we all feel, I am immensely grateful for what Israel did. For our tradition bids us not only to redeem captives, but also to make sacrifices for the sake of a dignified burial of the fallen in order to honour the dead and provide closure to the families.

Herb Keinon of the Jerusalem Post has offered an added perspective. He wrote that, apart from the commitment to bring home every soldier, even if in a coffin, Israel is also acting out of a "communal obligation following the Holocaust – a feeling that whenever Jews are in danger, everything, but everything, must be done to try to save them, if only because so little was done back then."

He may have a point. As hard as we may try move on, the trauma of the Holocaust has become part of our collective consciousness. Though the survivors are dying out and the second generation is aging, the effect will stay forever. The very existence of Israel testifies to it.

Israel is strong enough to ignore the taunts of its enemies as they dance around Kuntar and proclaim themselves as victors. For all their glaring human limitations, the members of Israel's government have shown prudence, even wisdom, in putting compassion before justice. Even Kuntar is reported to have said that he envies the Israelis for the way they care.

They let go a despicable criminal and others of his ilk in order to bring some comfort to two families, as well as to the whole country. Even if those in charge did it out of weakness, or for reasons of crass expediency, or as a residue of irrational Holocaust trauma, their actions must nevertheless be applauded.

I'm proud that my Jewish sensibilities are infinitely stronger than my political instincts.

Force can be a tool to fight evil

Mark Masters in Ottawa

The world needs to change.

No doubt this sentiment has been felt in generation after generation, but I can't help but believe that now – in this generation – a line in the sand must be drawn.

Who should draw the line? Young people not just in our community, but across all communities – must be part of this transition from ignorance and apathy to moral steadfastness.

The problem facing the world is an inability to decide how to deal with the ills facing it.

We see evil in Robert Mugabe, the dictator in Zimbabwe who has once again been assured continued control of the beleaguered nation through a fraudulent election.

We see evil in Sudan, where genocide is taking place.

We see evil in Iran, where a president denies the Holocaust while plotting to gain a nuclear weapon so as to turn the venom he spews into reality.

And for the most part, there is an agreement – to varying degrees – that these are evils the world must confront. But again, there is no strategy to do so.

The United Nations is impotent and bogged down in bureaucracy. Its main problem is that it gives the same value to the voice of the worst human-rights offenders as it does to democracies that value the rule of law.

The veto of Communist China stands in the way of action in Sudan. The African Union stands in the way of real change in Zimbabwe. Regarding Iran, it's hard to know where to place all the blame for years of inaction.

So what's the answer?

U.S. Senator John McCain has proposed a new League of Democracies, which would be an organization similar to NATO that would help bypass the United Nations and start doing true good in the world. As far as ideas go, this is one of the better ones out there.

The current consensus seems to be that either the status quo is fine or anything beyond it is too risky.

Some believe that military force can never achieve good. This is definitely the pervading sense among those at post-secondary institutions in our country.

On university campuses, you often see rallies against war, the United States and Israel. But make no mistake, the United States, whether under a President McCain or President Barack Obama, is the best chance the world has for a better future.

Sure, we all want a more peaceful existence, but I think it's clear that a policy of appeasement will never lead to the prosperous times we all desire.

Economic sanctions backed up by military force is the best way to combat dictators who mock the world's democratic nations while sitting ensconced in their palaces, funded by well meaning United Nations donations.

How to push our leaders toward such action is hard to figure out, but it has to start with the ballot box. We need to reach a point where all our political leaders in Canada, at least those in the mainstream, support real reform to the United Nations and accept military action as an important tool in helping end genocides and ensure a more peaceful world.

It will be tough for this charge to come from our community. After all, if a Jewish group pushes for military action, the likely reaction is for critics to characterize us as a bunch of warmongers.

They'll say, "Sure they like war. Look a how they treat the Palestinians."

Of course, the critics don't have to worry about a bomb going off when they ride the bus, or about rogue groups on their border.

The time is now for our community – and especially the youth – to stand up for a new direction, to stand up for something that will actually make a difference in the world.

Our community produces world leaders in many important fields, and foreign policy is perhaps the most important issue facing us right now.

These days, we often talk about tipping points – moments when an idea becomes part of the mainstream and takes off. I hope a new hard-line approach to the evil in this world reaches a tipping point soon, and I think it may have to start with our community.

Kilometres apart, worlds away

Jesse Mintz in Halifax

It's trite to say that one man's freedom fighter is another man's terrorist. But after the recent Israeli-Hezbollah prisoner exchange, I understood with unprecedented clarity the troubled relationship that underlies this cliché.

The celebrations in Lebanon and the mourning ceremonies in Israel that marked the day occurred mere kilometres apart, and while both nations' media reported on the same events, going back and forth between the two felt more like switching worlds than surfing websites.

The abyss separating the two worlds, which has never seemed so daunting or so wide as it has in light of the exchange, is further reinforced by the bridge between them – Samir Kuntar, or "the murderer Kuntar," as he is known in Israel, and "the hero Samir," as he is known in Lebanon.

Despicable as it may seem to some, it would serve Israel well to understand both the psyche of a society that welcomed Kuntar back with open arms and a national celebration, as well as the aftermath of a diplomatic decision that has been heralded as a victory for Hezbollah chief Hassan Nasrallah specifically and Lebanon more generally.

The exchange marked a historic day for Nasrallah. Before the war between Israel and Lebanon, Hezbollah was merely a rogue entity vying for legitimacy within the panoply of nationalist and religious groups in Lebanon. The power struggle between Sunnis, Shiites, Christians and Druze ensured that the political spectrum remained fragmented and no one group had succeeded in uniting the people.

Kuntar's return to Beirut, though, was marked by national celebrations. Not only did Nasrallah and Hezbollah greet him, so, too, did the prime minister, president, cabinet ministers and, notably, representatives from the Druze, Sunni and Christian communities.

Nasrallah succeeded in weaving together nationalist and otherwise fragmented political blocs as he refrained from his usual alienating religious rhetoric. Rather, he described Kuntar's return as a military and political – and, notably, not ideological – victory. He bestowed national legitimacy on the cross-border raid that sparked the war between Lebanon and Israel, and by so doing, he has given legitimacy to Hezbollah's preeminent place in Lebanese politics.

Calls from within Lebanon to dismantle Hezbollah have vanished as the political spectrum has – albeit begrudgingly – acquiesced to the cult of personality surrounding Nasrallah and has unified behind him. Likewise, Nasrallah has united Lebanon in the demand for the repatriation of the Shebaa Farms, the small patch of land that Israel also claims.

If the blogosphere is any testament to the psyche of a people, questions of whether Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert made the right decision are pre-occupying Israelis and westerners alike. All of this seems, however, to be merely an extension of a simpler question that Israel has struggled with before: should it privilege what Olmert called its "moral duty" to return fallen soldiers, or should it emphasize the hypothetical danger posed by the return of a known terrorist.

This question is up for debate, but now that the deal is done, it's necessary to recognize how it will likely affect future diplomacy. The most immediate result will likely be seen in Israel's relationship with Hamas, which is currently holding the captured soldier Gilad Schalit. Hamas is demanding the release of hundreds of prisoners from Israeli jails and will likely be emboldened by Hezbollah's success. Using Schalit as a bargaining chip is tragic and makes his return all the more uncertain.

In the same week that the prisoner exchange heralded the prospect of future instability, Syrian President Bashar Assad gained international attention at a diplomatic conference in Paris. The new climate in the region harbours definite hazards, but it may also provide new opportunities.

One of the largest impediments to peace between Israel and Lebanon, as well as to peace between Israel and the Palestinians or Syria, has always been the schisms in Arab societies. Without popularly accepted and united centralized governments, no single national will can emerge in these nations. Nasrallah's new position atop Lebanese politics gives him the ability to legitimately speak for his people – and for peace, if he so chooses.

It also provides him with new obligations and, hopefully, new prudence and responsibility. Likewise, a strong Assad may prove to be a more able partner for peace. And talks with Hamas may unite the Palestinians. Only though dealing with a genuine national spokesperson, as the Hamas government may prove to be, can Israel hope to achieve any semblance of peace.

The Kirshner File

A new historical account of the Lodz ghetto

On Aug. 1, 1944, Mordechai Chaim Rumkowski, the Eldest of the Jews in the Lodz ghetto, was officially told that it would be closed and that its 70,000 Jewish inhabitants would be deported at a rate of 5,000 per day starting two days later. The brusque announcement signalled the end of the last remaining ghetto in Nazi-occupied Poland, which had survived due to its status as a productive labour camp.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Sixty four years on, a new, gracefully written historical account of the ghetto, Ghettostadt: Lodz and the Making of a Nazi City (Harvard University Press), has been published. The author, Gordon J. Horwitz, is a Illinois Wesleyan University historian. The title is an allusion to German plans to transform Lodz, the centre of Poland's textile industry, into a modern, clean and orderly city inhabited solely by ethnic Germans.

By the outbreak of World War II, Lodz had a population of 670,000, of whom 59 per cent were Polish, 32 per cent were Jewish and nine per cent were Germans. With Lodz in Nazi hands, the overcrowded city was to be remade on the basis of the latest principles of urban planning. Neither Poles nor Jews were included in its "Aryan" future. The Poles would be expelled and resettled, while the Jews would be permanently removed.

When the Wehrmacht marched into Lodz on Sept. 8, 1939, a week after Germany's invasion of Poland, the conquerors were warmly welcomed by residents of German ancestry. Adolf Hitler, the German fuhrer, visited Lodz on Sept. 13, and his motorcade was rapturously received. Germany's victory ushered in a dark period of anti-Semitic restrictions, humiliations and violence, Horwitz notes. The strong, well-organized Jewish community – which had produced figures such as the cotton magnate Izrael Poznanski, the poet Julian Tuwim, the painter Arthur Szyk, the actor Szymon Dzigan and the pianist Arthur Rubinstein – had reason to be nervous. Within a month of Rumkowski's appointment as head of the Jewish Council – the Judenrat – on Oct. 13, the first of four major synagogues were set ablaze and Jews were forbidden to set foot on Piotrkowska Street, the most elegant thoroughfare, and subjected to severe curfews.

By this juncture, thousands of Jews had managed to escape, some to eastern Poland and much of the rest to the Soviet Union. The remaining 164,000 Jewish residents were subjected to ghettoization. As Horwitz points out, the Nazis regarded the ghetto as a temporary expedient and the Jews as a "pestilent boil" that would be "burned off," leaving no trace. On May 1, 1940, a month after Lodz was renamed Litzmannstadt in honour of a World War I German general, the ghetto, an area of only four square kilometres, was sealed off.

As these events unfolded, ethnic Germans from as close as Galicia and as far away as Latvia and Estonia were encouraged to settle in Lodz, which had already been annexed by Germany. The new settlers were granted immediate citizenship and housing and promised jobs, farms and businesses. Meanwhile, the city's streets were given German names.

Realizing that the ghetto's days were numbered, Rumkowski, a businessman who had been an insurance agent, a summer camp director and a manager of Jewish orphanages, devised a plan to extend its life. He suggested that its contingent of 8,000 to 10,000 skilled workers, ranging from tailors and shoemakers to carpenters and plumbers, could be made available to the German economy.

If Germany supplied the necessary raw materials, Jewish craftsmen, working in ghetto factories at meagre wages determined by the authorities, could turn them into essential finished goods from army uniforms and shoes to metal articles and gloves. The Germans, having accepted his proposal, regarding the ghetto as a revenue-generating enterprise. The workers and their families would receive a bare minimum of rations, just enough to keep the workshops humming in 12-hour shifts. As long as the ghetto was not a drain on the resources of the city, it would be kept going. The ghetto's administrator, Hans Biebow, a coffee importer from Bremen who personally profited from the arrangement, was an ardent exponent of exploiting cheap Jewish labour.

Rumkowski was pleased, too, but as he amassed power and assumed the trappings of an autocrat, his self-confidence clouded his judgment. In May 1941, at the peak of his powers, he paid a "state visit" to the Warsaw ghetto, presenting himself as a man who could lead in difficult times. Adam Czerniakow, his Warsaw counterpart, was not impressed. In his diary, he described Rumkowski as "conceited and witless." Returning from Warsaw, whose ghetto would be levelled in 1943, Rumkowski made light of the abysmal conditions in Lodz. "Go to Warsaw and you'll see what starvation means," he said. "With me, you have the Garden of Eden."

Not exactly.

Disease, mainly in the form of dysentery, was taking its toll, as was malnutrition. According to Horwitz,11,437 ghetto dwellers died in 1941. In the following year, 43,500 succumbed to hunger and disease. Amid the appalling deprivation, German delegations visited the ghetto On June 12, 1941, the most important visitor, SS chieftain Heinrich Himmler, arrived in a green BMW convertible bearing the license plate SS-1. Rumkowski, attired in a white Panama hat and white gloves, met him. Himmler asked how things were going, and Rumkowski replied, "Everything is in the best of order, herr minister." When Himmler inquired whether there was sufficient food, he said, "The workers have enough to eat."

Mordechai Chaim Rumkowski, left, white hair, meets SS chieftain Heinrich Himmler as he sits in his car.

Horwitz says that both sides were satisfied with the visit, but within six months, the Nazis began to deport thousands of Jews to Chelmno. Among the deportees were newly arrived Jews from Germany, Austria and Luxemburg. All told, 55,000 Jews, including many children, were deported in 1942, leaving only the fit. By January 1943, he adds, slightly more than half of the ghetto's original inhabitants had been deported to their deaths. With one notable exception, the ghetto was spared deportations in that year.

But 1944 would be different. The SS, eager to incorporate the ghetto into its economic and administrative domain, launched a campaign to wrest control of the ghetto from Biebow and his associates. Biebow resisted, going to great lengths to ward off SS encroachments. Addressing 400 Jewish officials, he spoke of the need to create a "good impression" and eliminate signs of disorder in public settings.

Biebow, however, fought a losing battle. In June, Himmler ordered the ghetto to be liquidated. Biebow flew into a rage after one of his colleagues bypassed him and instructed Rumkowski to set aside workers to clear rubble in German cities bombed by the Allies. Venting his anger on Rumkowski, Biebow badly beat him. Rumkowski required hospitalization for facial wounds.

Deportations commenced in June as the first Jews were shipped to Chelmno. By July 15, some 7,000 Jews had been deported with the assistance of ghetto policemen. Amid the chaos, Biebow sweetly assured Jews – whom he referred to as "my Jews" – that they had nothing to fear and were being relocated to work camps. In fact, he played an active role in the deportations. Rumkowski's turn came on Aug. 28, when he and his relatives were deported to Auschwitz. Horwitz brands Rumkowski as an egotist, but does not condemn him, saying that he "did not hasten to do the Germans' bidding" and was powerless to influence their genocidal policy. By all accounts, only 5,000 Lodz Jews, including my mother and father, survived. Biebow, convicted of murder, was hanged in Lodz in April 1947. Call it, if you will, poetic justice.

U of T president visits three Israeli universities

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Over the past few years, University of Toronto president David Naylor has had to contend with expressions of frustration from the Jewish community about his reluctance to ban Israeli Apartheid Week events from his school, but this past spring he showed his ongoing support for Israeli universities with a week-long visit to the Jewish state.

In May, Naylor travelled to Israel to take part in meetings with university leaders, government officials and private sector leaders in an effort to learn from Israelis how to better commercialize academic research.

David Naylor

He visited Hebrew University of Jerusalem, Technion – Israel Institute of Technology, and the Weizmann Institute of Science.

"The main goal of the visit was to understand how Israel in general, and its academic institutions in particular, has been so successful at commercializing research done at universities and in research hospitals," Naylor said, adding that he took the time to meet with the rector and president of Hebrew U, with which U of T has an inter-university memorandum of agreement, and he tried to create stronger bonds with Technion and Weizmann.

Naylor's visit came a year after he wrote a letter to Britain's University and College Union to urge that country's largest professors' union not to recommend that its members boycott Israeli academic institutions.

"The University of Toronto is firmly opposed to an academic boycott of Israeli institutions. Last year, in criticizing the misguided call by the British Universities and Colleges Union for a boycott debate and vote, I indicated that we are not only fundamentally opposed to cutting ties, but were very likely to increase our interactions not only with Israeli universities, but with a wide range of sister universities all over the world," Naylor said in an e-mail to The CJN last week.

"This [trip] was a chance to put those words into action, and I was, therefore, proud to visit three outstanding Israeli universities."

Naylor also referred to Israeli Apartheid Week, a week-long anti-Israel event that originated at U of T and has spread to many more campuses worldwide.

"This trip underscored something I've suspected for a while, namely, that Israeli Apartheid Week is ultimately irrelevant to the politics of the Middle East. The future of Israel and its neighbours will not be decided by a small group of activists who talk mostly to themselves on a few North American university campuses," he said.

He added that it's best for the Jewish community to ignore the event rather that generate free publicity for it, and instead support Jewish students at U of T who present Israel in a different light.

During his visit to Israel, Naylor, along with representatives from other Canadian institutions – including University of British Columbia president Stephen Toope and Eliot Phillipson, president of the Canada Foundation for Innovation – sat in on more than 20 meetings in Jerusalem, Rehovot, Haifa and Tel Aviv to understand more about the commercialization of academic research in Israel.

"The science I saw and heard about was world class, and the commercialization environment is better developed than ours here in Canada... We're looking at how we can adapt some of the commercialization models in Israeli universities, and more generally, whether Canada might borrow from Israel's experience in building a high-tech economy," he said.

"We got exactly what I hoped we'd get – lots of open exchanges with smart colleagues, so that we could better understand the transformation of the Israeli economy. Remember, just a few decades ago, Israeli's exports were overwhelmingly agricultural. Now Israel and Canada go back and forth in taking second place for the number of companies listed on NASDAQ, and the country has a booming high-tech sector with massive exports."

Naylor said he was impressed with the progress Israel has made in such a short time, but he said he also really liked the people he met.

"They were direct and warm. There was a palpable seriousness of purpose – not surprising given the history of the region – but the colleagues in general didn't take themselves seriously. That was refreshing, because academics in North America can be pretty earnest."

Naylor said that he isn't worried about protests that may arise from a "tiny, but vocal minority" about his decision to partner with Israeli universities, because the vast majority of the U of T campus community understands the importance of academic exchange.

"They may or may not agree with all the domestic and foreign policies of government A or B or C. But that doesn't stop people at U of T from building institutional bridges and positive personal relationships with their colleagues in other countries."

Canadian university presidents visit Jewish state

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The presidents of six Canadian universities visited Israel recently.

Their one-week tour took place last month and culminated in a Canada Day reception at the Canadian ambassador's residence in Herzliya, a Tel Aviv suburb. It was the fourth mission of its kind since 1993. The mission was co-hosted by two Canadian academics, University of Toronto law professor Ed Morgan and York University historian Irving Abella, both of whom have led previous missions.

Participating on the trip were David Johnston, Sheldon Levy, Luc Vinet, Peter MacKinnon, Allan Rock and William Barker, the respective presidents of the University of Waterloo, Ryerson University, Université de Montréal, the University of Saskatchewan, the University of Ottawa and University of King's College in Halifax.

The president of McGill University, Heather Monroe-Blum, joined them for one day.

"The purpose of the trip was to increase the familiarity of Canadian academics with the breadth and depth of the Israeli university scene, with a view to fostering faculty and student exchanges, graduate student fellowship opportunities, joint research projects and collaborative teaching and scholarships," explained Morgan, a former national president of Canadian Jewish Congress.

Abella, who is also a former CJC national president, said the objective was three-fold: to introduce the Canadians to their Israeli counterparts, to allow them to see first hand the quality of education and research at Israeli universities, and to encourage the creation of joint research and exchange programs.

The visitors met the presidents and senior administrators of Tel Aviv University, Hebrew University, Bar-Ilan University, Haifa University, Ben Gurion University of the Negev, the Weizmann Institute, the Technion and the Herzliya Interdisciplinary Center.

In addition, they conferred with officials of Al-Quds, a Palestinian university in eastern Jerusalem.

Abella hoped that the presidents would be able to visit Palestinian universities in the West Bank, but the idea was scotched when the Canadian Embassy expressed concerns about their safety.

Morgan said the trip generally focused on education, culture, arts, science and technology rather than politics.

"Canada and Israel share much in terms of education policy, struggles with public funding of universities, the balance between broad access to higher education and academic excellence, a focus on fostering culture and cultural industries, and an open minded and liberal educational environment," he explained.

He added, "In a shrinking world, there is much more to be gained on both sides from increased exchanges."

The trip yielded immediate results, Abella disclosed.

Tel Aviv University and the Université de Montréal signed a student exchange accord in the sciences, while Haifa University and the University of Ottawa agreed to launch an exchange program in law.

In the past, Canadian and Israeli universities have signed agreements establishing joint research programs.

Speaking generally, Abella said such trips are effective because they expose influential Canadians who have never visited Israel to the fact that life goes on and flourishes in a country that is under constant threat.

Visitors are also amazed by the level of sophisticated research conducted at Israeli universities and struck by the perception that universities in both countries face similar problems.

Levy, not a first-time visitor to Israel, said he was able to "talk through" common issues with his Israeli and Palestinian counterparts and explore opportunities for relations with the Technion.

He seemed particularly bowled over by the Weizmann Institute. "Impressed would be an understatement," he observed.

Johnston, who has also visited Israel before, described last month's trip as "a very interesting followup," saying he expected to build on previous exchanges.

The trip was partially financed by the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) and private donors, but participants contributed toward their own travel expenses, Morgan said.

Susan Davis, CIJA's executive vice-president responsible for campus advocacy, said these trips build relationships between Canadian and Israeli universities.

"That's the primary outcome we strive for. We also want [participants] to understand Israel beyond the Arab-Israeli conflict."

First visit, first impressions

William Barker, the president of University of King's College in Halifax, joined the study tour that took several Canadian university presidents to Israel last month. CJN reporter Sheldon Kirshner asked him for his impressions.

Canadian Jewish News: Was this your first trip to Israel?
William Barker: This was my first visit to Israel. I was struck by the way the new and the old were layered, by the mixture in the city of so much history and energized modern life, by the sudden silence on Shabbat, by the extraordinary development of the land and the cities, by the stillness of the desert, by the small size of a country which has figured so largely in history and in our daily news, by the number of young men and women in uniform comfortably carrying their weapons in public places.

I was surprised at the remarkable number of other people visiting the country, either on the Birthright [Israel] trip or some other organized tour. We ran into a very large deputation of African university presidents, and we heard of another deputation of university presidents from the United States. Israel is clearly very interested in being known.

We did a lot in six or so days, visiting all of the publicly supported universities (Tel Aviv, Bar-Ilan, Weizmann Institute, Hebrew University, Technion, Haifa, Ben Gurion) and one private school (Interdisciplinary Center, Herzliya). We went to the Dead Sea and Galilee, met with President Shimon Peres and with Dorit Beinisch, president of the Supreme Court.

One of several high points was hearing Daniel Zajfman, president of the Weizmann Institute, talk about the way he and his colleagues do research:

- curiosity-driven, with secure long-term funding commitments. And also extraordinary from such a high-level institution.
- A commitment to high school education, to bring along the next generation.

I am an English professor by training, have little understanding of the scientific research, but I was inspired by the vision of education and research that Dr Zajfman presented. This is a model that can be followed in every discipline.

I was also astonished to see how Hebrew has become a first language after only a century or so of use as a working language of day-to-day interactions. And I was impressed by the support the universities and public institutions have received from international donors. An amusing moment was standing in the Nancy Reagan Plaza in front of the Frank Sinatra Student Center at Hebrew University.

CJN: Do you already have exchanges with Israeli universities? Did you sign new ones?
Barker: We have no exchanges, though a number of our students have gone to the Rothberg School at Hebrew University. We wish to increase the flow because we have a number of students who, because of heritage or academic interest, wish to attend. There is faculty interest as well. The main challenge for the students is the cost, and we're trying to find ways to help with the expenses.

CJN: Is there anything you would like to add?
Barker: This was an extraordinary chance to have a first look at an amazing nation and to reflect on the way education can be made an effective instrument as part of a larger political project. It was clear, from the many shades on the political spectrum and the abundant range of opinions, that Israeli education has had a major role in generating debate and thought in the country, as well as material success. We were also exposed to the funding problems, so all was not perfect. We heard about the way the system favoured some groups over others. I appreciated the honesty and being allowed to listen in to some of the debate.

Zuchter Berk COR 796 DAIRY · MEAT CREATIVE CATERERS

The staff and management of Zuchter Berk Creative Caterers are deeply saddened by the passing of its founder and mentor

Max Zuchter ז"ל

We wish to express condolences to the family, Anne Zuchter, Lorraine & David Berk, Barbara and Martin Greenglass, Gloria and Ken Hershenfield and all the grandchildren and great grandchildren that gave him much love, joy and support during his almost 88 years.

He will also be sadly missed by those he mentored at the catering company that he founded over 55 years ago. Many customers and organizations looked to him for guidance and direction in planning important life cycle events and Simchas. He brought integrity and professionalism to kosher catering industry and earned respect from the entire Jewish community.

May the memories he left us serve as inspiration to his family, friends and those he touched.

Jewish Life

It's summer, but not vacation

Class Act
By Daniel Held

Having transitioned directly from being a student to a teacher, I have never known a year without a summer break. I feel a sense of loss for my friends who left school and entered the "real" world of work with monotonous summers of commutes to the office, days staring at computer screens and the mundane pace of a never-ending year.

To me, however, July and August have never been summer vacation. To view them as such would trivialize their importance. Summer is a time of exploration and growth, a time when youth are challenged to learn about themselves and the world around them.

As a child, I spent my summers at camp. In my younger years at day camps, I learned about computers and mechanics. I played sports and learned to canoe. When I reached the age of overnight camp, I discovered friendships that can only be made while camping in Algonquin Park or singing in the dining hall on Shabbat.

During high school, I spent part of each summer working and part of it traveling with my family. Each summer, we embarked on a new adventure, bringing us closer as a family and teaching my sister and me about history, geography and independence. Wherever we travelled, my parents made sure that we visited the local Jewish community – finding kosher food, the synagogue and speaking with the local Jews. Meeting Jews from around the world taught us not only about other communities, but it also taught us much about our own Jewish identities.

One of my most meaningful experiences was the summer after Grade 11. I spent it travelling with 27 other teens. We spent 10 days in Poland learning about the vibrancy of Jewish life before the Holocaust and the horrors that ensued. Next, we travelled to Ukraine where we ran a summer camp for local youth, sharing with them our passion and creativity. Finally, after more than a month in eastern Europe, we arrived in Israel to tour, relax and experience the country.

All these years later, I continue to return to my experiences on that trip, recalling the stories, the people I encountered and the lessons I learned. Throughout the trip, I was challenged to stretch myself and to grow toward a more complex understanding of my place in the Jewish world. I continue to deconstruct the experiences, and I know that the challenges of the entire experience have deeply affected my life.

It's this element of challenge that I believe is the most critical part of summer experiences, and of experiential education in general. By challenging our youth, they are forced to develop skills in critical thinking while applying new experiences to their own lives. Rather than simply participating in an experience such as camp, when challenged, teens stretch themselves farther and explore the meaning of these experiences.

As an educator, I want to shape experiences that challenge teens in this way. Recently, I have spent my summers working at Genesis at Brandeis University, a program that compels teens to think about the place of Judaism in their lives. Genesis brings together a group of teens spanning the religious, geographic and socio-economic spectrums of Judaism. By encountering people who are different than themselves – by talking with them, living with them and planning Shabbat with them – participants are challenged to learn both about others and about themselves. Each summer, I have seen teens leave the experience with an enriched sense of themselves and their relationship with Judaism.

If we view the summer as a vacation from the learning of the school year, we sacrifice some of the most educational, memorable and challenging experiences of a child's education. Summers must be cherish and nurtured, planned and savoured as times of growth in ways we often don't get during the school year.

After all, not everyone can be as fortunate as educators, who have a new summer every year.

Summer reading

Books
Bernard Baskin

Suddenly, we are in the midst of summer. There is more time for reading. But what books?

"The trick is finding which [novel], among the millions now accessible, fits that bill. For you, that is. And that, as Virginia Woolf told us, is something no one can tell you. Or, if they do, ignore them," writes John Sutherland, a professor of modern English literature at University College in London, England.

What is meat for one is poison for another. We must discover our own books and make our own spiritual friendships.

However, I feel comfortable in suggesting some older books that have attained the patina of widespread popularity and acceptance. If you haven't read them, they remain new.

Perhaps in the dim past you have read some of the familiar volumes I suggest. But they cry out for rereading. Now, older and wiser, you can bring to them mature insights, keener understanding and enhanced appreciation.

What follows is a list of 10 well-known titles of Jewish interest.

1. The Adventures of Augie March, Saul Bellow

An account of a complex character who becomes embroiled in a series of exotic escapades. This is a brilliant, penetrating narrative of an entire era and its major concerns and foibles. (Also: Mr. Sammler's Planet).

2. Catch-22, Joseph Heller

War is presented as a form of institutional madness in this funny, but often deadly serious novel. After flying 48 missions in World War II, the protagonist wants to go home. But first, caught in the twisted logic of the war machine, he must prove he is insane. This frenetic satire on the excesses of bureaucracy has been canonized as a cult classic.

3. The Plot Against America, Philip Roth

This suspenseful and alarming narrative answers the question – what might have happened if aviator Charles Lindbergh had been elected president of the United States in 1940? The author renders his premise plausible with a masterly interweaving of personal detail and public events. (Also: Patrimony and The Human Stain)

4. The Assistant, Bernard Malamud

In a small, grocery store in Brooklyn, N.Y., a Jewish family struggles to eke out a modest living. Ultimately, their gentile assistant makes a startling decision that transforms him and those around him. (Also: The Magic Barrel and Other Stories).

5. The Garden of the Finzi-Continis, G. Bassani

Set in the Italian Fascist era of the 1920s and '30s, a wealthy, cultured Jewish family sees their world shrink to the size of a small beloved garden.

6. Solomon Gursky Was Here, Mordecai Richler

This is a thinly disguised take off on the early years of the Bronfman family. It includes Jewish characters exploring 19th-century Arctic regions and confronting anti-Semitism in Quebec. (Also: St. Urbain's Horseman and Joshua Then and Now).

7. Collected Stories, I.B. Singer

The best known and most successful Yiddish writer of our day combined the occult and erotic with a narrative style that disguises a complex and disturbing vision. (Also: Satan in Goray and Gimpel the Fool).

8. Badenheim 1939, Aharon Applefield

Translated from the Hebrew, this haunting story chronicles the final season in an Austrian summer resort where worldly acculturated Jews "pooh-pooh" the notion that Hitler is a threat.

9. Red Cavalry, Isaac Babel

Before he was murdered by Stalin, Babel served in the ranks of Marshall Budyonny's anti-Semitic Cossack division in the Russo-Polish war of 1921-22. This book is a series of unforgettable vignettes – an early form of war reportage – by a writer of singular power.

10. The Second Scroll, A.M. Klein

Klein was one of Canada's outstanding poets. In this, his only novel, he describes a fellow poet who is sent to Israel to fashion an anthology of modern Hebrew verse. His task is intertwined with the search for a heroic relative who epitomizes the historic spirit of the Jewish people.

Highlighting a double standard

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Perhaps no other nation other than Nazi Germany has sufficiently recognized the power of propaganda. The Nazis even went so far as to elevate it to a ministry and appoint Joseph Goebbels as its minister. We Jews could take a few lessons in this art of propaganda.

The world, and in particular the media, love to condemn the State of Israel for its treatment of the Palestinians, specifically for the "ethnic cleansing" of the Palestinians after the establishment of the state.

The reality is that during the time of the British mandate in 1947, there were some 750,000 Arabs in Palestine. Today, there are more than five million Palestinians. This does not include another four million people worldwide who claim to be of Palestinian descent. The question is how can a people claim to have been cleansed when they have such a robust rate of population growth that it's double the rate of their immediate geographic neighbours?

The situation is quite the reverse when looking at the population of Jews in Arab lands. Jews had lived in some countries for more than 2,000 years – predating, in fact, the Arabs and making them more indigenous than the Arab population. Despite this, Jews found themselves in a situation where the official policies were against them.

In 1951, for instance, the government of Iraq outlawed Zionism. Jews were forced to sign declarations against Zionism. Egyptian Jews in 1967 were persecuted and tortured, and their property was confiscated. In that same year, Libya "temporarily" expelled its Jewish population. Each individual was allowed one suitcase and a total of $50. This was followed in 1970 with new laws confiscating all Jewish assets.

In Syria and Iran, the government systematically and summarily nationalized Jewish-owned companies, causing the immediate flight of families, often mid-supper while watching in horror the fate of their companies on the evening news. Even in such places as politically moderate as Morocco, the sentiment on the street was such that Jews felt threatened there, too.

These virtual expulsions of Jews from Arab lands and the confiscation of their assets are only now gaining recognition.

On April 1, the United States Congress recognized Jewish refugees from Arab countries for the first time, and this month, a two-day conference took place in London that highlighted the situation of Jews who were either forced to flee or left due to persecution.

The conference was organized by a group called Justice for Jews from Arab Countries (JJAC), a coalition of 77 Jewish communities and organizations in 20 countries. The highlight of the conference was the opportunity to formally address the British House of Lords.

This was one more important step in bringing to light the sad reality of historic communities that have vanished, and the human rights violations of individuals at the hands of their Arab hosts.

Jews and the Olympics, Pt. 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Thousands of athletes will soon be arriving in Beijing to compete in the 29th Summer Olympics. Although Jewish athletes have shared in Olympic glory, for Jews, the memory of the Olympics also includes racism, violence and death. Today, a look at that history.

The Jews in Sports website has created biographies for 99 Jewish athletes who have competed in the modern games, everybody from Argentina's Juan Alberto Espil (men's basketball, Atlanta 1996) to Uzbekistan's Oleg Veretelnikov (decathlon, Sydney 2000.) [tinyurl.com/6xmtn2]

One of the stars of the first modern Games was Alfred Flatow of Germany, who brought home three gold and a silver for excellence in gymnastics in 1896. Those four medals tied Flatow for the second-most in Athens. The International Jewish Sports Hall of Fame lists the medal count for every Jewish Olympian from Athens 1896 to Athens 2004. [tinyurl.com/3keu8h]

Two of the best-known Jewish Olympians competed almost half a century apart. Britain's Harold Abrahams won gold in the 100-metre final at the 1924 Paris Olympics. Abrahams' story is well-known thanks to the 1981 film Chariots of Fire. [tinyurl.com/5oag9] The United States' Mark Spitz was the first athlete to win seven gold medals in a single Olympic Games. [tinyurl.com/2cmvf2] You can watch a short documentary about Spitz's Munich golds at the Olympic Games website. [tinyurl.com/6h4crg]

Unfortunately, for Jews the memory of the Olympics is not always pleasant. One of the greatest blots on the history of the Games is the Nazi Germany's hosting of the 1936 Summer Olympics. The United States Holocaust Memorial Museum has a comprehensive site detailing the Games starting in 1931 with the International Olympic Committee's awarding of the 11th Olympiad to Berlin. Although Hitler was elated with the Games and German athletes captured the most medals overall, the site notes that 13 Jewish athletes and 10 African-American competitors (including Jesse Owens) were medalists at the Games. [tinyurl.com/6jqstk]

And of course, there was the tragedy of the 1972 Munich Olympics, when Palestinian terrorists murdered 11 members of the Israeli Olympic delegation. The Olympics maintains a very large website, but I couldn't find a memorial to the slain athletes on it. There is one paragraph titled "The Games Must Go On!" that mentions the murders, the temporary suspension of the Games and the resolve of then-IOC president Avery Brundage that the Olympics continue. [tinyurl.com/3jp98] Fortunately, the Olympic Committee of Israel maintains an online memorial. [tinyurl.com/43lxfh] To learn more about the massacre, I recommend a comprehensive section put together by Sports Illustrated to mark the 30th anniversary of the killings. [tinyurl.com/356mrs]

Israel first sent a delegation to the Helsinki Olympics in 1952, but it wasn't until Barcelona in 1992 that Yael Arad and Oren Samdja took home the country's first medals – both in judo. [tinyurl.com/4fl6zs] Israel's medal count now stands at six, with windsurfer Gal Fridman winning the country's first gold in 2004. Nothing beats the pride on Fridman's face as the first notes of Hatikvah were played in Athens. [tinyurl.com/26te35] And in a lovely article, Time's Jeff Chu called the gold medal win – three decades after the Munich murders – "Israel's Olympic Healing." [tinyurl.com/5k772j]

If you're not a high performance sailor or cut out to compete in the 100-metre dash, there may still is a sport for you. A couple of sites have suggested events in which Jews could perform swifter, higher, stronger. Ohr Somayach proposes:

- kippah frisbee;
- the 18-blessing lip-sprint;
- the clean-and-jerk Torah lift,
- and underwater shofar blowing. [tinyurl.com/4rx62l]

And if Stuart Spector had his way, Jewish events would include: [tinyurl.com/2cvrn]

- Balance beam: The accountant or bookkeeper that balances my mother's chequebook in the shortest time wins.
- Oyga vault: A sound-enhanced pole vault competition, in which the vaulter gains extra points for exclaiming, "Oy, such tsuris this is causing me!"

My favourite – it must be a truly gruelling competition – is the naches shlep, in which proud bubbies and zaides have two minutes to boast about their grandchildren.

Charity needs help to keep on helping

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

As the only staff member of United Chesed of Toronto (UCT), executive administrator Ruth Rebeck fears that she's not doing enough for those in need.

She needs help to keep up with the demand.

The not-for-profit charity, founded in 2001 by Toronto dentist Brian Price, assists members of the Jewish community who are experiencing financial hardship or living in poverty, but don't meet the requirements of other social service agencies.

"They might own a heavily mortgaged home, work at a low salary, or not be landed immigrants. There are lots of reasons," Rebeck said.

In 2007, she said, she circulated about $500,000 worth of food coupons, furniture, medical items such as wheelchairs, and appliances, with financial support of about $35,000.

But with UCT's only funding coming from one private donor, some "dribs and drabs" from other donors, and with help from Mazon Canada, "we are living close to the wire," Rebeck said.

The only way UCT can hope to keep up with the growing need, she said, is if it gets enough financial support to open a formal office and hire two support staff members.

"Then we would be able to give more time and energy to each person in need."

In a typical day, she said, she receives at least 10 to 15 calls, and one call can result in her making a minimum of three other calls to deal with the issue.

"And that doesn't count the e-mails that pour in from people asking for help or offering donations."

By the time people approach UCT, Rebeck said, they are desperate. "They've tried all other options and they want to talk. Each call takes a long time."

One such call came from a father with a handicapped son whose van had broken down. "E-mails were sent out to see if someone had an old van to donate. This situation has been going on for about six weeks and several negotiations have broken down for various reasons. We are trying to help this man who is desperate because he has no vehicle. So far, this has created about 20 phone calls and hundreds of e-mails to the network."

Another call came in about a family of five who are dealing with the loss of their home and business. "We managed to get them monthly food coupons with the help of an organization on our network, we sent out resumes for the parents, and we organized free family therapy. We had to help them keep their bodies and souls together," Rebeck said.

"I could work around the clock. I'm helping people find jobs, I'm advertising jobs, I'm dealing with furniture donations, and I'm helping them find doctors and obtaining medications. The list goes on."

With the help of an assistant and a clerk, she could get a lot more done, she said. "We need to expand in order to cope with the ever-increasing needs of those living below the poverty line."

For more information, call Rebeck at 905-707-0233 or visit the website at www.unitedchesed.com.

מה יהיה

בחדשים האחרונים נשמעו ההצהרות הבאות מפי מנהיגים ישראלים:
שאול מופז: "ישראל יכולה למחוק את איראן".
אהוד ברק: "ישראל לא תהסס לתקוף את איראן".
אהוד אולמרט: "נסראללה מפחד פחד מוות מישראל".
האם זה החום הישראלי הקופת, או נעיף טפשות שעבר במערכת הקידוד של חדר השיבות של הממשלה?
מה מקור היוהרה הזאת? ההצלחה הכבירה במלחמת לבנון השניה?
המנהל היעיל והמצליח של הממשלה?
במה הם שונים מאחמינג'אד שיוצא בהצהרות כאלה כל יומיים וכל העולם לועג לה? האם עד כדי כך השתלט הלֶבֶנט על האנשים האלה?
אם לישראל יש כוח הרתעה אמיתי-לא ההצהרות העלובות האלה ידועו את האיראנים ואת חיזבאללה, אלא מעשים, כגון השמדת הכור הסורי בחיתולו.
דיבורים ליצנים כאלה של ברק, מופז ואולמרט משינים לדעתי את ההיפך: מנהיגים ערבים מצהירים הצהרות כוב כל חייהם, ועכשיו הם מחייכים ואומרים לעצמם: ואללה, גם הישראלים תצרוש כמונו.
ברוך הבא למזרח התיכון. אבל שישאר בינינו.

כלבים בתפריט

לפני שנתיים היינו בשנחאי וגילינו לתמהוננו שאחד הדליקטסים האהובים על הסינים הוא בשר כלב, והוא מתנוסס לראווה בתפריט שמוצג בכניסה למסעדות יקרות.
ארקיי, אוקיי, מה אני עושה מזה עניין-צרפתים אוכלים צפרדעים, וכשהייתי בהולנד בגיל ארבע עשרה עם תזמורת סימפתית גדל'ע כמעט אימדתי את ההכרה כשגילתי ששמו לנו בשר סוס על הצלחת. אז למה אני מספר לכם על זה דווקא עכשיו?
כי אם תסעו לאולימפיאדה בבייגין-לא תמצאו בשר כלב במסעדות, כי הסינים הסירו אותו מן התפריטים. הם גם סילקו את העניים מהרחובות, הפסיקו זמנית מפעלים שמכסים את העיר בעשן, וקרוב לודאי שסין תיראה כמו דנמרק-ידידותית, אוהבת אדם, ממש בתבונידה. וזה אחד המקומות הכי יוזעתיים בכדור הארץ בכל מה שנוגע לזכויות האזרח.
לפחות לכלבים יהיו שלושה שבועות של חופש.

מה שלמדתי מאלן מינץ

לפני מספר שבועות, בנסיעי לעבודה, שמעתי ברדיו על שלושה צעירים שמכתימים הוגדסקה לתוך נתל והם נהרגו. אלה הן הודעות של יום ביומו, ובעקבותיהן באה תמיד רשימת שמות שלא אומרת בדרך כלל דבר. אלא שהפעם היהיתי שם שם אחד: קוֹדי מינץ, ילד מלא חיים ששיחק עם בְּנֵי הוקי במשך שמונה שנים.
מקי יומיים-בבית ההלוויות על סיטלס, קהל רב אבל צער על החיים הצעירים האלה שנגדעו. ואז עלה להספיד אביו של קוֹדי, אלן מינץ, וכל כלי התכונתי לרע מכל, למזעזע מכל. ואז קרה נס: בעשר הדקות הבאות צחק הקהל הגדול מכל לב, כשאלן משתף אותנו בדקות המצחיקות והנפלאות שהיו לו עם קוֹדי. אינני יודע מאיפה לקח אלן את הכוח הפלאי הזה, אבל הוא הראה לי בעוצמה רבה את מהות המושג to celebrate his life
אני מעלם לא נכחתי באזירה שכזאת, והיא גרמה לי להתפעמות אמיתית ולתובנה חדשה איך יכול אדם לנַשֵּׁך ולהשלים עם אובדן איום שכזה. אלן לא ניסה ליפות את הדברים. הוא גם אמר בגילוי לב שמבחינות רבות מותו של בנו האהוב מסיים את חייו שלו. עם זאת מצא דרך לחגוג את חייו של הילד בדרך שעזרה לכולנו, ודרך התגובה שלנו לעזור גם לו עצמו. תודה לך מקרב לב, אלן.

מילה חדשה בעברית:

תודה לשמתה ומר על החדשה הבאה מהאקדמיה ללשון עברית:
מעתה ואילך אל תאמר שוחד, אלא אמור דמי קדימה.
אבל שישאר בינינו.

Kvutza reunion will recall 'much-loved camp'

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Some 70 years ago, the Canadian Labour Zionist Youth movement set up a chain of summer camps with the intention of teaching its values to young Jews across the country.

This September, alumni of Ontario's Camp Kvutza will gather in Toronto to share memories and rekindle old friendships as they remember their summer experiences of yore.

In keeping with its founders' philosophy, Camp Kvutza – which was located on the northeastern shores of Lake Erie in Lowbanks, Ont., before it closed in 1965 – was unlike other summer camps.

A spartan, kibbutz-like affair, Kvutza campers were taught to appreciate the values of hard work, love for Israel (with an eye on encouraging aliyah) and on finding creative ways to entertain themselves.

Despite their less-than-glamourous surroundings, Kvutza campers were some of the happiest around. This, according to Tobi "Pidgy" Gordon, 62, who is on the organizing committee for this year's reunion.

Gordon's grandfather was a member of the Farband and helped organize the camp in the 1940s, and she was a camper there from 1950 to 1963.

She said her camping experiences helped shape the woman she is today.

"A lot of my lingering feeling [from Camp Kvutza] is the memory of Jewish cultural influence… love of folk-dancing, singing," she told The CJN in a recent interview.

Another important lesson learned at Kvutza was to value people over objects.

"The camp wasn't about things, it was about friendships and people," Gordon added. "I was lucky I was there during its heyday."

Today, Gordon writes in depth about her experiences and memories of camp on her blog, Kvutza Memories (kvutzamemories.blogspot.com).

Invitations to the reunion went out via e-mail earlier this year, and Gordon said the organizing committee expects anywhere from 200 to 300 people to attend.

So far, nearly 160 "Kvutzaniks" from around the United States and Canada have responded to the online invitation.

But there is no cap to the number of attendees, Gordon said.

According to Naomi Fromstein (neé Talesnick), another member of the reunion's organizing committee and an ex-camper, Kvutza helped kids "develop individual talent, leadership capabilities, confidence and self-reliance."

Fromstein said she made a promise to herself that she would organize a Kvutza reunion one day. Now that she's helped bring it to fruition, the anticipation of seeing old friends has made her giddy with excitement.

"Kvutza's programming… was marvellous, creative and crazy!" she wrote in an e-mail. "The staff would wake the campers up during the night, drag us half asleep to the waterfront, orchard or baseball field… to launch whatever the Maccabiah-like program was that they had planned for that year. We were divided into teams, competed, lost our voices from cheering like maniacs, and had an absolute blast. Even now, as I write over 40 years later, I feel a gush of the thrill that we experienced during those times."

The camp also turned out some high-profile, creative people.

One such product of the camp is Teme Kernerman, a renowned instructor of Israeli folk-dance both in Canada and abroad.

Kernerman, who joined Kvutza as a counsellor in the mid-1950s, will attend the reunion and is also on its planning committee. She credits the camp with paving the way to her future.

"Kvutza was the place that initiated my journey into dance," she said, recalling how the camp's focus on cultural dance events forced her to learn the art that would later become her passion.

"I went in as an arts and crafts teacher and came out as a dance instructor," she said. "At Kvutza, we had nothing but our creativity. This made everyone more involved."

In addition, one of the camp's earliest directors, Michel Herzog, now a nonagenarian living in New York, is rumoured to be attending the reunion, Gordon said.

The Camp Kvutza reunion will take place at Bialik Hebrew Day School 2760 Bathurst St., on Sunday, Sept. 21 at 1 p.m.

The Kvutza organizing committee chose the school because that's where the original Habonim Labour Zionist offices were housed, and because "every summer the campers gathered in the Viewmount parking lot to board the buses that took us to re-congregate with our friends at our much-loved camp," Fromstein said.

The reunion also coincides with Israel's 60th birthday year and seemed a fitting time to hold it, she added.

Prisoner exchange exposes media blindspot

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Media analysts have long observed that Israel tends to receive more positive coverage when it's seen to be a victim. However, while the media's focus on the recent prisoner exchange between Israel and Hezbollah was both extensive and intense – for instance, CBC ran it as the lead item on The National on July 16 – it went far beyond the usual "good versus evil" storyline.

The difference in coverage was due to an unusual factor: sheer incomprehension. Journalists in Israel, along with their editors back in Canada, kept asking: Why would Israel trade five Lebanese prisoners, including the notorious Samir Kuntar, along with 199 bodies of Lebanese and Palestinians, for the remains of two of its soldiers?

Many journalists reporting on the exchange made special note of Kuntar's heinous act. He brutally killed a four-year-old Israeli girl and her father while her mother, the sole survivor of the attack, accidentally smothered her two-year-old daughter in an attempt to stifle her cries while Kuntar was in the house.

To be sure, correspondents reported on how controversial this lopsided exchange was within Israeli society, and how it sparked an intense, heart-rending debate. Yet the puzzle remained: why hand Hezbollah a propaganda victory?

Journalists probed for an answer, which finally emerged as the exchange was about to proceed and it was confirmed that the two Israeli soldiers, Ehud Goldwasser and Eldad Regev, were dead: the Jewish state is committed to do everything in its power to bring its soldiers home from the battlefield, if only to give them a proper burial and even if it requires a painful sacrifice.

Other countries, especially other democratic countries, will go to considerable lengths to secure the release of their citizens and soldiers held by a foreign power. But in this case, Israel was viewed by western media as unique in the extent to which it was willing to go in order to obtain what it knew to be the remains of Goldwasser and Regev.

As the BBC's Wyre Davis noted in his July 17 report from Jerusalem: "It is at times like this that many Israelis feel more isolated and different in a world that doesn't really 'get' why so much effort has gone into securing the return of two dead soldiers."

Benny Regev, the brother of Eldad, told the CBC's Peter Armstrong (July 16): "I feel pain for the loss of my brother, but I [also] feel proud the people of Israel have made this day come true."

This pride – and ethos – of Israeli society was explained by Israel Defence Forces spokesperson Col. Miri Eisen to the BBC's Davis: "It is an essential part of our moral fibre, of our soul. It is a promise we make to every Israeli mother that, when we send her son or daughter away to fight, we will bring them home, whatever happens to them."

Davis noted that Eisen acknowledged his "suggestion that what Israelis see as their 'soul' is regarded by their many enemies as a 'flaw,' a 'weakness.'" To which Eisen replied: "That's just the way it is. We won't change the way we are."

In contrast to the somber mood in Israel, Lebanon's president and prime minister treated a returning child murderer as a national hero. This gave many in the West a rare (if brief) glimpse into the heart of what makes Israelis "the way [they] are."

Jim Lederman, senior Israel analyst for Oxford Analytica, who's working on a book about how Israelis govern themselves, said in conversation: "The very fact that so many reporters were so surprised by the Israeli decision indicates that they have never learned or never internalized the foundation stone of Jewish community life for the past two millennia: the sense and belief by Jews in a shared fate."

Ve'ahavta: The Canadian Jewish Humanitarian & Relief Committee

We are not obligated to complete the work, but we also are not free to desist from it

– 2:21 Pirke Avot

On the evening of Friday, July 18, 2008 the Founding Director of Ve'ahavta, Avrum Rosensweig suffered a heart attack. An angioplasty was performed and Avrum is now on the road to recovery. While he will take some time to rest and recuperate, he has every intention of returning to the office in the near future.

Ve'ahavta's Board of Directors and senior staff would like to remind our donors, clients, partners, volunteers and other stakeholders that we remain committed to our mission. As the Canadian humanitarian and relief organization, Ve'ahavta is motivated by the Jewish values of Tzedakah/Justice, and will continue to assist the needy at home and abroad, through volunteerism, education, and acts of kindness, while building bridges between Jews and other peoples.

We are committed to a long-term development plan that insures the sustainability of our projects, and benefits our clients, partners and volunteers. In Avrum's absence and upon his return, we will continue to encourage all people to play a significant role in Tikun Olam (repairing the world) both in Canada and around the world.

To send best wishes to Avrum, please visit our website:

Remembering Ehud and Eldad

The following is an open letter by Liberal MPs Marlene Jennings (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce–Lachine) and Anita Neville (Winnipeg South Centre).

The road of statesmanship is paved with bitter choices. But few are more difficult and soul-searching than the recent decision of the government of Israel to release five Lebanese prisoners and return 199 bodies of Lebanese fighters in exchange for the bodies of Ehud Goldwasser and Eldad Regev, the two Israeli soldiers who were kidnapped from Israel by the terrorist group Hezbollah in 2006.

How does one weigh the grief of two victimized families and of all Israelis, who had clung to hope that there was hope? How does one weigh that pain against the release of Samir Kuntar, a hateful murderer who smashed the head of an innocent four-year-old girl? How can Israel's pledge to return every lost soldier, dead or alive, be weighed against the cost of commuting a sentence of 500 years to 19 years of incarceration already served?

This was not an easy choice. It was the kind of choice that keeps you awake in the wee hours of the morning. But the decision by the government of Israel to choose compassion and spare the two families continued torment about the fate of their sons shows leadership, because it takes leadership to choose. Clearly, this was not a one-sided decision, and the cost was high. But isn't it better to err on the side of humanity?

Israel's decision stands in stark contrast to the unspeakable spectacle of jubilation and triumph that we saw in Lebanon. When Israelis are willing to go to extraordinary lengths to recover their fallen, they reaffirm, in a powerful way, Israel's commitment to, and love of, life. When Palestinians celebrate the return of a man like Kuntar, they showcase, in a damning way, a culture that glorifies death and murder.

Now is the time to grieve and to remember Ehud and Eldad, to come together in solidarity with their families and with the Israeli public as they seek closure to this protracted and painful ordeal.

We, along with other members of Liberal Parliamentarians for Israel, have had the privilege of meeting with the families of the abducted soldiers when they visited Parliament Hill in the past. We met them to convey our solidarity and our concern for the well-being of their sons. We saw their hopes, but could only guess at their pain. Now, we offer our heartfelt condolences to them and to all those aggrieved by the cowardly abduction and murder of these two promising young men.

If you want to convey your condolences to Ehud's and Eldad's families, you can add your names to the electronic book of condolences set up by the Canada-Israel Committee at www.cicweb.ca/condolences/index.cfm.

We cannot take away the loss, but we can let them know that they are not alone and that we will remember.

The Executive and Board of Directors of the Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue extend heartfelt condolences on behalf of the entire congregational family, to Anne Zuchter and family on the passing of

Max Zuchter ז"ל

Acknowledging Max's many years of catering service to the Synagogue and the Jewish Community.
May Max's memory be for a blessing and may the Zuchter family find comfort with all mourners of Zion and Jerusalem.

New JNF schaliach is an Israeli journalist

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Erez Rotem, an Israeli journalist and former interviewer for the Channel 2 television station in Israel, is the new Jewish National Fund (JNF) shaliach for Western Canada.

The 42-year-old Rotem, a journalist for more than 15 years, began his career writing for Israeli newspapers, including Ma'ariv and Yediyot Achronot. "I have written for every major newspaper in Israel, and for the last 10 years, I have been the correspondent for police/criminal affairs for Channel 2," he says.

"For the last 15 years, I have been a personal witness to all of the major events in Israel. I covered the Second Lebanon War, the disengagement, the terrorist acts, the bus explosions, and now I want to do something constructive for JNF... I want people to join me in understanding and feeling Israel.

"The story of Israel isn't just a story of war, but the story of a nation that has developed great industry and sophisticated technology. I believe Israel is the home for every Jew, even if he or she isn't living there," Rotem says.

He hopes that since he has been in the field of communications for all of his adult life, he is well prepared in his task as the new shaliach to "communicate a love for Israel."

He says, "I feel that after 15 years of looking into the area of crime in Israel, it is time for me to do something that is constructive, and is part of building [support for Israel]. I call Israel a great adventure and hope that I can motivate young people to be more committed and devoted to Israel."

In his work with Channel 2, Rotem was involved in a number of high-profile cases. "I was the first journalist to interview then-president Moshe Katzav at his home in Kiryat Malachi about the allegations [of sexual harassment] against him," Rotem says. "It was the first time that he admitted he would accept some kind of plea bargain [which he no longer will accept]."

Rotem, who has a law degree, was responsible for disclosing the fact that in the sexual harassment charges against Kadima member of Knesset Haim Ramon, the state had "conducted illegal wiretaps." Rotem says that he was able to uncover this because he has an informant, "a deep throat," who tipped him off.

Rotem was raised "in a house where Israel meant everything," he says.

"My father served the state for 35 years. When he retired, he was the head of security in the Shabak [Israeli Secret Service]... He was the personal bodyguard of prime ministers David Ben-Gurion, Golda Meir, Yitzhak Rabin, and also used to work with [defence minister] Moshe Dayan. He was also the bodyguard for prime minister Menachem Begin and also for Egyptian president Anwar Sadat, when he came to Israel in 1977."

Rotem remembers visiting the farm of Ariel Sharon with his father in the midst of the first war in Lebanon in 1982. "Later on, I also covered the trial of Omri Sharon [Ariel Sharon's son and former member of Knesset] for corruption charges."

Rotem, who has a home in Ramat Hasharon, says that his parents imbued him with a sense of Zionism and commitment to the State of Israel that is deep-seated. He looks forward to his new position with the JNF, which he will officially begin in August. Prior to beginning his new work, he will be travelling with his family to Thailand and Vietnam.

Rotem and his wife, Dalit, have two children, Tom, 8, and Yali, 3. Dalit is an interior designer and is part-owner of a sushi restaurant, Akiko, in Ramat Hasharon.

Rotem has already made two trips to Winnipeg to meet members of the community and make preparations for his assuming his new position.

He'll be based in Winnipeg, but will travel often to Edmonton, Calgary and Vancouver. Rotem replaces Rami Kleinmann, who was the JNF shaliach for the past eight years and left to become the executive director of the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University.

'The guide will be helpful'

He added: "Nate Leipciger and myself, as co-presidents of Canadian Jewish Holocaust Survivors, supported the project from Day 1 and approved it. We all agreed that this was not only a good idea, but also a very important information tool that will assist the aging survivor community in learning about some of the services and activities available to them."

Zoltak, a survivor from Poland who was hidden by a Catholic family and was liberated in 1944 along with his parents, realized there was a need for such a guide after he was appointed to the board of the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany, which is based in New York City.

"We found that one of the most important things missing was information and communication. The guide will be very helpful."

The guide lists programs and services in Alberta, Atlantic Canada, British Columbia, Manitoba, Ontario and Quebec that are available to what Zoltak believes is the third-largest Holocaust survivor community in the world.

An additional print run of the guide will be seriously considered should there be further demand, Simons said.

Beth Torah Congregation
קהילת בית תורה

Beth Torah Congregation

Construction has begun!
Our membership is open, but not for long!

Our founding members dreamed of a family Shul in which to congregate, celebrate, educate, and grow. They wanted a haimish environment where families knew one another from generation to generation.

Today, Beth Torah Congregation continues to be a vibrant, traditional and growing Shul with dedicated and warm clergy, Rabbi Yossi Sapirman and Cantor David Young.

Construction has now begun on our new sanctuary and the renovation of our facility. This is your chance to be a part of Completing the Dream.

There are a limited number of membership opportunities still available. Once we have achieved our goal of 500 families, we will no longer be accepting new member applications.

Check us out at www.bethtorah.ca.

Obituary

Published, edited Vancouver paper

By RABBI DAVID KAPLAN
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — Veteran Canadian journalist Samuel Kaplan, publisher and editor-in-chief of the Jewish Western Bulletin for 36 years, died July 15 in Vancouver at age 83.

Born in Winnipeg, Man., on June 30, 1925, Kaplan was the fifth of six children of Rachmiel and Sarah Kaplan, who emigrated to Canada from Kremenchuk, Ukraine. A graduate of St. John's Tech in Winnipeg's North End melting pot of Canadian intellectuals and artists, he sang lead roles in Gilbert and Sullivan in high school.

Kaplan joined the Royal Canadian Navy in World War II and served as a wireless telegrapher on a Corvette (fast attack boat) stationed in Halifax. After the war, Kaplan attended the University of Manitoba, where he met his future wife, Mona Rich.

Samuel Kaplan

They married on May 9, 1948, and saw the headline "State of Israel declared" on their honeymoon. Still reeling from the Holocaust, Sam determined that day to dedicate his life to helping Jews who were in trouble anywhere in the world, his wife recalled.

His five-decade career in journalism began with a summer job in 1946 as an intern at the daily Winnipeg Free Press. He later worked for five years as editor of the weekly Western Jewish News in Winnipeg and subsequently as editor of the English section of the Israelite Press, a Yiddish-English weekly.

In 1960, Kaplan was invited by the Vancouver Jewish Community Council to become editor of its weekly English-language Jewish newspaper. Kaplan and his wife Mona took over the Jewish Western Bulletin, and within two years they transformed the paper into an independent weekly able to cover all its expenses and end a decades-old community subsidy.

In 1979, Kaplan received the Smolar Award for Excellence in North American Jewish Journalism for a series of interviews he did in Egypt prior to the Camp David peace treaty. He was twice named runner-up for the same award, and he received a 20th Israel Anniversary Award of Excellence for a full-colour tourism edition in 1968.

In recognition of his efforts as president of the B.C. Ethnic Press Association and the Canadian Ethnic Press Association, Kaplan received the Canada Centennial Medal, which was presented to him by Queen Elizabeth II in Montreal, as well as a Canada 125 Medal.

Over the decades, Kaplan interviewed Jewish and international newsmakers, including David Ben-Gurion, Israel's first prime minister; Moshe Sharett, Israel's second prime minister; and Shimon Peres, Nobel Peace Prize winner and current Israeli president.

Kaplan also worked with historian Martin Gilbert to help free Russian Jews. He reprinted Gilbert's revealing articles on the condition of Jewish prisoners in Siberian prison camps on the Bulletin's front pages. As well, he ran a weekly "Gulag Record" chronicling the imprisonment of key Refuseniks for the crime of wanting to emigrate to Israel, and encouraging his readership to write appeals on their behalf. Gilbert took editions of the paper to Russia to show Refuseniks and reported on the enormous hope it gave them that a Canadian newspaper was fighting for their freedom.

Kaplan is survived by Mona, his wife of 60 years; three sons, Frank Barry in Nanaimo, B.C.; Jonathan and wife Abbe, in Memphis, Tenn., and Rabbi David Kaplan and wife Rochel, in Poughkeepsie, N.Y.; five grandchildren, Zachary, Franny, Ezra, Yaakov and Tully; sisters Esther Finkle and Lily Kaplan, and brother Jack Kaplan, all of Winnipeg.

Kaplan was buried July 17 in Israel. A Vancouver memorial service will be held Aug. 17 at Congregation Schara Tzedeck.

Local catering pioneer 'did business on a handshake'

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The Toronto Jewish community has lost one of its kosher catering pioneers.

On July 9, surrounded by family and friends, Max Zuchter, beloved husband, father, father-in-law, grandfather, great-grandfather and patriarch of the Zuchter-Berk catering company, passed away from pancreatic cancer at his Toronto home. He was 87.

Right up until the end, Zuchter commanded respect and love from those who rallied around him in his last days, said his son-in-law, David Berk.

Berk, who married Zuchter's eldest daughter, Lorraine, and learned the business from his father-in-law before taking over the firm after Zuchter's retirement in 1986, credited Zuchter with teaching him "everything" about the catering business.

He said Zuchter took great pride in his business and always enjoyed talking shop and looking after the people who helped it succeed.

"You know how some people will say, 'Stop and smell the roses'? Well Max would always tell me to 'Stop and smell the coffee,'" Berk laughed. "He was very well-respected, a wonderful person. People trusted him, to the extent that they would walk into the shop and tell him to do the catering as if he was doing his own daughter's affair and then walk out. He did business on a handshake."

Berk also noted Zuchter's loyalty to the staff at Zuchter-Berk, saying that many employees worked for the company for three or more decades.

The Zuchter family initially founded the business in the early 1930s as an eponymous Toronto Jewish Ashkenazi restaurant shortly after immigrating to Canada from Bendzin, Poland.

Zuchter was 10 when he arrived in Toronto and his mother, Fanny, ran the restaurant until he was old enough to help take over, Lorraine Berk said.

"As a boy, Max would deliver pop in Toronto's garment district," she said.

Though Yiddish was his mother tongue, Zuchter learned English quickly, Gloria Hershenfield, his youngest daughter, said.

Once Zuchter took over the restaurant, the eatery soon became more interested in kashrut. "He was probably the first [restaurateur] in the city to be fully involved with COR, or their equivalent at the time," David Berk said.

In 1952, Zuchter decided to begin changing the family business model, slowly gearing it toward catering after approaching the Beth Sholom Synagogue to use Zuchter's as a kosher food service provider for the shul.

Among his many passions, Zuchter was an ardent baseball fan who followed the Toronto Blue Jays with zeal. He also loved to reminisce about his military career.

Zuchter served with distinction in the Royal Canadian Air Force during World War II as an instrument mechanic for famed English Spitfire ace and air vice-marshall James Edgar "Johnnie" Johnson.

Because he abhorred violence, Zuchter's time in the military had a profound effect on him.

"He was part of the liberation of Bergen-Belsen," Lorraine Berk said. "What he saw there affected him for the rest of his life. He did everything he could to help [the survivors] of the camp... and stay away from violence."

In fact, when Zuchter saw West Side Story, he walked out during the play's legendary gang-fight dance scene, she recalled with a laugh.

Congregation Shaarei Tefillah's Rabbi Moshe Stern, an extended member of the family, praised Zuchter as a kind and generous person who was a stalwart of the Jewish community.

"Amongst his contributions to the community, he left numerous children and grandchildren who continue the Jewish tradition," Rabbi Stern said.

Family was Zuchter's foremost priority, and chief among them were his wife, Anne, and their three daughters, Lorraine Berk, Barbara Greenglass and Gloria Hershenfield.

"He was very protective of us. He was strong in stature and presence, but he was soft inside," Lorraine Berk said. "We always felt very looked after and we always knew our parents were there for us."

Barbara Greenglass referred to her father as the sisters' "strength," saying, "He was our stability. As long as he was around, we knew we were OK."

Gloria Hershenfield concurred, and added that her father was also "extremely" proud that all of his children were university graduates, as he only had a Grade 8 education.

"He was also very giving to the community and supported Baycrest [Hospital] and Israel Bonds, among other causes," she added.

Zuchter married Anne in 1948 and would have celebrated his 60th anniversary with her this September.

A deep and abiding love kept them together, the sisters recalled.

"They did everything together after his retirement. He worked so hard for so many years. After he retired, they started going to the symphonies and travelling," Lorraine Berk said. "He liked simple things. My father would come home after catering a gourmet affair and make himself a cheese-and-onion sandwich on rye. And he loved my mother's cooking."

Barbara Greenglass added: "My mother was his best friend and confidante."

And when Zuchter would meet old customers by chance on the street, they would invariably thank him for catering their simchahs years ago, Gloria said.

"He had a great sense of humour and loved to kibbitz with people," Barbara Greenglass said, noting how he took great pleasure in making people smile.

Kevin Greenglass, one of Zuchter's grandchildren, summed up his grandfather this way: "He was an incredibly positive person, a larger-than-life figure for me, and in our community, he made so many people's happiest days happier."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Young entrepreneur organizes anti-poverty fundraiser

By ASHLEY SPEGEL
Special to The CJN

Daniel Warner hopes to change the lives of underprivileged Jewish youth in Toronto and Israel with his summer fundraiser, the Pitch for Israel.

The sporting event, which takes place Aug. 17 at Camp Robin Hood, is a full day dedicated to raising money to send disadvantaged Jewish young people in Toronto and Israel to summer camps, which Warner believes builds important life skills.

Daniel Warner accepts the Ontario Student Entrepreneur Competition Award in 2007

"I went to camp, and it helped me to develop character, leadership skills and strong communication skills, and I know how to work with people and how to get things done," he says.

"By sending kids to camp, we're strengthening children and their families through these experiences. Camp makes you a well-rounded person. It builds confidence and helps you to do what you do on an everyday basis. It gives kids the opportunity to develop important life skills, and it acts as an outlet for developing Jewish identity."

The Pitch for Israel will be made up of 10 men's and four women's softball teams. The tournament format is three-pitch with nine fielders.

In order to meet the goal of raising $25,000, all teams are required to generate a minimum of $2,000 through sponsorships and donations.

"The feedback has been amazing, and people are really behind this cause," the 25-year-old says.

"Anyone can get involved with this cause, whether it's supporting the event through awareness, volunteering to be events staff or finding sponsors for the event. It's the community that's really contributing to the event's growing success," Warner added.

More than 20,000 Jews in the Toronto area are living under the poverty line, according to Jewish Family & Child.

In Eilat, the Israeli city that Warner is focusing his efforts on, 22 per cent of Jewish children live in impoverished conditions.

"This is a cause I want to support, and it's important to get these kids on the right foot, not only in Israel but in Toronto, and give back to the community and inform people [about these statistics]," he says.

"We need to get our youth into camp to funnel their energies, let them grow and give back to society. I've always been about helping others. If you have the time, skill and the know-how, you should make it happen."

In addition to the softball tournaments, there will be a variety of other activities, including volleyball, tennis, swimming, lounging, live entertainment and a kosher barbecue.

Transportation to the event has yet to be determined, although Warner hopes to have a bus to take everyone to and from the camp.

Organizing fundraisers is not something new to Warner, who's been giving back to his community since 2002, when he began his management degree at the University of Western Ontario. There, he was president of Jewish fraternity AEPi and on the executive of Hillel, the main Jewish campus group.

While on these boards, Warner organized campus social events and raised more than $50,000, which earned him the Righteous Hand Scholarship for Jewish Leadership on campus during his last year at Western.

"I've been fortunate to come from a good family and a good environment, and I want to help children in vulnerable situations," he says. "It's not that difficult to get involved in a cause that matters to you."

Presently, Warner has been working on his company, Canadian Student Marketing, which links corporations with students and students with each other through an interactive online community.

In 2007, he was one of two students to win the 2007 Ontario Student Entrepreneur Competition, which was sponsored by Advancing Canadian Entrepreneurship and CIBC Small Business, for his website. The awards are given out annually to full-time Canadian post-secondary students who operate a business.

Warner's business, UP Media Group Inc., was founded in March 2005 to help companies reach Canadian students aged 18 to 25 via Warner's second website, UniversityParty.ca. He says he employs 40 students in 11 Canadian cities and has a membership of 20,000.

Warner has been working with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the Jewish Urban Meeting Place (JUMP) and Birthright Israel, and he has also received support from the Toronto Blue Jays in his effort to organize the Pitch for Israel.

Warner hopes the event will grow into a fundraiser much like the federation's Walk For Israel, and he hopes it will gain momentum each year.

"I want to build the Pitch for Israel into one of the largest Jewish youth events of the year. There's an 18-to-34-year-old target for the event, but families and friends are more than welcome to join in and show their support," he says. "What better way to bring people together than through softball and a day back at camp?"

Prizes will be handed out to the tournament participants who excel in athletics and fundraising.

Teams that meet their fundraising goal will get tickets to see the Blue Jays play the Boston Red Sox on Aug. 24, Jewish Heritage Day at Rogers Centre.

Pitch Israel

The top fundraiser on each team will receive a Blue Jays jersey, and the top fundraiser on the winning team will get tickets to a luxury suite at a Jays game in September, as well as a guided batting practice visit and a meet-and-greet with team president Paul Godfrey.

Warner is confident the Pitch for Israel will be a success and make a difference in the lives of those who participate and those who will be helped.

"It's about giving back and raising awareness that there are people out there that need our support. Creating this charitable event will hopefully further empower and entertain the next generations of Jewish leadership in Toronto."

The Pitch for Israel kicks off at 8 a.m. on Sunday, Aug. 24, at Camp Robin Hood with tournament registration and a warm-up. For more information, visit www.thepitchforisrael.com, or call Warner directly at 416-540-7373.

Obama sounds hawkish and dovish themes

By DINA KRAFT
JTA

SDEROT, Israel — During his stops in Jordan and Israel, presidential contender Barack Obama stressed both his backing for tough Israeli security measures and his commitment to advancing the peace process.

In meetings with several Israeli leaders last Wednesday, Obama reaffirmed his commitment to Israel's struggle against terrorism and other violent threats, including Iran's suspected pursuit of nuclear weapons.

"I don't think any country would find it acceptable to have missiles raining down on its citizens," Obama said during a stop at the police station in Sderot, the Israeli city that has been deluged by rocket fire from the Hamas-controlled Gaza Strip.

"If someone was sending rockets on my house where my daughters were sleeping at night, I would do everything to stop it, and I encourage Israel to do same," added the U.S. senator from Illinois, speaking in front of shelves filled with mangled Qassam rockets fired by Palestinian militants.

Obama's lightning visit to Israel, part of an overseas tour that includes Europe, reflects his campaign's strategy to bolster his credentials as a potential statesman. It's also an effort to reach out to Jewish voters with the message that he will be an unwavering friend to Israel. Obama's single packed day of meetings with Israel's senior leaders included the stop in Sderot – which has become an almost mandatory pilgrimage site for visiting dignitaries to Israel – along with a visit to the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial and a late-night call at the Western Wall.

Last week's trip also presented Palestinian officials and several Israeli politicians who aspire to succeed Ehud Olmert as prime minister with an opportunity to forge a relationship with a possible future U.S. president – not a small thing in a country where voters place a high premium on strong ties with the United States.

In Israel, there has been enthusiasm for Obama's visit and pride that both he and Senator John McCain, the presumptive Republican nominee for president, found it important to stop by even before the November election.

But reaction to Obama has been coloured by nervousness among Israeli officials about the end of the Bush administration, which at times was seen as almost unconditionally supportive of Israel.

Reflecting Israel's nervousness over Obama, Ha'aretz columnist Aluf Benn wrote last Wednesday: "Obama represents an exciting option, albeit a more dangerous one. If he manages to rehabilitate America's international stature, reduce its dependence on oil and push through peace between Israel and the Arabs, Israel's strategic situation will improve dramatically. But on the way, he might have to pressure Israel. If he fails, Israel will have to pay the price without reaping any returns."

In Israeli officialdom's campaign to make the challenges the country faces clear, Obama was briefed by Defence Minister Ehud Barak and other defence experts on a Jerusalem tarmac before taking off in a Blackhawk helicopter for a strategic tour of the centre and south of the country and, ultimately, Sderot.

Sderot mayor Eli Moyal presented Barack Obama with an 'I love Sderot' teeshirt when Obama visited the Negev city. [Israel Sun photo]

Barak could be seen outlining to Obama on a series of maps the areas of Israel that had come under attack by Palestinians. Along with Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, they boarded a helicopter and began a near hour-long journey. They started with an aerial tour of Jerusalem before flying along Israel's border with the West Bank and then flying south via the Mediterranean.

In her remarks in Sderot, Livni thanked Obama for making the journey to the town. McCain also made a stop in Sderot during his visit to Israel two months ago.

"There is an Israeli frustration that they suffer without being recognized by the international community," Livni said of Sderot's residents. "In your visit here, you showed that you really care."

Obama also held a brief meeting at the King David Hotel with Abraham Foxman, national director of the Anti-Defamation League, who also happened to be in Israel. His organization released a report Wednesday on editorial cartoonists in the Arab world using anti-Semitic imagery to portray the presumptive U.S. presidential candidates as pawns of the Jews.

"In terms of what I've heard from Israelis I've met, they are impressed by the depth of his knowledge and understanding," Foxman said of Obama. "I walk away feeling more comfortable with the words that I hear, that there is a deep understanding and sensitivity to the issues here."

In addition to discussing security issues in his meetings with Israeli leaders, Obama also talked about negotiations between the Israelis and Palestinians. Last week in Jordan, Obama said that as president he would begin working on an Israeli-Palestinian peace deal from his first day in office.

"There's a tendency for each side to focus on the faults of the other rather than look in the mirror," Obama told reporters in Amman before heading to Israel and the West Bank. "The Israeli government is unsettled, the Palestinians are divided between Fatah and Hamas, and so it's difficult for either side to make the bold move that would bring about peace.

"My goal is to make sure that we work, starting from the minute I'm sworn into office, to try to find some breakthroughs," he said.

In Jerusalem the next day, Obama met with Barak, President Shimon Peres and opposition leader Benjamin Netanyahu. At Yad Vashem, he donned a white kippah and penned an entry in the visitors' book.

"At a time of great peril and torment, war and strife, we are blessed to have such a powerful reminder of man's potential for great evil, but also our capacity to rise up from tragedy and remake our world," Obama wrote.

The Democratic candidate then went to Ramallah to meet with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas. PA officials said Abbas briefed Obama on progress in the peace process. Obama had meetings at the end of the day with Olmert and Jerusalem Mayor Uri Lupoliansky.

Israeli sources said Obama's discussions with Barak turned to the recent launch of Turkish-mediated negotiations between Israel and Syria.

Obama, according to one source, described the efforts to achieve peace as important, but said that as president "he would never put pressure on Israel to take steps that could put its security at risk."

The senator apparently was referring to Syria's demand for a full return of the Golan Heights, the strategic plateau Israel captured from Syria in the 1967 Six Day War and later annexed.

As for Iran, Obama described the Islamic Republic's nuclear program as "the most important challenge facing the international community right now," Israeli sources said, adding that it would top the agenda of Obama's meetings later this week with the leaders of Germany, France and Britain.

Israel Briefs

Another bulldozer rampage

Israeli police shot dead a bulldozer driver who rammed into cars and a bus in Jerusalem on July 22, injuring 24 people. In what appeared to be a copy of the July 2 road rampage on Jaffa Road, a bulldozer operator working in the Israeli capital's Yemin Moshe area began crushing cars without warning last week. The bulldozer also crashed into a passenger bus. At least 16 people were hurt, one seriously. The driver was shot dead by paramilitary border police. Jerusalem Police chief Ilan Franco said the driver was an Arab resident of east Jerusalem. In the previous such incident, an Arab bulldozer driver killed three Israelis before being shot dead by an off-duty soldier. While that assailant was assumed to have had political motives, authorities never established clear links to terror groups.

Truce abuse, arms buildup

Hamas is using the Gaza Strip truce to build up its arsenal and fortify against any future Israeli invasion, the Shin Bet chief said. Yuval Diskin told the Knesset foreign affairs and defence committee that the nearly month-old truce brokered by Egypt has allowed Hamas to continue smuggling in weapons from the Sinai and laying minefields on the border with Israel. At a briefing he said Hamas rockets are now capable of reaching farther than ever into Israel, to Kiryat Gat 12 miles away and Ashdod 14 miles away. Diskin said Israeli forces must establish a presence on the ground in Gaza if the Hamas buildup is to be contained. Such a move is unlikely, as it would constitute an obvious breach of the truce by Israel.

More South African olim

The number of South African immigrants to Israel has nearly doubled in the past year, the Jewish Agency said. According to agency data released this week, 300 South African Jews are expected to have made aliyah by the end of 2008, compared to 178 last year. "This is partially due to the current political situation in South Africa and the rise in crime and violence," said Michael Jankelowitz, a Jewish Agency spokesperson. The Jewish community of South Africa is a close-knit, Zionist community numbering approximately 65,000.

New JNF bike trail

The Jewish National Fund is building a bicycle trail that will connect Jerusalem to Tel Aviv. The 75-mile trail, running from south of the capital to Tel Aviv's northern port and taking in several forests and historical sites en route, is expected to be completed within six months as part of a JNF project in celebration of Israel's 60th anniversary. The estimated cost of the construction is $400,000. According to reports, a Jerusalem-Tel Aviv ride will take approximately five hours, as it will be mostly downhill. Ascending in the other direction will take much longer, but cyclists will be able to avail themselves of rest stops along the way.

Ceasefire won't endure say front-line moshav residents

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

NETIV HA'ASARA, Israel — This front-line moshav in the western Negev, the closest Israeli community to the Gaza Strip, has been holding its collective breath since June 19, when Israel's latest ceasefire with Hamas went into effect.

The truce, known as the tahadiyeh, was brokered by Egypt, and has been violated about a dozen times by smaller Palestinian factions such as Islamic Jihad and the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade. Hamas, however, has honoured it and arrested Palestinians who have breached it.

Not a single Qassam rocket or mortar shell has smashed into the moshav since June. Yet there is a palpable feeling in Netiv Ha'asara – which is half a kilometre from the border and within sight of the city of Ashkelon – that this ceasefire, like the ones before it, may well be a transitory phenomenon.

Speaking for many of its residents, Ziv Volk suggested that the truce is merely a phase in the long struggle between Israel and the Palestinians, enabling Hamas to regroup and Israel to press on with negotiations for the release of Gilad Shalit, an abducted Israeli soldier who has been in Palestinian captivity for the past two years.

Volk, 44, never thought that Israel's unilateral withdrawal from Gaza in the summer of 2005 would bring tranquility to Netiv Ha'asara, a community of some 200 families that was established by Israelis forced to leave their homes in the northern Sinai Peninsula in 1982, three years after Israel and Egypt signed a historic peace treaty.

His neighbour, Pnina Ragolsky, 61, whose son's girlfriend was killed by a mortar shell three years ago in Netiv Ha'asara, believed that Israel's disengagement from Gaza would induce the Palestinians to cease bombardments of Israeli communities along the frontier.

As it happened, Volk was right and Ragolsky was wrong.

Qassam rockets and mortar shells began falling on this attractive farming community – which reminds a Canadian visitor of a prosperous neighbourhood in southern California – about six months after the second Palestinian uprising erupted in September 2000.

Shortly afterward, the moshav replaced its Palestinian workers with contract labourers from Thailand.

At first, the Qassams and mortar shells landed in empty fields, but in 2003, a projectile made a direct hit on a house and heavily damaged it. On July 14, 2005, as Israel began evacuating Gaza, a mortar shell killed Dana Galgovich, a 22-year-old woman who was due to marry Ragolsky's son and had lived with him for more than two years.

After thousands of Israeli settlers were removed from Gaza, their homes bulldozed into mounds of rubble, Israel constructed a nine-metre-high cement wall along the border facing Netiv Ha'asara.

In May 2006, a katyusha, the third originating from Gaza since 2001, struck one of Netiv Ha'asara's chicken coops, killing 30 birds. Later that year, a Qassam exploded near the dwellings of the Thai workers.

By Volk's estimation, the moshav, whose infrastructure and security roads were laid out by the Jewish National Fund, has been hit by hundreds of projectiles, injuring four people and damaging 10 homes.

Volk and Ragolsky have no illusions that the tahadiyeh will endure. And if it breaks down, they said, Israel should act resolutely.

Volk is of the view that the Israeli army will have to reoccupy Gaza, now administered and controlled by Hamas, should the truce collapse altogether and the western Negev is once again subjected to a reign of terror.

"The United States went to Afghanistan and Iraq to defend its sovereignty. So why can't we defend ourselves from an enemy next door?"

Ragolsky concurs, saying that no self-respecting country can accept brazen bombardments on its civilian population. "When you're attacked, you have to respond. We should hit the terrorists, even if innocent Palestinian civilians are killed. I feel for the poor Palestinians who are caught in the middle of this situation, but the Palestinians have to realize that they'll have to evacuate their cities if the attacks continue."

If necessary, she said, Israel should engage Hamas in direct talks to ensure that the truce lasts. Volk disagrees. "Talking with Hamas would be a sign of weakness. We can't be blackmailed by terrorists."

When Ragolsky and Volk arrived here 26 years ago, they assumed that they would have a quiet life in Netiv Ha'asara, which was the only settlement in Sinai to retain its name in Israel. Back then, Gaza, occupied by Israel since the Six Day

Ziv Volk stands close to the cement wall that separates Israel from the Gaza Strip.

War, was fairly somnolent, and Israelis like Ragolsky were used to shopping and dining there.

Haifa-born Ragolsky and her husband, Amnon, a farmer from Kibbutz Dorot, went to live in the Sinai in 1973, six years after Israel defeated Egypt in the 1967 war. "We wanted to build a farm for ourselves. We grew tomatoes, flowers and mangoes. In those days, Sinai was part of Israel. We were regarded as pioneers. We had a good life. We built a paradise from sand."

It never occurred to her that Israel would give up Sinai, not even after Egyptian President Anwar Sadat broke with the Arab consensus and visited Jerusalem in 1977, touching off a peace process that climaxed with the 1979 peace treaty. "We were sure we would not be moved," she said.

She and her husband and their three children finally left the Sinai, the blow softened by a $300,000 (US) government compensation package. They decided to settle in the sand dunes of the western Negev because the area was in Israel proper and the topography reminded them of Sinai. It was also near the Mediterranean Sea, and the soil was suitable for agriculture.

In common with their neighbours, the Rogolskys lived in temporary housing until 1985. Their cottage, with a garden and patio, was built by a Palestinian contractor from the Gaza town of Beit Hanoun, from where Qassams have been launched. "I never imagined we would be bombed," she said.

Previous bombardments rattled children, frightened Thai workers and curtailed outdoor social events. Today, Volk fears that the hired labourers, upon whom the farmers of Netiv Ha'asara are utterly dependent, will pack up and leave should even one Thai worker be killed in a fresh bombardment. "We'll have to close the moshav if that happens," he said sombrely.

So Netiv Ha'asara waits and watches, hoping that the future will be brighter than the recent past.

Israeli company sued in U.S. for supplying fuel to Gaza

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The spillover of Mideast politics into North American courts continues.

Last week, lawyers for victims of Qassam missile attacks sent a letter to an Israeli energy company with a branch in the United States threatening legal action if it continues to supply Gaza with fuel.

In a letter to Dor Alon Energy Company, lawyers for the Shurat HaDin Israel Law Center (ILC) urged the firm to stop supplying fuel to Hamas or face possible civil and criminal actions in a U.S. court.

"Supplying fuel to the Hamas-controlled Gaza Strip, it is alleged, is a direct violation of American law, which prohibits aiding, abetting and providing material support to terrorist organizations," the ILC said in a statement.

In addition to possible criminal prosecution, the firm's U.S. branch could face civil actions leading to the awarding of millions of dollars in compensation to missile attack victims, the ILC said.

The Israeli lawyer behind the threatened suit, Nitsana Darshan-Leitner, told The CJN that Dor Alon is the sole supplier of gas to Gaza and the fuel is utilized by Hamas to support terrorist activities. The plaintiffs allege Hamas uses the fuel to move terrorists and in the manufacture, transportation and launching of missiles into Israel

"Dor Alon Energy has continually chosen to place its own financial welfare above the security concern of the residents of Sderot and the western Negev, who have to suffer daily attacks launched upon them from Gaza using the fuel supplied by the company," Darshan-Leitner said.

"Dor Alon knows it is aiding and abetting the Hamas organization, especially after it was warned," she said. "This is the only company that supplies gas and gas can be supplied by other countries, absolutely."

Darshan-Leitner acknowledged the company is providing the fuel with the knowledge of the Israeli government. "So what?" she said. "The company can't use the approval of the government of Israel to supply gas to Gaza as a defence."

Darshan-Leitner, who is also one of the lawyers spearheading a Canadian lawsuit against a Lebanese bank that allegedly bankrolls Hezbollah indirectly, said that "once Israel withdrew from Gaza, it should not be supplying anything. It is not responsible for the life of Gaza. We don't want to create a humanitarian crisis in Gaza. We don't want the world to point to Israel and say you are responsible for the people in Gaza, therefore, Israel should not be the ones who supply it in the first place.

"Egypt should take care of them in the same way. Hamas does not hit Egypt, only Israel. It is absurd that Israel supplies these murderers with food and gas," she said.

Egypt shares a border with Gaza and occupied it from 1948 to 1967.

Darshan-Leitner said the threatened suit against Dor Alon is the first against an energy company, but not the first against a corporation accused of aiding terrorists.

Earlier this year, the ILC, which uses courts in democratic states to try to shut down terrorist operations, represented 50 plaintiffs in a U.S. suit launched against Swiss bank UBS for doing business with Iran. The plaintiffs – all terrorism victims or their relatives – claimed in court documents filed in New York that UBS was subject to U.S. sanctions against Iran, but nevertheless provided the country with hundreds of millions of dollars. Iran, the court documents state, supports Hamas, Hezbollah and Islamic Jihad, which carry out terrorist attacks against Israel.

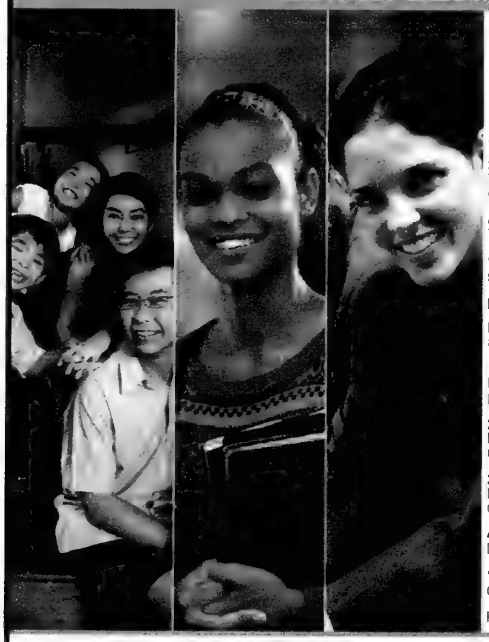
UBS has filed a motion to dismiss that case, Darshan-Leitner said.

In another legal action launched recently, the four Canadian ILC clients sued the Lebanese-Canadian Bank (LCB). The LCB, which has a Montreal office, is allegedly complicit in terrorism against Israeli civilians by providing financial services to Hezbollah.

And in another example of North American courts being asked to adjudicate events connected to the Middle East, the Palestinian village of Bil'in is suing two Montreal-based construction firms, Green Park International and Green Mount International, and their director for building residential units for Israelis on land claimed by the village. The companies are alleged to be complicit in war crimes.

Dor Alon operates primarily in the retail and energy sectors in Israel and the United States. It operates in the United States through its ownership of Alon USA, which supplies fuel stations in southern, central and southwestern states. Through a subsidiary based in Texas, Alon operates a network of 200 convenience stores under the 7-Eleven brand.

Giving newcomers a head start
Donner aux nouveaux arrivants un bon départ



The Government of Canada believes in immigration. We want more newcomers to join us and be an important part of Canada's future. That's why we are improving our immigration system by:

1. Creating a more flexible, fair and responsive immigration system
The changes to Canada's immigration laws will help to attract the skilled workers Canada needs most and ensure families are reunited faster

2. Helping internationally trained individuals
The Foreign Credentials Referral Office was created in 2007 to help newcomers get the information they need to have their credentials assessed and recognized in Canada

3. Increasing settlement funding
The Government of Canada has invested $1.4 billion* more in settlement funding, which includes language training and job search and employment services to help newcomers succeed and make a new home in Canada.

4. Reducing the Right of Permanent Residence Fee
The federal government reduced the right of permanent residence fee from $975 to $490

* Excluding Quebec. In Quebec, the Canada-Quebec Accord gives the province the exclusive responsibility for providing settlement and support services to all immigrants in Quebec in exchange for financial compensation from the Government of Canada (approx. $198.2 million in 2007-08).

Le gouvernement du Canada croit en l'immigration. Nous voulons accueillir plus de nouveaux arrivants et que ces derniers jouent un rôle actif pour assurer l'avenir du Canada. Voilà pourquoi nous améliorons notre système d'immigration en prenant les mesures suivantes :

1. Créer un système d'immigration plus souple, plus équitable et mieux adapté
Les modifications apportées à la législation canadienne en matière d'immigration contribueront à attirer les travailleurs qualifiés dont le Canada a le plus besoin, ainsi qu'à réunir les familles plus rapidement.

2. Aider les personnes formées à l'étranger
Le Bureau d'orientation relatif aux titres de compétences étrangers a été mis sur pied en 2007 pour aider les nouveaux arrivants à obtenir l'information dont ils ont besoin pour faire évaluer et reconnaître leurs titres de compétences au Canada

3. Accroître le financement en matière d'établissement
Le gouvernement du Canada a investi un montant supplémentaire de 1,4 milliard de dollars en fonds d'établissement, notamment pour financer les cours de langue et les services d'orientation et d'aide à la recherche d'emploi pour permettre aux nouveaux arrivants de s'intégrer avec succès au Canada.

4. Réduire les frais relatifs au droit de résidence permanente
Le gouvernement fédéral a réduit de 975 $ à 490 $ les frais relatifs au droit de résidence permanente.

 Exclut le Québec. Au Québec, l'Accord Canada-Québec donne à la province la responsabilité exclusive des services d'établissement et d'intégration des immigrants au Québec en échange d'une compensation financière du gouvernement du Canada (environ 198,2 millions en 2007-08).

1948...They Were There

Holocaust survivor had seen war before

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

George Stern was only 17 when he fought and survived the battles in the Negev during Israel's War of Independence, but that wasn't his first encounter with war.

Before Stern made aliyah from Hungary in 1948 to fight in Israel's first war, he lived in a small town outside of Budapest called Ujpest.

Stern was born in 1931 and was just a child when World War Two began and the Jews in eastern Europe were systematically persecuted.

Just a month shy of his bar mitzvah in 1944, Stern left his small town for Budapest soon after the Nazis invaded Hungary and began to ghettoize the Jewish population.

Meanwhile, his sister, who was about four years older, was forced to work and live in a factory – not coming home even to sleep.

His father was forced to join the army to take on the "dirty jobs."

"He was in plain clothes, wearing a Star of David, and they cleaned the kitchen. They gave them the dirty jobs. They dug the trenches."

Based on rumours that were circulating in his community, his mother urged Stern to leave home to stay with an aunt who lived in Budapest, which did not have a Jewish ghetto yet.

"I was a hidden child... I didn't escape from the concentration camp. I just left the town," he said.

Stern was determined to evade the Nazis and their sympathizers.

"I never put on the Star of David. I never wore it, because I knew that if I wore it, they could catch me."

He stayed there for a week until his father arranged for him to stay with a business contact he knew who lived on a farm outside of Budapest.

"My father had connections. He was in the wine business. He was a distributor," he said, adding that a grape farmer agreed to take Stern and his cousin in for four months in the summer to harvest the crop.

"I couldn't say anything. If anyone asked, we were goys, we were Christian, we had papers. I had papers from a Christian school, my birth certificate, etc."

He said he was safe from harm there, but he would have nightmares thinking about his family, having no contact with his mother and sister.

By the fall of 1944, his mother was taken to Auschwitz, where she was killed.

He said it wasn't until the end of April 1945 that he discovered the fate of his mother.

Throughout the war, Stern remained in Budapest, even after ghettos were built there. He continued to lie about his heritage and rely on his fake papers that said he was a gentile.

It wasn't until the war ended that Stern began to contemplate making the move to Israel.

Stern's experience as a Jewish child living in Hungary during the Holocaust prompted his desire to move to Israel. He was determined to fight to establish a Jewish state in the hope that Jews would never suffer another Holocaust.

"After the war, everybody, the youngsters, wanted to go to Israel."

He said he was involved with Zionist youth groups such as Betar and Mizrachi. In fact, Stern met his wife through their connection with Mizrachi.

Stern wanted to go to Israel, but he wanted to avoid the route that many Holocaust survivors took, which was to be transferred to a displaced persons camp in Palestine that was run by the British much like a concentration camp.

Jews were held at the camps by the British, who were under pressure from Arab leaders to limit the number of Jews allowed into Palestine.

In 1947, Stern, who was 16 at the time, decided he would try to get into Israel illegally. Mizrachi said it would take 50 youths to Prague where a plane would be waiting there to take them to Israel.

"But they said we have to go through the border illegally – sneak in in the evening. And we did. And we went to Slovakia from Budapest in the evening and then we waited," Stern said.

The Sochnut, the Jewish Agency, met them in Slovakia. They told the group to stay patient, that they would be leaving for Israel shortly, but after six weeks of waiting, Stern got impatient.

He decided that since nothing seemed to be moving forward, he would sneak back into Hungary and complete his high school studies.

A year-and-a-half later, in May 1948, the Hungarian government informed the leaders of the Zionist groups that 500 young Zionist would be permitted to move to Israel.

"They said, 'You can go out legally, and you take whatever you want. We'll give you a passport, but only people between 15 and 25.' I think they wanted to help Israel," Stern said.

Stern's father was on the board of Mizrachi and arranged for him to be one of the 500 youths who could go.

He said many took nothing more than their clothes and travelled by train with madrichim, guides, to Yugoslavia.

George Stern today

For 10 days, they travelled by a transport boat with 4,000 Bulgarian Jews, who were also making aliyah, to Haifa.

Upon arrival at the Haifa port, the women and children separated from the men as the men approached military representatives who were waiting at the dock to recruit them for the army.

Stern was desperate to join the Israeli army, but he was told that he couldn't until his 18th birthday. He was still 17.

"I said, 'What do you mean? I came to Israel for the tzavah. I came to fight in the war.'

"He said, 'I am sorry, but it is against our regulations. We have a strict regulation.' I told him, 'Listen, I'm proficient in electronic equipment. I learned it in Budapest. I have a diploma.' When I told him this, he was so happy."

Stern said the Israeli army needed people who were tech-savvy because they had a lot of equipment that the British had abandoned that needed to be fixed. The recruiter overlooked Stern's age because of the immediate need, and he was given clearance to join the army.

He was part of a 15-person group – all telephone and communications equipment experts – that established a communications brigade.

Stern and two other soldiers were later dispatched to the Givati Brigade, a fighting squad, to create a laboratory where they could maintain and repair all its equipment.

Stern in the winter of 1948, serving in the Givati brigade.

But since he was part of Givati, he had to receive basic combat training, during which he learned to throw grenades, shoot and take apart and put together his rifle.

After his training, although he was still only 17, he was sent to fight in the Negev.

"That is where I first saw the war and the fighting," he said.

"We arrived there – they planned Operation Yoav. This was the biggest operation in the Negev. The aim was to conquer Be'er Sheva, the surrounding area and the northern Negev."

After conquering two fortified Egyptian hills, Egypt surrendered and one of the war's most important operations was a success.

Stern was released from the army in 1950 and lived in Israel until 1960, when he and his wife moved to Brazil. Ten years later, they made their way to Canada, where he currently resides.

More than 60 years after surviving the Holocaust and fighting in the war that gave the Jewish people a state of their own, Stern's pride in his involvement in the birth of the Jewish state is palpable.

He doesn't have to tell you he's proud of both his role in the war and Israel's successes. It's simply understood.

Recovering Stefan Zweig's great interwar novel

By NORMAN RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

Stefan Zweig was one of the major Jewish writers of interwar Europe. Raised in Vienna, his early journalism appeared in Theodor Herzl's Neue Freie Presse. In the 1920s and '30s, he published a series of influential biographies of such varied personalities as Casanova, Marie Antoinette, Balzac and Nietzsche. He was the author of novellas, and during Nazi rule, he completed a libretto for one of Richard Strauss' final operas.

Norman Ravvin

With this work, he was arguably the last Jewish artist to maintain a public career in Germany, though by the time of the opera's fated opening night in Dresden, Zweig's books had been banned and burned. Early in Hitler's reign he chose exile in London, where he spent the war years in the company of such English literary luminaries as H.G. Wells and George Bernard Shaw and became a confidant of Sigmund Freud.

In 1942, after having begun a new life in Brazil, he and his wife committed suicide. In his suicide note, he reflected on the difficulties of starting over with the "world of his own language" and his "spiritual home" in Europe destroyed.

Left unpublished at his death was an untitled novel about a "post-office girl," which was unlike anything else in Zweig's oeuvre. The book appeared in German in 1982 and is only now available in English translation as The Post-Office Girl (translated by Joel Rotenberg and published by the New York Review of Books).

Offering a satiric portrait of European elites alongside a portrayal of young Christine Hoflehner, who maintains a village post office while nursing her bed-ridden mother, the novel opens as a Cinderella story. Christine, bound to the drudgery of minding a clattering telegraph machine and selling postage to surly farmers, is invited to join an American aunt who is vacationing on the Italian border. The invitation arrives, seemingly miraculously, over the office telegraph: "Christine Hoflehner, Klein-Reifling, Austria, Welcome, come any time, choose your day, wire arrival time in advance. Best, Claire – Anthony."

Written in the 1930s with Zweig already fully aware of the danger of Nazism, his novel is a portrait of the years after World War I, when economic collapse devastated what had been the lands of the Austro-Hungarian Empire.

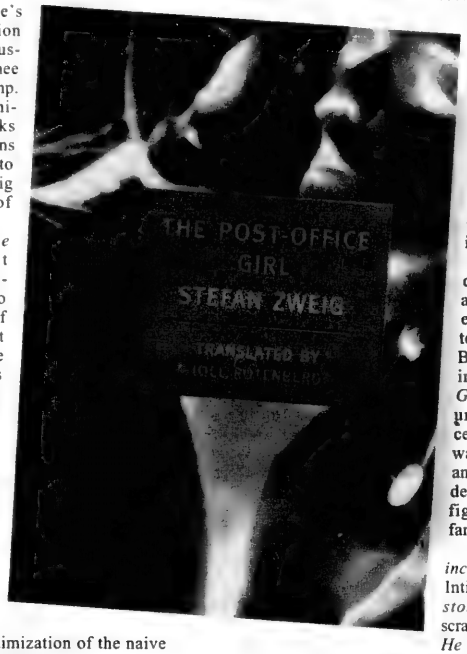
Under the tutelage of her aunt, Christine's stay at a luxurious mountain resort feeds a newfound belief that she could become somebody else. Wearing newly bought clothes, her hair styled for the first time, she hesitates to look at herself in the hotel room mirror: "She holds her breath with sudden courage like someone about to take a leap, then determinedly lifts her eyes… Who is that? Who is that slender, elegant woman, her upper body bent backward, her mouth open, her eyes searching?"

What unfolds is a narrative of abandonment, intrigue and failed romance, which abruptly sends Christine back to her old life in the Austrian hinterland.

The second half of The Post-Office Girl traces Christine's mother's death, her isolation from her family, and a frustrated romance with a returnee from a war-time prison camp. Made cynical by opportunities lost, Christine embarks on a series of dark decisions that seem, with hindsight, to mirror those taken by Zweig and his wife at the end of their lives.

The publishers of The Post-Office Girl call it "fast-paced and hard-boiled," comparing it to the detective novels of Dashiell Hammett. But one thinks first of the slick, dark narratives of James M. Cain and Raymond Chandler, like The Big Sleep. The great literary detective novels, like Zweig's, are built of atmospheric nights, sleek automobiles and trembling young ladies in danger of having their lives ruined by thoughtless strangers.

As in Chandler and Cain's books, fashion, double-crosses and the victimization of the naive by those with social power are central to what Zweig wants to show us. But the second half of The Post-Office Girl veers off in a much more serious direction, where it shares an almost Kafkaesque view of the collapse of European culture and order into tawdriness, bureaucratic rule-mongering, and the kind of political paranoia that Zweig encountered in Austria and German before his exile in England.



Readers may feel let down as the edgy energy and sheen of the novel's early chapters give way to a truly dark conclusion. But the pay-off in sticking with The Post-Office Girl is a deepening of our understanding of life in central Europe between the wars. As new technologies and ideologies clashed with decrepit traditional orders, figures like Christine fell far and fast.

Norman Ravvin's books include Hidden Canada: An Intimate Travelogue and the story collection Sex, Skyscrapers and Standard Yiddish. He is chair of the Concordia University Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies.

Avenue Q speaks to 20s and 30s generation

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to The CJN

One would think that the children's television show Sesame Street, with its puppet characters such as Big Bird and Kermit, is a light year removed from a sophisticated Broadway musical.

Jeff Marx, who watched the children's TV show while he was growing up, said it was his creative model for writing music and lyrics for the stage show Avenue Q.

Avenue Q, presented by Dancap Productions, plays at Toronto's Elgin Theatre until Aug. 31.

"What I wanted to do was not have the traditional Broadway musical with actors breaking into song that has turned off so many people from my generation," said Marx, 37, from his Los Angeles home. "I wanted to create a musical that young people can relate to, with unique issues from my generation."

Avenue Q has attracted an audience in their 20s and 30s who see it as a musical that speaks to their generation in a way that contemporary musical theatre usually does not.

The show is a grown-up version of Sesame Street on stage, with live characters and puppets singing about the issues of life following college, such as career disappointment, as well as sexual identity and tolerance among ethnic minorities.

Avenue Q is a contemporary urban neighbourhood made up of young Asians, single women, gay men, Jews, Hispanics, blacks and social outcasts – there's also a character based on the former child star Gary Coleman – all struggling to find their own way. Most of the characters in the show are life-size puppets, operated by actors onstage.

Written by Marx and co-writer Robert Lopez, the show's songs include Everyone's a Bit Racist, Internet Is For Porn, If You Were Gay and It Sucks To Be Me.

Avenue Q became such a hit that it won the 2003 Tony Award for best play as well as other Tony categories.

"I love the fame and security that Avenue Q gave me, but what I am most proud about is taking out the traditional linear story of one or two main characters and creating equal weight behind all the characters in the show," Marx said.

"The scenes become realistic to those who just left college and are exploring who they are and could become."

Marx said that Avenue Q is not an autobiography, but many of the characters in the play reflect conflicts he faced in his college years.

Jeff Marx

Growing up in Hollywood, Fla., Marx, as a teen, had a band that played mostly Barry Manilow music at bar mitzvahs and Jewish weddings. Bearing a striking resemblance to his idol, young Jeff thought of himself as a Barry Manilow wannabe.

"I played Manilow music at the shows and really wanted to have a career in show business and have success like Barry. I wrote to Barry for career advice and met him backstage after his Miami concert in 1987 and he told me, 'Go follow your dreams, but get out of your town and go to New York,'" Marx said.

"So my plan was to have a career as a performer in musical theatre on Broadway, and I enrolled as an undergraduate in theatre at Michigan State University."

But along the way to a career as an actor, Marx became a lawyer instead, specializing in entertainment law.

"In retrospect, it was a good move. I learned all about the money and legal aspects of show business, and how to parody without being sued – which led to Avenue Q," he said. "Being a lawyer gave me knowledge, but my ambition was back on the stage, not as an actor anymore, but I had to be creative."

Much of what happens in Avenue Q may not be autobiographical, but the struggles Marx faced are addressed in the play. For example, Princeton learns that he is gay after thinking he was in love with a woman. Marx, who is openly gay, also was unsure of his identity in his teens.

The play reflects Marx's core values growing up Jewish. Act 2 talks of the value of being generous to others – by finding a school for Katie Monster, a kindergarten teacher – and also shows the live characters and puppets attending a Jewish wedding ceremony.

"The Jewish concept of tzedakah is there – and everyone relates to the climax in the play, Jewish or not. A man told me that he thought the act of being generous was a very Christian act in the play," Marx said.

Avenue Q played in Las Vegas for nine months before going on a national tour this year. Marx is currently working on a movie version of Avenue Q and has also written a musical episode for the TV series Scrubs.

For tickets to Avenue Q, call 416-872-5555 or visit www.avenueq.com.

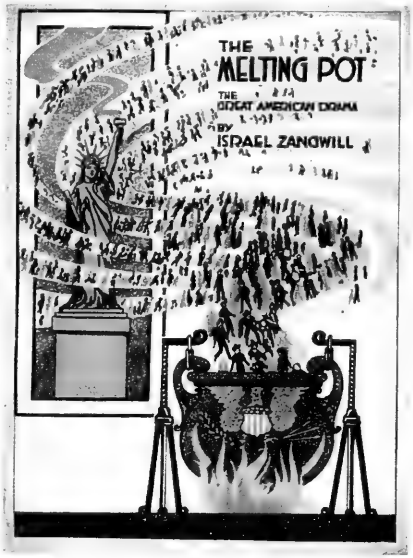
SUMMER LITERARY COLUMN PART 2: ZANGWILL'S MELTING POT 100 YEARS LATER

One hundred years ago, in September 1908, British writer Israel Zangwill's influential play The Melting Pot premiered in New York, simultaneously winning widespread popular acclaim along with sweeping pans from the critics. When Theodore Roosevelt saw it, he leaned over the edge of his presidential box and exclaimed "That's all right!" apparently in great satisfaction. But Roosevelt later invited Zangwill to lunch at the White House and chastised him for his poor depiction of American family values.



Theatre programme for The Melting Pot, 1916

Today, few people have any idea what The Melting Pot was about; if it is remembered at all, it is chiefly for popularizing the phrase in its title as a metaphor for American society. Like metal type that is tossed into a pot after use to be melted and recast anew, America in Zangwill's depiction was a giant crucible in which immigrants of every stripe are thrown together, happily losing their ethnicity as they meld into stereotypical American citizens. (It is often observed that Canadians prefer a "cultural mosaic" model of citizenship that seeks to celebrate ethnic diversity rather than obliterate it.)

The Melting Pot was essential a topical recasting of the Romeo and Juliet story. The protagonist, David Quixano, is a Russian Jew who comes to America after losing his family in the Kishinev pogrom of 1903, a fervent believer that the hatreds and animosities of the old world have no place in the new.

"Here you stand in your 50 groups, with your 50 languages and your 50 histories and your 50 blood feuds and rivalries," he says of the crowds of newcomers at Ellis Island. "But you won't be long like that, brothers, for these are the fires of God you have come to!…

A fig for your feuds and vendettas! Germans and Frenchmen, Irishmen and Englishmen, Jews and Russians – into the crucible with you all! God is making the American!"

Vera Revendal, the Juliet character, turns out to be the Christian daughter of the Kishinev general who annihilated David's family. The general admits his guilt, David forgives him, and wedding bells sound portentously in the distance. All's well that ends well? If this ending seems terribly wrong and misguided, it is only because we've learned, in the post-Holocaust age, not to automatically extend blanket immunity to war criminals upon the cessation of conflict as we would to kindergarten pupils at the end of a schoolyard recess. To use Simon Wiesenthal's pithy phrase, we have a responsibility to see that "justice, not vengeance" is done.

The New York Times found The Melting Pot to be generally "forced and false – as false as most of Mr. Zangwill's characters, which are stuffed with sawdust and words." As to Roosevelt's apparent initial endorsement of the play, the review goes on to say, "This merely goes to prove that even a president may be mistaken. The Melting Pot is… in fact, a very bad play viewed from almost any point of view."

The Melting Pot made a splash because Zangwill, whose first novel Children of the Ghetto became a publishing sensation in 1892, was long adept at making splashes in the literary world. He knew how to turn a clever phrase and to appropriate deep philosophical material for lightweight treatment. As a novelist he was as conventional and Victorian as Charles Dickens, and as ironic and cynical as Mordecai Richler when writing about the Jewish world. In his few plays, he explored intellectual ideas in the fashion of H. G. Wells or George Bernard Shaw, but was often scolded for his incessant preaching and prophesying. Throughout his career, he often embraced ideas only to cast them off later with great fickleness.

Born in Jewish east London in 1864, the young Zangwill kept notebooks full of the sayings, situations and idiosyncracies of the people he encountered, whose stories became the basis of Children of the Ghetto and his other "ghetto" novels. Despite its innate ridicule, the stage version of the book supposedly presented the mainstream stage in England with its first treatment of Jews as more than the demeaning stereotype of hook-nosed peddlers in dirty clothes. Unfortunately, Zangwill seemed to share the derogatory view of some Christians that the Jewish religion was an outmoded form and that the modern Jew, liberated from the medieval ghetto, was "like a mother who clasps her dead child to her breast and will not let it go."

In 1895, when he was at the height of his new-found celebrity, a man approached him and said, "I am Theodor Herzl. Help me to rebuild the Jewish state." Zangwill helped Herzl set up his first London address; two years later, he visited Eretz Yisrael and attended the first Zionist Congress in Switzerland. He devoted much of his energies to Zionist activities, lecturing and lobbying for the establishment of a Jewish territory. However, he seemed to have no special feeling for the authentic Jewish homeland in Palestine and felt the Jews could be equally happy in Texas, Saskatchewan, Uganda, South America or Outer Mongolia.

When the Seventh Zionist Congress formally rejected the Uganda option in 1905, Zangwill split with the Zionists and founded an organization of his own, the Jewish Territorialist Organization. Its aim was to create a Jewish homeland wherever a vacant territory might become available. After the Balfour Declaration, he returned briefly to the Zionist fold but again left in disagreement. A man of many quirks and contradictions, he may have been the model for the character in Philip Roth's 1993 novel Operation Shylock: A Confession, about a "reverse Zionist" who tries to persuade the Jews to leave Israel and return to the Diaspora.

A sparkling lecturer who was always in demand, Zangwill found this did not always work in his favour. In 1923, he received the reprobation of many for declaring political Zionism dead to a capacity crowd at New York's Carnegie Hall. Before his death in 1926, he must have been disappointed to see all of his efforts to establish a Jewish territory come to naught. Ironically, his very life discredited the ideas he presented in The Melting Pot, for he remained tied to Jewish causes to the very end.

Middle aged man discovers his operatic voice

By RITA POLIAKOV
CJN Intern

For more than 15 years, Howard Kliaman was in the tile business. He had no idea that his voice could make audiences cry.

Kliaman, 46, recently discovered that he has a talent for classical singing. He has just been accepted into Pacific Opera Victoria. He has toured with Tuned Air, a choir in British Columbia, and has performed at various venues in the past few months. His singing is described as breathtaking and his natural talent as unbelievable. Yet up until four years ago, when Kliaman was almost forced into his hometown's production of Fiddler on the Roof, he was unaware of his talent.

"I never sang publicly," the former Torontonian said in a phone interview from his home in Salt Spring Island, B.C.. "I was always a dashboard singer. I can remember on all those long [road] trips in Ontario… I used to sing. That's about the only singing I've ever done."

Four years ago, during Sabbath dinner, Kliaman started singing to his daughters. His wife, Annette, who had been asking him to try out for a local production of Fiddler on the Roof, called the play's director and held up the phone while her husband was singing.

"I had no desire to be on stage," he said. "I was trying to get a tile company up and running. I didn't want to make a fool of myself. I always had stage fright."

Despite his reservations, Kliaman was finally convinced to audition and got the part of Mordcha, the innkeeper. He was the only performer who didn't need a microphone.

Howard Kliaman doesn't need a microphone.

"I loved the part. What threw me was the sound guy. They had to keep moving me around, because I was drowning out the leads," he said. "That was the first indication I had a big voice."

Six feet two inches tall, with a 48-inch chest, Kliaman's appearance matches his voice.

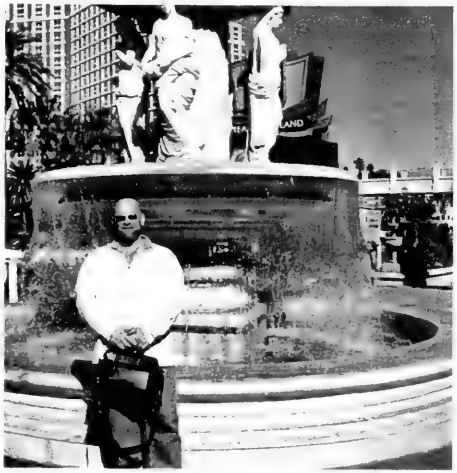
For the past two years, Kliaman has been training with Robyn Cathcart, a renowned vocal coach at the Victoria Conservatory of Music. Cathcart had a two- to three-year waiting list for new students, but Kliaman was accepted almost immediately.

"He fell in love with my voice. When I joined the conservatory, I knew nothing of this stuff. I'm a rock 'n' roll guy," Kliaman said. "

"I don't read music but I follow it very well. Tuned Air gave me a good ear. I'm able to listen to people… and regurgitate it. That's how I train for all my music."

While many singers struggle to project their voices, Kliaman has the opposite problem.

"My voice is so large, I have to learn to control it. My problem is singing the soft notes," he said.



Howard Kliaman only discovered his talent four years ago.

Kliaman's mother, Sandra, who lives in Toronto, was shocked to learn of his talent.

"I didn't know he had this talent. The first time I heard him sing was when I visited him [in British Columbia.] I swear to God, I fell off my seat. I didn't know he had it in him," she said. "He makes people cry."

Kliaman said that sometimes when he sings, he shakes and stutters from the concentration required. "It sends my body into a shock. It's an incredible feeling."

Seven years ago, Kliaman moved from Toronto to a small city in British Columbia. Without the move, he would have had no time to discover his talent.

"When I was working in Toronto, I worked anywhere from 70 to 80 hours a week. I had very little time to do anything. I was sick from stress, I never had a life. I never got to see my kids go to sleep," he said.

When a friend invited his family to Salt Spring Island, B.C. for a holiday, Kliaman fell in love with the place.

"I decided to take a go at it. There's no transportation problems, we're surrounded by green mountains and oceans," he said.

Kliaman still works in the tile business and has his own company. While he loves singing, he doesn't plan to give up his day job any time soon. Unless the offer is tempting enough.

"I don't want to become a starving artist. I have a mortgage, three daughters. The singing that I'm doing is all just for the love of it," he said. "If I can support my family singing full time, I would jump in. I love how it makes you feel."

Estelle Getty starred in TV's The Golden Girls

JTA

Estelle Getty, who gained acclaim as the acerbic Sophia on the The Golden Girls, died last week at 84. She had suffered from dementia for many years.

She was born Estelle Scher on July 25, 1923, on Manhattan's Lower East Side to Polish-Jewish immigrants. Her show business career started in the Yiddish theatre, and as a teenager she performed stand-up comedy in the Catskill Mountains.

In the early 1980s, she was appearing as the Jewish mother in Harvey Fierstein's play Torch Song Trilogy when she auditioned for the role of the octogenarian mother Sophia on The Golden Girls.

Getty won two Emmys for the role on the NBC sitcom, which ran from 1985 to 1992.

"I always told her she should be a stand-up comic. She was so funny in person," Rue McClanahan, her co-star on the show, told Associated Press. "She would always say, 'Why couldn't we make these characters Jewish? Why am I Sicilian?'"

Getty once told tv.com, "I've played mothers to heroes and mothers to zeros. I've played Irish mothers, Jewish mothers, Italian mothers, Southern mothers, mothers in plays by Neil Simon and Arthur Miller and Tennessee Williams. I've played mother to everyone but Attila the Hun."

Correction

"Joan Rivers revels in being politically incorrect" (CJN, July 10) was written by Byron Pascoe and Paul Telner. Also, the article included some incorrect information about the shows Rivers has written for; Just for Laughs Gags was not one of them. The CJN regrets the errors.

Teen represents Canada at world beach volleyball event

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A lot of 18-year-olds who stand six-four-and-a-half and weigh 185 pounds are, shall we say, somewhat gangly and more apt to bump into a wall while taking a walk than perform finesse moves on a field of play.

But Sam Schachter is no ordinary teenage string bean.

In fact, he's got all the attributes of a champion beach volleyball player: he's quick, he's co-ordinated, he's good on offence and just as talented on defence. He can spike and he can dig (go low to save opponents' hard shots), and his overall game is such that after only three years in the sport, he's on Canada's 19-and-under national team that's travelling to the Netherlands for the World Under-19 Championships, which began this week.

The Richmond Hill teen, it seems, is the real deal, a volleyballer who's good on the court, but excellent in the wildly popular beach variety of the sport.

The beach game suits his talents to a tee, he said prior to heading to The Hague. In the hardcourt game, players tend to be specialists, whether servers, spikers or set-up men. In beach, with only two players per side, you've got to be more flexible.

"I think beach requires more overall skills," he said. "I have good ball control and do everything generally well."

George Shermer would agree. A former coach of the Maccabi Canada volleyball team and co-owner of Beach Blast, a beach volleyball training and recreational facility with locations in Downsview and at the Docks, Shermer has seen Schachter develop into one of the country's best young players.

He's effusive in his description of Schachter's talents.

"He's got the right size, tremendous athletic abilities and he comes from a very good family background," Shermer said. "He's got all the tools to succeed."

At Volleyball Canada's June tryouts for the national team, held at Beach Blast in Downsview, Schachter and his partner Rex Fenton of Ottawa, were pushed to the limit. In the final, they faced the Manitoba duo of Chris Voth and Dane Pischke and were almost eliminated in Game 2 of the best of three championship. Already down after losing the first set 12-21, they trailed the westerners 20-19 in the second game and faced three match points. Barely staving off elimination, they went on to win 26-24, forcing a Game 3. That one they won 15-10, sending them to Holland.

Sam Schachter, right, will represent Canada in The Hague.

Schachter knows he and Fenton will have their work cut out for them in Europe. Canada is a middling power on the international scene. Our best-ever finish in a youth competition was fourth. Brazil, Poland, Australia and Germany are world powers, with European countries relying on players who honed their skill playing in a professional court league.

Schachter's dream is to compete at the world's at the senior level, and considering how far he's come in a short time, that goal appears well within reach.

A graduate of Westmount Collegiate in Thornhill, Schachter played court volleyball in high school before making the move to the sand.

"I like beach a little more," he explained. "I experimented with it the first time. Now I'm known as a beach player."

Two years ago, playing with a different partner, he finished ninth in Canada and fifth in Ontario. Last year, after changing partners, he moved up to fourth in Canada and second in Ontario.

This year meant another change. He teamed with Fenton, a longtime opponent, and the pair vaulted to the top ranking in Canada while also earning a spot on Ontario's under-21 squad. The June national tryout at Beach Blast marked the pair's first tournament together.

Schachter, who will attend Wilfrid Laurier University this fall, attributes his rise through the ranks to physical growth, "which helped," and because "I am smarter, a better attacker, [play] better defence and digging. My overall game improved."

He trains under Jason Hubbard at Beach Blast in Downsview, among other venues. Schachter's training regimen is gruelling, taking up to four or five hours a day, five days a week. Prior to tournaments, he trains seven days a week.

Shermer believes Schachter's potential is nearly unlimited. He could go as far as the Canadian Olympic team in 2016, when he should be near his peak, he said.

"His biggest asset is that he's extremely well co-ordinated, not his size," Shermer said. "He's good in all positions.

"His personality is that he's focused on all the things young people don't know about to be number one. He's got it all."

* * *

Schachter would be a shoo-in to make Maccabi Canada's court volleyball team at next summer's Maccabiah Games in Israel, if he chooses to play, Shermer said.

Even without him, the Canadian team should put a smile on Shermer's face. He's hopeful that all three of his sons – Joshua, who finished fourth in the national under-18 competition and second in Ontario, Eli and Daniel – will make the Canadian team in Israel.

In addition, Josh Binstock, a nationally ranked beach player, might be available.

There's also a good chance Maccabi Canada will field a women's team. It will likely be built around Rebecca Moskowitz, far and away the best Jewish female beach volleyballer, Shermer said.

Moskowitz recently teamed with Line Jomphe to win a bronze medal at the $10,000 Federation Internationale de Volleyball (FIVB) Beach Volleyball Women's Satellite event in Laredo, Spain.

Upholding the contract

By YONI GOLDSTEIN

Writing in the National Post the day after it happened, Michael Oren offered what I consider to be the most rational explanation as to why the Israeli government was correct in deciding to swap nearly 200 dead terrorists and the very-much alive terrorist, Samir Kuntar, for the bodies of kidnapped Israeli soldiers, Eldad Regev and Ehud Goldwasser.

"In return for their service in a citizen army, Israel guarantees that it will do everything to bring its soldiers home, should they fall into enemy hands," Oren wrote. "Regev and Goldwasser, reservists performing their annual duty, put on their uniforms confident of that pledge."

This is the root of the unwritten social contract between a country and its citizens. In implicitly agreeing to such an arrangement, each of the parties promises to protect the other and in return receives the promise of protection as well. Ultimately, the lives of Regev and Goldwasser could not be saved by the state. But Israel did the next-best thing (though to call it that seems rather crude) in returning Kuntar, a convicted murderer, to Lebanon so that Regev and Goldwasser could be properly buried in Israel, and so that their families and friends – who also entered into the same social contract as the two dead soldiers – could be freed from the purgatory that has held them for the past two years.

The main question that many have asked ever since the prisoner swap – did the negotiations with Hezbollah that led to the return of Regev and Goldwasser's bodies do more good or harm to Israel? – seems at best only of secondary importance, and at worst wholly irrelevant, given the circumstances. Israel, in the spirit of its social contract with Regev, Goldwasser, their families and, indeed, all its citizens, did what was required of it. That what the state needed to do resulted in the freeing of Kuntar is virtually meaningless by comparison.

But let's consider Kuntar anyway. Does freeing him, knowing that he brutally murdered three Israelis, including a four-year-old girl, weaken Israel and/or strengthen Hezbollah and other Islamist terror groups? In the latter's twisted minds, probably yes – they will see this as a major victory. Hezbollah kidnapped Regev and Goldwasser from Israeli territory, killed them and were handed back one of their own "heroes" for their efforts. If this operation proved so successful, the argument goes, there's no question they will try this again.

True, they will try to kidnap Israeli – and potentially American, Canadian and European – soldiers again, but this would have been the case anyway, regardless of whether they had captured Regev and Goldwasser and whether they had been able to negotiate Kuntar's freedom. Killing, kidnapping and ransoming have long been a major part of the jihadi way.

As for Kuntar, what does his freedom mean to Israel and the West? I would argue little or nothing. There are thousands of Kuntars out there who desire to kill innocent Israelis by any means available. What, in reality, is the significance of there being one more person of that ilk out there? The added threat to Israel of a free Kuntar is, in short, negligible, even if the reality of a convicted murderer of Israelis walking away is tragic.

In a situation such as the one Israel faced a few weeks ago, there is little room for rational decision-making, for the weighing of pros and cons. This was the sort of instance when emotion and instinct must lead the way. The repatriation of Regev and Goldwaseer, even in death, was the right thing for Israel to do, because it represented the vitality of the social contract between Israelis and Israel.

As for those who question Israel's decision from a rational perspective, I can only say that those of us who support the decision to give up Kuntar for the remains of Regev and Goldwasser hope, like you, that he, Hezbollah and all other jihadists receive their comeuppance.

GREEN BEANS WITH SESAME VINAIGRETTE

- 3 tblsp olive oil
- 1 tsp Asian sesame oil
- 1/2 tsp salt
- 2 tsp Dijon mustard
- 1/4 tsp black pepper
- 1 tblsp white wine vinegar
- 2 tblsp sesame seeds, toasted
- 1 1/2 lb green beans, trimmed

Cook beans in boiling salted water, uncovered, until crisp-tender, 4-5 min. Drain in a colander; transfer to bowl of ice and cold water to stop cooking. When beans are cool, drain and pat dry.

In a large bowl, whisk together oils, vinegar, mustard, salt, and pepper until combined, then add beans and sesame seeds and toss to coat.

REMEMBERING OUR YESTERDAYS

By BILL GLADSTONE

Sammy Taft, the "mad hatter" of Spadina Avenue, poses with show-business legend Cab Calloway around 1940. Sammy welcomed many celebrities to his famous hat shop next to Shopsy's Delicatessen, including Louis Armstrong, Jack Benny, Victor Borge, Jack Dempsey, Woody Herman, Bob Hope, Phil Silvers, Rudy Vallee, Henny Youngman and many hockey pros. A huge hockey fan, he once gave a hat to a hockey player for scoring three goals in a single game, an achievement that was thereafter known as a "hat trick." When Sammy put a hat in his hands, it came alive – he could make it talk. Late in his life, around 1990, he was celebrated in a one-person theatrical show in Toronto.

Centenarian says she is 'young at heart'

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Sadie Shapiro's sparkling blue eyes are an expression of the positive outlook on life she has had for 100 years.

Interviewed at her residence at Cummer Lodge, Shapiro spoke of her eventful life and her philosophy that has kept her cheerful and optimistic despite many adversities.

Shapiro was born in Toronto on June 14, 1908. Her parents, Bessie and Maxwell Blumenthal, had come from Russia at the turn of the century. She attended Clinton Street Public School, Harbord Collegiate and Oakwood Collegiate and went on to study at the University of Toronto.

It was rare for females in the late 1920s to study in university, particularly Jewish females. Shapiro received a master's degree in child psychology.

She says she loved working with young children – she taught preschoolers at Hillcrest Progressive School, and later, as a volunteer, she was one of the founders of St. Christopher House, which started as a preschool facility for underprivileged children.

"I enjoyed these volunteer activities," says Shapiro. "I had many other volunteers who came to help at the school."

Sadie Shapiro celebrates her 100th birthday.

She does not like to look back at unpleasant events in her life, but speaks with pleasure about her devoted daughter, Joy Pass, and her late husband, pharmacist Harry Shapiro, whose landmark drug store was at Spadina Avenue and Dundas Street.

"We had a great marriage. I was divorced with my teenaged daughter when I met Harry, and after we married, we had a wonderful life." She says that in addition to her volunteer work, they travelled and she played golf. She was active in the Lillian Freiman chapter of Hadassah-WIZO and served as president.

Shapiro says she took many courses over the years, particularly in literature, because she enjoys reading.

With pride, she displays a book published by The Ryerson Press titled Through My Eyes: An adventure in Art and Travel.

"Harry and I went to Israel in the 1960s and we became fascinated with the country. Although Harry had never been involved with art, when he returned, he took crushed stones and created Israeli scenes, and together we created the text and included 16 reproductions of Harry's paintings, very reminiscence of Israel."

Looking back, she modestly says her greatest achievement in life "was having my daughter Joy, who gave me the most beautiful 100th birthday party. And I love my two grandchildren and three great-grandchildren dearly – they bring me a great deal of joy."

Shapiro has a joie de vivre despite being confined to a wheelchair after she had hip surgery. "But I go to many activities and enjoy the current events courses and discussions, and my favourite show is Jeopardy."

As we say goodbye, Shapiro says, "I'm suppose to get old at my age, but I am young at heart."

It is this philosophy that has made Sadie Shapiro a young 100 year old.

TASTE OF THE DANFORTH
FRIDAY AUG. 8 — SUNDAY AUG. 10

ALL IN GREEKTOWN, YOURS TO ENJOY!

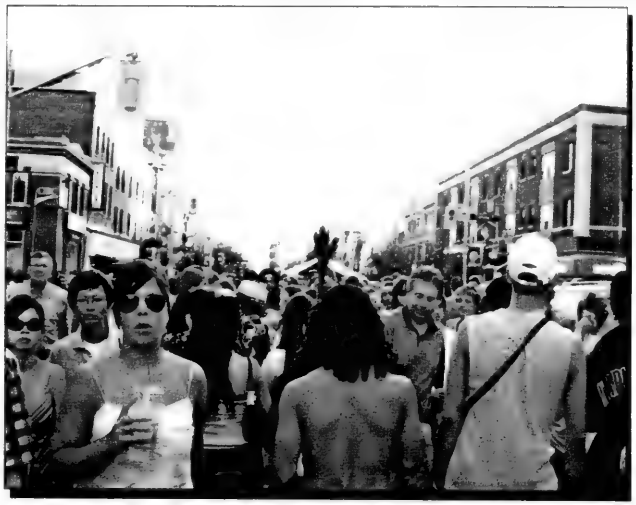
GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Taste Of The Danforth — how good things happen in GreekTown

What you can taste, see, and hear at the Taste Of The Danforth is good — very good. Wonderful food, festive music, and throngs of happy people caught up in three days of revelry.

But there's more at work here than meets the eye. How this event grew into North America's pre-eminent street festival is a success story of a different kind.

It's the story of energetic, forward-thinking people with a vision: how to celebrate and donate at the same time. How to live it up while giving.



If the Taste is the flower, GreekTown is the soil

It's the story of committed people too numerous to mention who have given generously of their time and financial resources to translate the vision into a reality: family fun with a cultural flair that benefits worthy causes like the Heart and Stroke Foundation (this year's charity designate).

Above all, it's the story of the people who enable it to happen: the family-minded, hard-working people of GreekTown. Because if the idea of the Taste was the seed and the Taste itself is the flower, GreekTown is the soil. It happened in GreekTown because the welcoming spirit of the dozen blocks from Broadview to Jones is precisely the kind of environment that allows such an undertaking to flourish.

GreekTown is so much more than Greek-Town. So when the Taste Of The Danforth bids you to "taste the world", they're not kidding. Implicit in this invitation is the opportunity to experience the warmth of an area that has historically embraced other cultures not only as clients, but also as entrepreneurs.

Take Saul Korman of Korry's for instance. Not many Jewish boys can say they're from Rouyn-Noranda, Québec, but Saul can. The gold mines' loss is our gain, as are Korman's many nicknames. Where does "SuperGreek" stash his Kryptonite? In GreekTown, of course.

The businesses featured in this section are owned not just by Greeks, but by people from all over the world. Even though the GTA has more than 200,000 residents of Greek ancestry — the third largest Hellenic community outside Greece — people of all ethnicities enjoy coming to the area. They don't just eat in its restaurants, they feed off its positive energy. Its sphere of influence extends beyond its borders into the surrounding residential and commercial areas.

Everyone gets to be Greek for a day — or longer

All roads, it seems, lead to GreekTown. And from August 8 to 10, everyone who comes to the Danforth gets to be Greek for the day. Try it. You might like it so much you'll want to be Greek on a regular basis.

It's a big world we live in. Whether you're 5 or 55, if you dropped everything right now and spent the rest of your days travelling this planet, you'd barely begin to cover it. Even if you confined your travels to a much smaller area — like Greece — you would experience a small part, at best, of its wonders.

You can't know the entire planet, but a visit to GreekTown will get you off to a running start.

Greeks with a Taste for building something bigger than themselves

Circa 447–432 B.C., the Greeks built the Parthenon. Today, the same tradition of architectural excellence is alive and well in GreekTown, under the watchful eyes of Takis Liris, Adonis Artemakis, and their dedicated crew. The showcase of their efforts is a small, nondescript storefront at 921 Danforth Avenue.

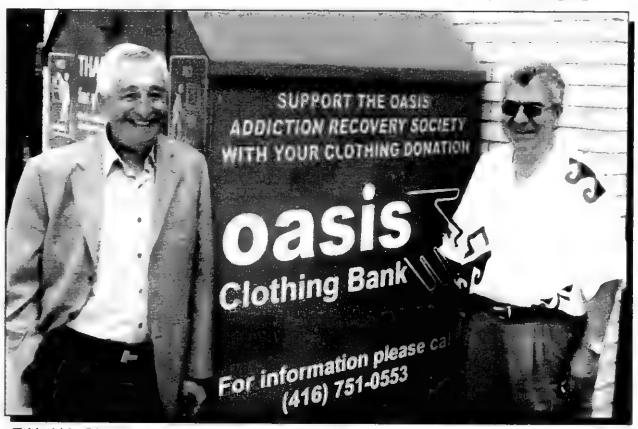
A storefront on Danforth Avenue? A showcase for architectural excellence?

No towering columns? No sculpted statues?

A different kind of architectural renaissance

If the venue seems odd, it's because this team of "architects" specializes in historical reconstruction — not of buildings, but of people. Under their direction, a team of volunteers helps those laid low by alcohol and drug addiction to rebuild their lives and self-esteem and become functioning members of society.

With financial assistance from Employment Ontario and the City of Toronto — as well as funds generated from the sale of clothing donations to the Oasis green bins throughout the GTA — the Oasis Movement acts as an umbrella organization for a myriad of programs designed to assist addicts every step of the way through the recovery process. There's an Employment Preparation Program, a Pre-Employment Personal Life Management Program, a Volunteer Program including participants from Toronto Social Services and the general public, a Job Development and Employment Placement Services Program, Casual Labour Placements, and the Oasis Employment Resource Centre.



Takis Liris (L) and Andonis Artemakis: providing a necessary Oasis for recovering addicts

Building is nothing new to Artemakis. A fireplug of a man, he has been instrumental in many important initiatives both inside and outside the Greek community. In 1993 he was involved in changing the name of the then Danforth Village to the current GreekTown On The Danforth. The following year, Artemakis and several other key players — including Stephane Abbat, Dr. Andy Syriopoulos, Sue Graham-Nuttier, and Saul Korman — spearheaded the creation of the Taste of the Danforth. With the financial support of Alex Alexakis of Krinos Foods and the ongoing contributions of many others, the Taste has grown from a small festival with a first-year attendance of some 6,000 to what today is North America's largest street festival with an annual attendance in excess of one million.

Despite his key role in heightening the profile of Toronto's Greek community and its important contributions to the GTA's culture and economy, Artemakis sees the Danforth as "a multicultural community with a Greek character. The beauty of a cultural mosaic is that each culture or "tile" enhances the others," he says. "We have here a dynamic of mutual enrichment that all communities should be proud to be part of."

If the growth of the Taste makes him smile, the work he and Takis Liris are involved in at Oasis makes him positively light up. Says Liris, who founded the Oasis Movement in 1992, "To assist someone who is already on an upcurve is nice. But to help someone who's down pick himself up — now there's an accomplishment. We may think we know what it's like to hit rock bottom, but unless we've experienced it ourselves or seen it first-hand, we really don't know what it's like. When we can reach out to someone in that position and help him or her regain the ability to function, be gainfully employed, mend broken relationships, restore their faith — that's a success story for everybody."

The birth of an area, the Taste, a movement

Continues Artemakis, who's been involved with Oasis since 1992 in a supportive and Advisory capacity, "There's no stage here, no award presentations, no trophies. Everyone who is here is part of something bigger than themselves. People talk of "relationship building". Here, we are helping people rebuild their relationship with themself. No office tower, theatre or concert hall is a greater monument to a person's accomplishment than helping another human being get back on his feet again."

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Mezes the gold standard on Danforth

You can feel the positive energy as you approach the patio. You can hear the buzz as you enter. Your excitement builds as you're seated. Your taste buds dance with anticipation as you're handed a menu.

It's magic.

Most of the fine Greek restaurants on the Danforth will give you a pleasant dining experience. Mezes goes one step further by elevating even the most casual meal into a festive occasion. You'll experience such joie-de-vivre (the Greeks call it kharisma) that you'll find yourself wondering what special event you're celebrating.

Just another meal? At Mezes, there's no such thing.

Mezes makes every meal an event not by gimmickry or by song and dance, but simply by their approach to food. They treat it with such reverence that merely serving it is an occasion. And sharing isn't an option here, it's Plan A. The namesake, appetizer-sized mezes are meant to be ordered in multitudes and collectively enjoyed by the table. This communal style of dining – as authentically Greek as the gastronomy – isn't just sharing, it's a form of bonding.

"It makes for a convivial meal," says Mezes proprietor Sue Zindros. "It stimulates conversation, sharing good feelings as well as food, and it encourages people to try new things."

Most better restaurants now advertise their cuisine as "authentic" and "fresh from scratch", but Mezes has quietly been fulfilling both these mandates since Day 1. If anything, at Mezes these claims are understated. Their extra-virgin olive oil comes not from a local supplier but directly from their family-owned olive grove in Greece.

Authentic and fresh enough for you?

Mezes pays top dollar for all their ingredients to ensure you enjoy the best of everything. But that added expense is not reflected in their prices.

"Our customers can taste the difference freshness and quality make. We believe in rewarding them for that, not penalizing them," says Sue.

The consistent excellence menu-wide makes it difficult to pick favourites here, so most customers start by ordering a large assortment of appetizers. They're all first-rate, but don't just fall back on old favourites like hummous and tzatziki; no visit to GreekTown is complete without sampling Mezes' Gigantes and Dolmades. When it comes time to order your entrée – if you can manage to get through the cornucopia of mezes – there's an equally compelling array of home-cooked meat, poultry, fish and vegetarian specialties to tempt your palate.

Mezes offers one of the most extensive Greek wine portfolios not just in Toronto, but nationwide, and can recommend the ideal accompaniment to your meal.

You'll find shades of copper in the decor and silverware on the table, but on your plate everything served at Mezes is pure gold.

Christina's is all the right things

No restaurant can be all things to all people. But Christina's has a remarkable ability to be all the right things to those seeking a rewarding dining experience.

It starts with the food, of course, and Christina's has managed to regularly update its menu with a focus on refined, upscale dining while keeping portions large and prices reasonable.

If you're a lamb lover then chances are you've already enjoyed Christina's unparalleled Leg Of Lamb and Rack Of Lamb. If you're in the mood for chicken, however, don't overlook the Kotopoulo Yemisto – stuffed chicken breast with spinach, cheese, onions and peppers, spiced and grilled, served with rice, lemon roasted potatoes and vegetables.

There's a difference between being full and being fully satisfied; Christina's chefs grasp this distinction across the full spectrum of the menu, hence Christina's continuing popularity among young and old alike.

Satisfying your appetite for Mediterranean cuisine is only part of the dining-out equation, however. Whatever else you're looking for in a restaurant, Christina's has it. Extensive wine list? Check – Christina's includes many selections imported directly from Europe. Live music and belly dancing on Friday and Saturday? Check. Lively patio? Check – heated as needed for year-round enjoyment. Friendly service? Like family.

Star quality? How about Robert De Niro, Bette Midler, Elliott Gould, and Jim Carey for starters? To list all the celebrities who've graced Christina's with their presence would exceed the bounds of this space. If you find one seated next to you, it doesn't mean that you're on camera. It simply means that they share your good taste in Greek cuisine.

Private parties and special event catering? Check. Intimate gatherings like Bar / Bat Mitzvah parties, graduations, birthdays, and sweet 16s are a natural here. Offsite catering is accommodated with aplomb. Weekend brunch? Check; experience GreekTown at a slower, more relaxed pace.

Christina's has received many accolades over the years, including multiple "Best Greek Restaurant" ratings from Where Toronto. According to partners Bill, Kathy and Tony, however, the most important yardstick of their success is customer satisfaction. "We don't rest on our laurels," says Kathy. "We want every meal to be the best ever, and our entire team works towards that goal."

For Astoria, the future of Greek dining is now

If there's one word that's synonymous with "GreekTown On The Danforth", it's "Astoria." For well over 30 years, this venerable "institution of higher dining" has come to symbolize the culinary qualities the Danforth is known for: great food, great quality, and great value.

Building on and enhancing the Astoria brand

Astoria's recent major renovation has seen it emerge brighter and roomier than ever, without losing any of its intimacy. If it shone before, now it positively sparkles. A nouveau rustic take on traditional Greek motifs unfurls in rich golds and maroons, with elegant tile underfoot and soaring sky blue overhead.

Company Director Peter Kerasiotis undertook the renovation with a view to embracing the needs and tastes of a new generation of diners while remaining mindful of Astoria's long-standing clientele. "Many of our original guests are still regulars three decades later," he notes. "They rely on us for their family outings and special occasions, and it's their loyalty that has allowed us to grow. We took our time renovating our original location and building our new location in Mississauga because we wanted to ensure a seamless transition. The idea was to build on and enhance the Astoria brand, not dilute it. That is something our customers would never have accepted. They expect satisfaction, and we intend to give it to them."

The feedback has been overwhelmingly positive, says Kerasiotis. The essentials – freshness, quality, and friendly personal service – are still unfailingly apparent at both locations. Astoria still imports staples such as feta cheese, olive oil and olives in small quantities directly from Greece. Their staggering portions still quell the most outrageous appetites.

Astoria's now-famous "souvlaki window", always a beehive of activity, is an indelible image of Danforth life. Judged "Best of the City" by Toronto Life and "Best of Toronto" by Now, Astoria's souvlaki helped make it a multiple winner of the Toronto Sun's Readers' Choice Award as Toronto's favourite Greek restaurant. Astoria was also rated "Best Greek International Restaurant" by Where.

Other jewels on the menu include hearty moussaka, exquisite grilled sea bass and salmon steaks – and Greek appetizers like grilled calamari and creamy homemade tzatziki, if you can keep your souvlaki craving at bay long enough to sample them.

"Best of the City"
Toronto Life

Location and atmosphere are other Astoria assets. For a big restaurant, it's remarkably cozy, due to its corner location and dual outdoor patios (still the Danforth's largest, and now among its brightest as well!)

It's no accident that the first signs of an upcurve in the popularity of Greek cuisine coincided with Astoria's opening, nor is it coincidental that its continued growth in popularity parallels that of the Astoria we know today.

Heading eastbound on Bloor, you know you're on the Danforth once you hit Broadview; but you don't really feel it until Astoria leaps joyously into view, bidding you "Welcome to GreekTown" in words that the food lover in you understands so well.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Pan's old-world mastery always up to date

Chris and Soula Christodoulou are a prime example of a restauranteur's anti-aging formula: never stop and never sit still. "We're too busy to get old," laughs Chris.

He may be right. Regular updates to both their menu and their decor, together with the hustle and bustle of running a busy dining establishment, have kept this dynamic duo hopping for decades.

Having achieved a measure of success and a loyal clientele in their quaint, intimate nook at Danforth and Ferrier, the Christodoulous could be forgiven for standing pat. Instead, they've done exactly the opposite – and have succeeded spectacularly on both the culinary and decor fronts.

If you've yet to encounter a worthy alternative to your mom's chicken, Pan's Caria Lemon Roasted Chicken may force you into a politically incorrect statement. Encrusted organic chicken supreme in herbs served over feta scalloped potatoes, topped with home-made onion rings and sweet pepper zucchini relish – chicken just never tasted better. If you're in the mood for fish, Pan's Chilean Sea Bass, grilled and topped with roasted garlic salsa and served with lemon cracked mini potatoes and baby spinach, is another reminder of why you come to GreekTown: for a taste that emanates from the culinary artistry of an individual, not from a formula.

Decor-wise, some intriguing interleaved brickwork ensconcing a massive wine rack has added cutting-edge modernity to the interior without diminishing the candlelit romanticism that is Pan's trademark. Big enough for your family events, yet small enough to cozy up in, Pan may represent the best use of a small space among Toronto restaurants.

Judged "one of the city's best" Greek restaurants by Toronto Life, Pan doesn't just serve Mediterranean food; it brings it to life.

Pantheon: 10 years of excellence

In 10 short years, Pantheon has established an Olympian standard of excellence in GreekTown.

How does one carve a new culinary niche in an area already blessed with dozens of fine Greek restaurants? By serving food so fresh and brimming with flavour, you'd swear it was your own mother who'd cooked it. Just don't tell executive Chef Nick Paroussis; he never "fishes" for compliments. Just fish.

And what fish! So extensive is the selection — and so impeccable the preparation — that the name "Pantheon" has become synonymous with superb fish and seafood, not only in GreekTown but Toronto-wide.

Here, you'll find all the popular varieties you've come to expect in GreekTown — like red snapper, Atlantic salmon and sea bass — plus many other exotic selections you'd be hard-pressed to find elsewhere. Baby sea smelts and fresh anchovies are imported directly from Greece. Striped bass, orange roughy, black porgy, red mullet, sea smelts, and many others are music to a fish lover's ear. At Pantheon, you could dine on a different fresh fish every day for a fortnight without exhausting the possibilities.

Paroussis' partner John Troupis and his son Bobby Troupis understand that food is not merely sustenance, but art and soul. In that spirit, they do their utmost to ensure that each customer's visit is a sensory experience. Attesting to their success is the ongoing popularity that has allowed Pantheon to double in size since it opened. It now offers two bright, spacious dining rooms. Semi-private dining with a comforting fireplace is available in the east room.

In a business where turnover is the norm, Pantheon's continuity stands out. The same head chef and most of the same wait staff present when it opened are still in place. Clearly, people like working here, they like the clientele, and the clientele likes them. Continuity breeds loyalty, and vice versa.

The Olympic Pantheon was blessed with the opportunity to taste the Ambrosia and Nectar of the Gods. The Olympics happen every four years, but at Pantheon, in the heart of GreekTown, you can indulge in those same taste sensations whenever the mood strikes you.

Euro's elevating new take on crêpes

Crêpes have traditionally been associated with French cuisine, airy-light indulgence and high calorie intake. A visit to GreekTown's Euro Crêpe Café deliciously dispels two of those associations.

582 Danforth Avenue
416-462-2500

Euro's crêpes are indeed lighter than air. But this delicacy has long ceased to be a French-only, dessert-only high-calorie indulgence. Euro Crêpe does much more than reposition the crêpe; it revolutionizes it. From unidimensional beginnings, this wondrous wrap has evolved into a highly versatile, delicious and healthful meal that can be enjoyed at breakfast, lunch, and dinner in a multitude of varieties, including buckwheat and gluten-free. And virtually every crêpe on the menu can be ordered as a sandwich.

The crêpe's dramatic rise in popularity throughout Europe prompted restauranteur Tony Pavlis to fill a GreekTown niche in a casual dining environment with all the elegance of preparation but none of the pomp and circumstance often encountered at crêperies.

A create-your-own option allows you to build your crêpe from scratch with a tantalizing variety of ingredients, which Pavlis buys fresh daily from local purveyors. But there's so much variety on the menu, we'd rather let Euro do the choosing. Two examples: the Village ($8) combines Chicken Breast, Swiss Cheese, Organic Spring Greens, Tomatoes, Asparagus, Hummous, and Creamy House Sauce. The Euro Veggie ($7) features Spinach, Asparagus, Grated Mozzarella, Tomatoes, Green Peppers, Roasted Red Peppers, Mushrooms, Onions, Black Olives, Cucumbers, and Artichoke Spread.

The intermingled flavours produce a sensational taste, but equally gratifying are the portions. You're expecting snack size, but what you get is an entrée and then some. Few other places, if any, give you such food value so elegantly prepared for under ten bucks.

The beverages are top-drawer, including fair-trade conventional coffee, specialty coffees, and 26 varieties of loose-leaf tea.

The many dessert crêpes cater to any palate — even that of your difficult preteen still fixated on peanut butter. The Classic PB & J (Peanut Butter and Strawberry Jam topped with shredded coconut) will placate him or her long enough to forgive your onerous sophistication.

Long and pencil-thin, like an old, narrow, European street, Euro is lined with vintage prints of European street scenes and cityscapes. Invariably, says Pavlis, people who've travelled Europe find in this montage at least one place they've had the pleasure to visit.

Further enhancing the old-world-meets-new ambience are original hardwood floors complete with mild undulations and a fully open kitchen. There, the Euro team will turn your most fanciful vision into a lighter-than-air reality and whisk it fresh to your table.

Greek Grill epitomizes Danforth experience

It doesn't take 200 years of experience to cook a souvlaki. But it sure helps.

If an establishment run by seasoned veterans is your idea of a comfort zone, the newly-named Greek Grill at Danforth and Carlaw will gratify you as no other restaurant can. Directly across from Korry's, this Greek Grill is family dining at its best.

Peter Konidis, whose 45 years in the restaurant business began the moment he disembarked from Sparta in 1963, works hand in hand with four partners who collectively boast close to two centuries of expertise. Think they can handle your order?

Konidis enjoyed lengthy stints at the Royal York's Imperial Room, the Old Mill, the Windjammer and his own Court's Dining Lounge before dropping anchor in GreekTown. He and his irrepressible smile are as recognizable to customers as the street signs. "When people ask for directions, we tell them Danforth and Carlaw are at the corner of the Greek Grill," he jokes.

The decor is pleasingly traditional, with predominately blue tones and Greek motifs adorning three separate dining areas fronted by a friendly patio. The atmosphere is disarmingly simple and lacking in pretension. This is a place not for ostentation but for relaxation. And the more the merrier — the Greek Grill comfortably accommodates up to 100 guests for special occasions of all kinds, and is a favourite destination for birthday parties and other milestone events.

Whether your penchant is for souvlaki or fish, moussaka or seafood, the Greek Grill's palate-pleasing offerings overflow with goodness, exemplifying the value that has made GreekTown Canada's foremost dining destination. It's for its Kalamari, however, that the Greek Grill is truly renowned. Grilled or fried, theirs is legendary — so much so that if you merely like it, your server may be disappointed. A blissful moan is the appropriate reaction.

Like most Greek restauranteurs, Konidis is blessed with two families: his mispocheh on the home front, his GreekTown customers on the other. At age 62 and steaming forward at the helm of a Greek restaurant, he feels truly blessed. "Like any business, this one makes us a little crazy. But it has given me two wonderful families. What's not to love?"

Thuna Herbals' past a beacon for future

It's a delightful anachronism reminiscent of an old English apothecary shop. Fifteen hundred glass jars, each filled with a different herb or root, stacked high in orderly rows. The original creaking hardwood floor. And a proprietor who's all about knowledge and caring.

Established in 1888 (how's that for history?), this family business is now run by Evelyn Dorfman, the granddaughter of founder Dr. Max Harriman Thuna, and a staff of qualified herbalists on the original turn-of-the-century premises at 298 Danforth Avenue.

Over the years, the Thuna family has seen the use of herbal remedies — once the de facto method of treatment for most medical problems — lose ground to the synthetic drugs that have flooded the marketplace.

More recently, however, the pendulum has slowly but surely begun to swing back, as more and more people seek alternatives to mainstream medicine. Thuna's doesn't diagnose problems presented to them; rather, they advise customers seeking a diagnosis to obtain it from their medical practitioners. Some come with the blessing of their GP, but many are referred by naturopathic practitioners. Typically, clients come in on their own initiative.

Saul Pasen helped pioneer herbalism in Canada

THUNA HERBALS
298 Danforth Avenue
416-465-3366

Drawing on their schooling, Dorfman and staff choose from some 2,000 herbs, berries, roots, and leaves the precise combination most likely to alleviate an ailment presented to them. To cite but one example, a formula for bladder infection, or even interstitial cystitis, might include uva-ursi leaves, buchu leaves, parsley leaves, marshmallow root, corn silk, and goldenseal leaves.

Dr. Thuna and his children, including son-in-law Saul Pasen, pictured above, helped pioneer herbalism in Canada.

The current premises stand as a rich reminder of Canadian history. Even if you have only a passing interest in herbalism, you owe it to yourself to visit this Toronto landmark. And who knows — by asking a few questions, you might become further enlightened on this ancient practice.

Danforth's dynamic duo's 521 reasons to chill

Who decides to renovate only two short years after a previous successful renovation?

521 guesses.

Lambros and Frank Babatsikos' winning combination of chutzpah and vision — as translated by George Foussias of Hirshberg Design — has resulted in one of Toronto's most innovative restaurant redesigns in years. Cafe 521 is now a monument to cutting-edge chic.

"Don't repeat 521 too often," says Lambros. "Saul Korman has a worldwide copyright on the number 569. If I keep saying 521 I may have to pay him royalties. Or buy him a beer."

Okay, we won't. So here, in brief, is how the B. brothers transformed the L-shaped gem that wraps around the convenience store at the corner of Danforth and Fenwick ("I've been trying to get rid of the guy for years," says Lambros, "but I can't — he's my brother. Besides, I'd have no place to buy lottery tickets."

- The L shape stays. Where else can you find a dual-patio bar and restaurant fronting two different streets and connected by a martini-thin passageway? Call it the Suez Canal, GreekTown style.
- Three giant portals with ensconced fireplaces now connect the bar area to the adjacent dining area to the beautifully appointed private lounge situated behind the dining area. The resulting depth perspective affords guests a telescopic view of the sunswept street through three separate and distinct walls.
- Giving onto the Danforth at front, a long mango-yellow bar moonbeams through the lounge, topped by a sweeping curved ceiling. Giving onto Fenwick at rear, a tan-and-chocolate dining area oozes comfort.
- The spectacularly-tiled stairwell to the basement now ranks as the world's most elegant washroom entrance.

With digs like these in which to enjoy Toronto's finest scotches, martinis and specialty mixed beverages — as well as delicious light meals — it's no wonder the 521 buzz continues to swell. With seating that's easy on your backside, prices that are gentle on your pocketbook, and friendly service, there's no better place to kick back and relax. It's also a wonderful venue for a private party.

So if this finds you heading down to the Danforth for dinner, why not budget another hour or two and turn a relaxing dinner into a very relaxing evening? This hot spot will give you 521 good reasons to chill out.

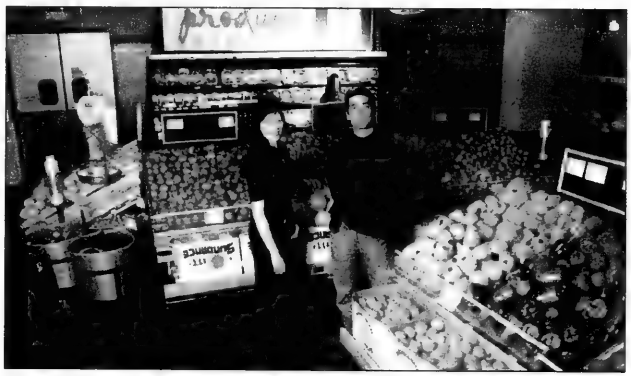
Big Carrot remains down to earth despite spectacular growth



Nowhere is the growing interest in products for healthy living better reflected than at The Big Carrot, where three major expansions in recent years have increased its floor space by a full 40 percent.

Many stores have attempted to cash in on the healthy living craze, but The Big Carrot has remained the leader in an increasingly crowded field not only by offering products that are as good for the environment as they are for its customers, but also by providing a level of expertise and personal service unmatched in the industry. As a worker-owned co-op, it has also managed to resist the negative changes that sometimes accompany growth. At The Big Carrot, bigger and more modern simply means more selection and more staff to assist you.

The Big Carrot's loyal clientele embraces both its ethos and its products: minimally processed, organically grown, cruelty free, environmentally safe and, increasingly, GMO-free. Many of these products are also Kosher-certified. From an environment friendliness standpoint, The Big Carrot walks the walk by heating its newly renovated juice bar entirely from solar panels.

Natural, Organic, GMO-free, Kosher-certified products

The Big Carrot is really three stores in one: a health food store and market, a wholistic dispensary, and an organic juice, coffee and sandwich bar.

You'll enjoy a produce department with over 100 varieties of fruits and vegetables at peak season, an unmatched selection of organic bulk foods, dairy products, frozen foods, and packaged goods, and a body care department with Canada's widest selection of personal care products for the entire family, including baby.

In terms of special dietary needs, if you require wheat-free, dairy free, or anything-free, the Big Carrot has both the products and the expertise to assist you with your purchase.

For natural and organic pastas, breads, buns, bagels, flatbreads, cookies, muffins, and other wholesome nosherie, no other store — or bakery, for that matter — even comes close. There are literally dozens of choices here. Their growing selection of in-house baked goods includes the best brownies you've ever tasted — period. The Big Carrot also has by far Toronto's largest selection of soy milks and other non-dairy beverages, both fresh and tetra pack.

Among many others, the Kosher-certified products include Crofter's Organic Premium Fruit Spreads from Ontario; tomato products from Utopia, also Ontario-grown; Imagine Foods Tetra Pack Dairy-Free Soups (the ultimate in convenience); Nature's Path Organic Cereals; Organic Meadow Yogurts & Pressed Cheese; Cold Mountain Miso; Soy Delicious Non-Dairy Frozen Desserts; selected products from Eden Foods; Kemach Organic Spelt Matzah; Amy's soups, pizzas and frozen entrées; Sol Cuisine falafel patties; Healthy Times baby foods; Suzie's Spelt or Kamut Breadsticks & Flatbreads; Mary's Gluten Free Organic Crackers; Whole Alternatives Organic Microwave Popcorn; Tofurky Vegan Slices & Sausages; Earth Balance Dairy Free Margarine & Shortening; Garden Fresh Salsas; and an immense variety of chips and other snack foods. Sunflower Kitchen dips, pesto and soups are popular mainstays, as are Bob's Red Mill packaged grains, cereals and baking goods. Beit-Yitzhak jams are Kosher and made in Israel.

The Deli counter offers more than 50 mouthwatering selections, both hot and cold. Toronto's only 100% organic juice bar features over 50 choices of juices, blender drinks, nutritional boosts, shakes, and fair-trade organic coffees, as well as sandwiches and other treats. Try the Grilled Tempeh sandwich with lettuce, tomato, red onion & honey mustard mayo. For a summer treat, enjoy Mapleton's organic ice cream, as well as Cool Hemp, a Kosher-certified, organic non-dairy dessert available in a cup or wholesome organic cone.

Through its ongoing expansion, The Big Carrot has retained the humility and friendliness of its early years, which explains the steadfast loyalty of its customer base. This is a store that's down to earth in every possible sense, and a real pleasure to visit. It's an oasis of calm amid the chaos of everyday life. A visit here isn't just grocery, supplement and cosmetics shopping; it's a balm to the spirit.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Dine like royalty. Because at the Palace Restaurant, you are.

There are many fine Greek restaurants on the Danforth, but there's only one PALACE.

Others may treat you like royalty; here, you are royalty. Serving you is not our first priority, it's our only priority.

If you haven't yet been to our cozy little Kingdom, ask someone who has.

Ask them what they saw when they blissfully closed their eyes after taking one bite of our Dolmades drizzled with lemon sauce. Did they see Athens? Thessaloniki? Larissa?

Ask them how they enjoyed our Hot Mezze Platter (Kalamari, Grilled Octopus, Loukaniko, and Bifteki). Perhaps they'll tell you they were so captivated by it, they forgot it was "just" an appetizer.

Ask them if they remembered to tell themselves to Slow Down as the Atlantic Salmon Steak melted in their mouth.

Ask them if the Avgolemono soup was delicate enough, or the Greek salad crisp enough.

THE PALACE RESTAURANT
722 Pape Avenue

www.eatatpalace.com

Ask them if the olives that came with their meal weren't the perfect companion to everything they ate — in flavour, texture, and colour. (We Greeks have a love affair with olives — or didn't you notice?)

Ask them if the Lamb Kleftiko's divine combination of lamb, feta, sweet bell peppers, onions and mushrooms wasn't simply the most exquisite thing they'd ever tasted...

... until the Red Snapper arrived at their table. (Ask them if they enjoyed the salt spray on our boat that morning. After all, fresh-caught means fresh-caught).

Ask them if the assortment of homemade desserts they inhaled was truly the crowning glory.

And don't forget to ask them about the incredible birthday party they threw for Moishe in our private party room.

But no need to ask them if you can borrow their crown. Yours is waiting for you at reception.

Historical flavours come alive at Messini

When visiting most websites, you're tempted to "Skip Intro" as prompted. You want to get to the heart of the matter ASAP.

Visit Messini's website, however, and you'll find yourself engrossed in the historical introduction: at Messini, history is at the heart of the matter.

A sequence of richly-textured, sepia-toned photographs of the southern Greek village of Messini, circa 1930, set the historical stage for the taste treat you'll experience at 445 Danforth.

After 23 years of restauranteuring in Europe, owner Marinos Dafnas opened Messini with the singular goal of elevating gyros preparation to the lofty level it enjoys in Greece. If you know gyros only as meat on a pita, Messini will open your eyes — and your taste buds — to an exciting new dining experience.

So how does the Messini version of gyros rise above the rest?

- Meticulous preparation. Roasted to perfection on a spit, the gyros (pronounced yee'-ros, from Modern Green guros, "turning") combines the finest marinated cuts of moist and dry meat to ensure that it retains its juiciness and tenderness throughout the cooking process. Unlike your typical fast-food gyros, Messini's are prepared fresh from scratch: no freezing, no precooking;
- Quality and freshness of trimmings. The tzatziki, red onions, parsely, spices, and French fries (as per Greek tradition), like the meat, are all up-to-the-minute fresh;
- Pita made fresh daily on the premises. As with any fresh homemade bread vs. mass-produced, there's simply no comparison.
- Variety. Messini caters to a wide range of palates and dietary preferences by offering chicken and vegetarian gyros in addition to the traditional meat.

MESSINI AUTHENTIC GYROS

445 DANFORTH
416-778-4861

The result: a whole that's greater than the sum of its parts — a sandwich that melts in your mouth with a rich blend of subtly interwoven flavours.

The prices are more than reasonable, with gyros dinner entrées starting from $8.25, lunch specials from $6.50. The menu also includes mainstream Greek selections, but you'll do yourself a disservice if you don't at least try the gyros.

Messini's immaculate interior flanks an open kitchen. Pleasant brown and cream tones — gleaming ceramic tile floor, rich wood trim and comfortable seating — create an aura of casual dining elegance.

The beaches of Peloponessos may seem far away, but at Messini, some of southern Greece's best tradition and culture is right here for the sampling.

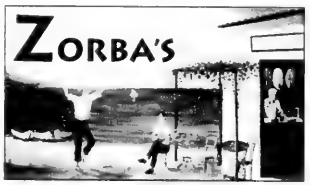
What's for dinner? Ask Zorba's.

Remember the last time you told Mom what you wanted for dinner and she replied, "What do you think this is, a restaurant?"

At Zorba's, the reverse is true; you think you're going to a restaurant, only to find yourself at home.

Maybe that's what we love about GreekTown: it's the one area in Toronto where you can dine out and eat in at the same time.

Nowhere is this more true than at Zorba's, where they do have menus, but you can do just as well without them.



681 Danforth Ave. at Pape
416-406-1212

Bring Mom if you can. She of all people will appreciate the role and the efforts of owner and chef Kosta Carasoulos, who cooks not according to a set menu but according to whatever stirs his imagination at the time — just like she does.

The result is Zorba's katsarola (Greek for "pot", a metaphor for home cooking). Always off the menu and priced from $8.50 to $12.00 for a huge portion complete with potatoes, rice and vegetables, these Greek specialties aren't just "like" home cooking — they are home cooking. Typically roasted or stewed — just like Mom's — they evoke a simpler, less complicated time.

That's the good news. The bad news is that once they're gone, they're gone, and with an eager clientele weaned on home cooking, you're advised to arrive early for best selection.

Remember your Mom's or your Bubbie's chicken fricassee? Zorba's lamb fricassee will melt in your mouth just as hers did. Remember how, in Mom's hands, something as simple as green beans or cauliflower took on a heavenly aura? Those memories, too, are rekindled at Zorba's. Here, the simple becomes the sublime.

Zorba's mainstream menu tends toward casual, and many entrées are offered in three sizes (small, regular and large). The medium Greek salad could easily pass for a large; the large is off the charts. As with the katsarola, the prices are exceptionally modest. For example, the Lamb Souvlaki is offered as a sandwich for $4.75, with fries for $6.25 or with salad for $7.45.

This is a family restaurant in the most literal sense. At any given time you'll find up to seven members of the Carasoulos family tending to your needs. Says Bobby, "We don't really know where home life ends and the business begins; they've become one and the same."

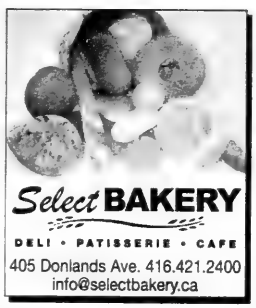
If you've never had the pleasure of dining in a Greek home, a visit to Zorba's will quickly fill that void in your life experience. It will also remind you of GreekTown's unique ability to enable you to dine out and eat in at one and the same time, with one important difference.

You won't have to do dishes.

Select Bakery evokes childhood memories

A bakery is not merely a place where bread is made. It's a symbol of sustenance that evokes treasured memories of still-warm goodies emerging from the oven with a maternal blessing and simultaneous admonishment not to overindulge.

Nowhere is this symbol better exemplified — and brought to life on a grand scale — than at Select Bakery. Huge (5,000 sq. ft.) yet intimate (GreekTown's only bakery with a dedicated seating area), its majestic array of baked bounty is to the palate what surround sound is to the ear. Enhancing its seductiveness is the colour scheme (tan on caramel on chocolate) and a refinement of presentation worthy of the illustrious cafés of Europe after which it's modelled.



The Katsamakis family — father Emmanuel, sons Kosta and Nick, and daughter Areti — lead a cheery staff of skilled bakers and pastry chefs. A full range of traditional Greek, European and continental pastries (baklava, galaktoboureko, petits fours et al) is complemented by exceptional European breads, specialty cakes of the highest order, and sublime specialty coffees.

For weddings and other events, Select's special occasion cakes score a 10 out of 10 for artistic merit. If a cake could be said to belong in the Louvre, it was likely conceived in their oven.

Further distinguishing Select is its prepared foods. No time to cook? Moussaka, pastitsio, and many other entrées — plus the full gamut of Greek dips and sauces — are prepared fresh daily for your dining pleasure. Many entrées are available fresh or frozen, and most are suitable for freezing. Need to entertain on short notice? Select is a one-stop destination for party trays, rolls, and related comestibles. And its ultraconvenient location on Donlands just south of O'Connor has ample, inexpensive meter parking at the front door.

But we digress from the baked temptations. Among the highlights at Select are:

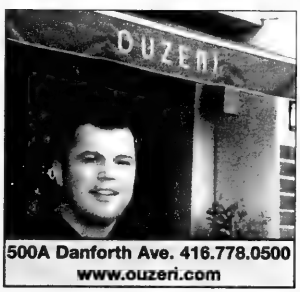
- European Village Bread: crusty on the outside, buttery soft on the inside;
- Kalamata Olive Bread: as good as it sounds. Buy two;
- Chocolate-covered baklava: a hybrid pioneered by Select, it picks up where "to die for" leaves off;
- Mille feuilles: Select's version makes a good run at the proverbial thousand sheets, each one shatteringly good.

Exquisite wedding and other special occasion cakes

Bakeries are the stuff of childhood longing; each is measured against our favourites of yesteryear. This bakery belongs in that Select group.

Ouzeri: Danforth's most relaxed dining

A splash of vibrant colour, sweeping sky-blue awnings, and a festive patio beckon you inside. It's as if you stepped straight off the sidewalk onto the beach. Ouzeri has the unique ability to relax you in seconds — a valuable asset when you consider that the enjoyment of any meal hinges first and foremost on the absence of stress. This is the one GreekTown restaurant that feels like one giant patio. Even when you're seated inside, the open, airy ambience gives you a sense of freedom, of letting go.



500A Danforth Ave. 416.778.0500
www.ouzeri.com

Like their pride and joy, brothers Chris and Alex Trahiotis are bright, cheery, welcoming people whose love of the restaurant business comes naturally, since they grew up in the business.

Marrying European fine dining with Greek cuisine, Ouzeri's eclectic menu is focused on quality, not volume. The kind of quality that will stir your fondest memories of home cooking. Sacrilegious though it sounds, Ouzeri's Avgolemono Soup will have you drawing favourable comparisons with your Bubie's chicken soup — high praise indeed.

Famed for their appetizers, Ouzeri also offers a number of intriguing entrées. Strydia Ouzeri is topped with spinach, tomato, kaseri cheese and Ouzeri's special sauce, then baked to perfection. Lamb rosemary pie, offered in your choice of lamb shank and feta or chicken with a rosemary and mushroom sauce enveloped in filo, is warmly recommended. The moussaka — both meat and vegetarian — is as good as it gets in GreekTown, and the seafood richly deserves the "authentically Greek" label you'll encounter everywhere on the Danforth. Fresh fish is available daily, and may feature Red Snapper, Sea Bass, Salmon, or whatever catch happens to be freshest on the day you visit.

Ouzeri's extensive Greek wine list has a selection that will perfectly complement any of the entrées, or stand on its own as an after-work or after-dinner libation.

The service is friendly and extremely thorough, with ample wait staff to keep pace with your needs. Like the awnings, they're dressed in an extremely comforting shade of blue.

Whether you're looking for a quick bite or a long, pleasurable meal, Ouzeri's three levels of dining all convey the same gentle message: Relax. Relax. Relax.

"One of my favourite summer patios" — Saul Korman

Menswear's Little Big Man take

Steps to Success

CAN a lonely jewish tailor find happiness and success at Danforth and Pape?

sure he can

'cause he's got the right stuff.
The stuff that's "in",
and his store is a regular social club.
You'll see all your old buddies there.
Remember Skinny Horowitz from grade 4?
You'll see him too.
(By the way, what the hell's he doing now?)
Can a lonely jewish tailor find happiness and success at Danforth and Pape?
Now you know why.
From $70 to $200.

Goliath didn't stand a chance.

In a recent address to the Retail Advertising Council of Canada, Saul Korman expanded on the strategy that enabled one small man to tackle the giants of the retail industry and win.

The insights he elucidated could fill a book. The broad strokes are:

• Creating a larger-than-life image on a small advertising budget. Has a little guy ever had a bigger footprint? If you think Menswear, you think Korry's; if you think Korry's, you think 569 Danforth Avenue. That's no accident. It's the result of thousands of radio spots and print ads — "as many as I could afford to buy, and some I couldn't afford," admits Korman. Talk may be cheap, but airtime isn't; Korman's clever and judicious use of both on a budget would be the envy of any Madison Avenue ad agency. Some laughed at his schtick way back when, but no one's laughing now — not after 55 years of success. To the few naysayers who still insist on giving him low marks for artistic merit, Korman has a one-word answer: Scoreboard.

• Thinking and merchandising outside the box (before that phrase was even coined);

• Breaking all the retail advertising moulds. Korman believes in dressing for success, but dress rehearsals? Nada. He does every new Korry's radio commercial live on air. If you happen to be with him at airtime, you'd better bring your "A" game, because you're going on air whether you like it or not. Why? Because you're there, and because that makes you news. Reality TV may be all the rage today, but the fact is Korman's been doing Reality Radio for decades. If he didn't invent the genre, he's certainly one of its founding fathers;

Take your business seriously, not yourself

• Poking fun at himself. Unlike the self-caricaturization employed by some retailers for comedic effect, Korman's self-effacement is a straight-up factual admission of his flaws du jour. Recently, Korman was chided just before airtime for consistently mispronouncing the name of his Sales Manager, Franco Gagliardi. He then immediately told his audience that "I've just been informed that for the past 32 years, I've been mispronouncing Franco's last name." Still live on air, he asked the nitpicker who'd pointed out the error to repeat the correct pronunciation, then nailed it.

By choosing to expose rather than hide his little foibles and faux pas, Korman unabashedly shows the vulnerability we've been taught to suppress — and his listeners love him for it. Chest-pounding gets old fast, but what's not to like about a guy who takes himself with a grain of salt, casts his customers in starring roles, promotes his neighbourhood on his dime, and wears his heart on his impeccably tailored sleeve?

The only time Korman makes a straight-up sales pitch is when he's promoting a charity, like his annual golf tournament to raise funds for Toronto East General Hospital Foundation. This year, the event was held at Angus Glen.

Korman doesn't play up his Jewishness, but he doesn't hide it either. The early print ad depicted herein reflects a typical Korman mix of pride and irreverence.

"I think too many advertisers try too hard to tell everyone how great they are," he muses. "Taking your business seriously doesn't mean you have to take yourself seriously. Your customers will decide how good or how bad you are. If you listen, they'll tell you."

The overwhelmingly positive feedback from both customers and the trade — including those he's sometimes one-upped — has been music to his ears. Last year, Fashion North, Canada's national menswear trade show, presented Korman with its inaugural Retailer Of The Year Award. This year, the prestigious New York-based menswear trade magazine MR presented him with a Lifetime Achievement Award.

Despite vague rumblings of retirement some five years ago when Korry's celebrated its 50th anniversary, Korman skated through that milestone like it was no more than a speed bump. Doesn't want to retire? Can't is more like it. This isn't just what he does, it's who he is. "I really can't take a day off in the city," he shrugs, "or I find myself right back in the shop". However powerful Korry's magnetism for menswear afficionados, its strongest pull is on its founder. "I have to go out of country — usually to St. Maarten (where he's revered as the island's unofficial tourism ambassador). Nu? How about Greece? "I'm already in Greece," he chortles. "Look around you! If you walk more than 20 feet without someone offering you an ouzo, you need an image consultant or a new suit from Korry's — probably both."

The melting pot that is today's GreekTown is mirrored in Korry's staff, on which no fewer than a dozen ethnicities are represented. Many backgrounds, one language requirement: fluency in fashion and service. Known as a generous but demanding employer, Korman will tolerate the odd mistake but never complacency. "Customer loyalty and respect are earned, not granted," he says. "So don't ever take anything for granted — not one shirt, not one tie. A good waiter makes you feel like a king whether you're ordering a five-course meal or a cup of coffee. We're no different. If your customer is not important to you, why should you be important to him?"

Lifetime Achievement Award from MR

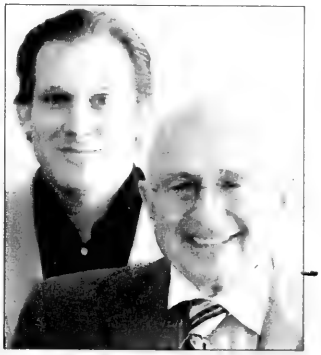
Walk a single GreekTown block with Korman, and you quickly learn the degree to which he's esteemed by his fellow merchants. The outpouring of affection he receives is what you'd expect for a world-class celebrity. Korman's quick to downplay both the acclaim and his longevity, however. "There's always someone tougher, smarter, and quicker than you are. Take my cousin Esther. She's 99. I've had a good run, but compared to her, I'm a spring chicken." Her secret? "A vodka martini every day. Skyy Vodka, of course." He isn't joking — about the daily vodka martini at least. About the brand, who knows? Once a pitchman, always a pitchman — especially one who's loyal to his suppliers.

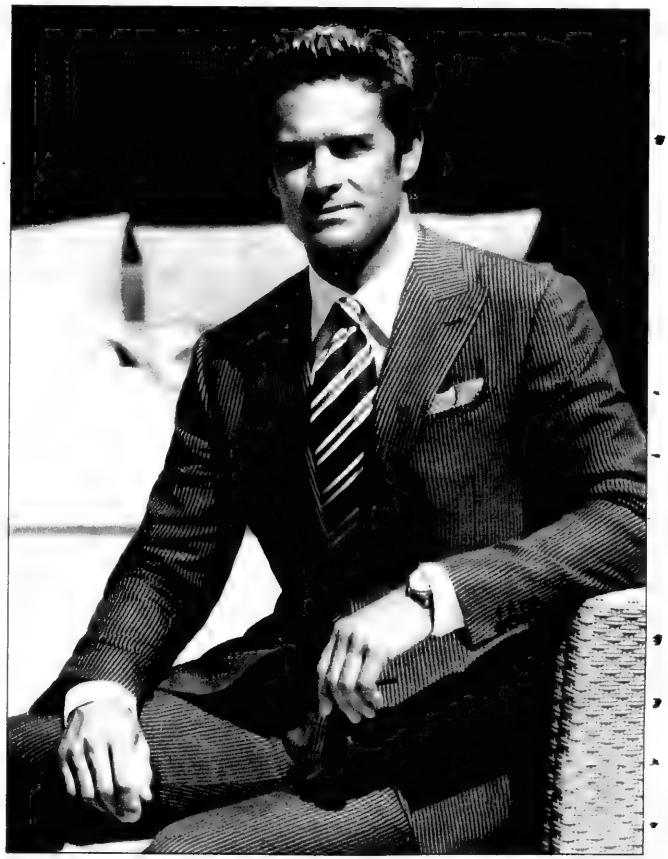
Boss, Canali and Pal Zileri continue to dominate the fashion conversation at Korry's, with two-button and flat-front constructions enjoying renewed popularity. In discussing what's hot for the season, Korman is quick to reference, in broader terms, the look-good-feel-good paradigm. "Look good, feel good. It may be a cliché, but it's true. What's the most common excuse for not looking our best? 'I don't have time. I'm running late.' But when you just throw something on, it shows. It tells whoever you meet on that day that you didn't care enough to make an impression. That they just didn't matter enough to you. That 15 minutes you saved could be the most expensive 15 minutes you didn't save when the deal you're working on goes south."

"Never take anything for granted — not one shirt"

And what of the notion that one's ability to present ourself with self-assurance shouldn't be contingent on one's appearance? "In a perfect world, no, it shouldn't. In the real world, where you and I live, 99 percent of us need that crutch and the other one percent are liars — unless they're Greek gods."



Given that Korry's clientele includes more than one Adonis, it would seem that even those celestial souls err on the side of sartorial splendour. That they choose to do so at 569 Danforth is no accident. With Saul Korman plying the airwaves 24/7, even those with their heads in the clouds eventually get the message.



GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Blue Shoe Box still fits perfectly after five years

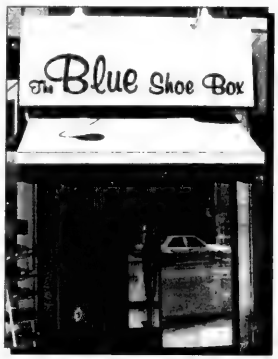
That's the store we're talking about; we haven't even slipped on a shoe yet!

Fortuitously, the shoes offered here are every bit the aesthetic equal of the shop that sells them. Recognizing a niche for upscale shoes in GreekTown, in 2002 proprietor Eliséo (Tony) Staffiere opened The Blue Shoe Box at 499 Danforth just west of Logan. In five short years, his small shop has made a big impact on the Toronto fashion footwear scene.



499 Danforth Ave. 416-289-6727
693 Queen St. W. 416-366-6727

The store occupies a diminutive space, but the design is magical. The elongated, reed-thin premises — conceivably a metaphor for a long, slender foot — have an architectural history. The intricately moulded 120-year-old copper ceiling still shows splendidly. Cappuccino-coloured spaccoed walls, exposed red brick and butterscotch-toned oak shelving frame a gleaming strip hardwood floor.

Shoe shoppers city-wide have taken so well to the Blue Shoe Box's quality footwear, expert fitting, and friendly service that Staffiere has opened a second shop on trendy Queen Street West to accommodate his growing clientele. Today's men and women, says Staffiere, want it all: quality, style, and comfort at reasonable prices. "You wear a pair of shoes more than any outfit. With the rising price of gas, many people are now putting more miles on their shoes than on their car," he smiles. "All the more reason to be good to your feet."

Staffiere has a history of treating feet with respect. His father and grandfather were both shoemakers in their native Italy, and he's carrying on the family tradition by putting quality first. One example is the made-in-Italy Johnston & Murphy shoes for men, featuring double leather soles and the finest quality leather uppers. The Blue Shoe Box also carries Kenneth Cole, Mephisto, Piccolinos, Arche, Birkenstock, Born, and other fine lines. But more than the merchandise itself, it's Staffiere's diligence in ensuring a perfect fit that keeps his customers coming back. "Every foot is a little bit different," says Staffiere. "The perfect shoe is the one that fits your feet perfectly — end of story."

If the shoe fits, wear it, goes the adage. More and more Torontonians are finding that fit in a Blue Shoe Box.

Eighth wonder of the fashion world

If your fashion shopping brings you to Eight, you've definitely arrived. The fashions are hot, the music is hip, the service warm and personal. Using a formula that's 20 parts Queen Street urban chic, 40 parts Bloor Street style and 100 parts fashion flair — at très friendly prices — Eight flat-out rocks.

541 Danforth Ave. 416•461•5339

Can a store be both teen-friendly and stroller-friendly? Eight is. Here, women and men of all ages coexist and co-shop not just peacefully, but gleefully. Seven short years after Eight's touchdown in GreekTown, fashion shoppers city-wide continue to feel its vibe.

Part of Eight's special energy emanates from owner Karin Kassabian, whose expertise and unassuming approach resonates with customers. "We operate on a 100 percent comfort zone, not 99 percent," she says.

This comfort level extends to fitting, where K's keen eyes ensure that you'll look great in whatever garment you try on — or it won't leave the shop with you.

Eight caters to women and men of almost all ages. "My customers are 16 to 66," says K, whose target market is "anyone who wants to look good and feel good".

Though Eight carries loads of hip denim, it's much more than a jeans store. From mainstream styles to beyond-the-edge, Eight carries the later-than-latest in casual clothing from Italy, Amsterdam and other European fashion hotbeds, as well as hand-picked domestic fashions from promising new designers like Mark Forman.

Because Kassabian's buying is intensely personal — "I wear what I sell" — you won't find Eight's pieces all over town. This suits K and her clientele just fine. "My taste may take me out on a limb, but lots of people have climbed onto that limb with me."

K buys with a view not only to style but also to transitional value. "If you really love a piece, you'd like it to carry from season to season insofar as possible," she says.

Obviously, Kassabian feeds off customer satisfaction. "I want you to leave smiling," she grins.

We are. Must have been something we eight.

Chacok's effusion of colour puts wings on your feet at Quasar Mode

This isn't just a "good" feeling — a pleasant sigh of satisfaction — that some outfits give you.

It's not just a "great" feeling — that extra skip in your step — that you get from your handful of favourite outfits.

This is the other-worldly feeling of an outfit that puts wings on your feet.

"Chacok speaks to you. She says "Let yourself go!"

The next time you see a woman walking on air, don't look for the lottery ticket in her hand; just look for the rainbow of colour that has "Chacok" written all over it.

Ginette Beauchamp, the effervescent owner of the Quasar Mode Boutique at Bellair and Cumberland — a scant five minutes from GreekTown — has spent the last 25 years helping fashion-conscious women prepare for liftoff in the handiwork of one of the boldest, most innovative designers of our times.

"She was a breath of fresh air the moment her work hit the runways of Paris in 1973, and she is equally uplifting today," says Beauchamp, referring to French designer Arlette Decok', the creator of the Chacok line. "Chacok speaks to you. She says "Go ahead — let yourself go!"

Rarely have whimsy and structural integrity coexisted so fortuitously in a women's garment. Unlike the designs of some avant-garde couturiers for whom outlandish statements are the rule, Chacok is disciplined. Within a framework of strong, flowing lines and exquisite easy-wearing fabrics, it's colour that sets her apart. Not dribs and drabs of it, but buckets — regardless of the season. Many designers unfurl their full colour palette in spring only to greatly narrow it in fall. Chacok, however, can be counted on to unleash an effusion of colour each and every season. Even her black and white groupings have the vibrancy of living colour.

Do you dare to dip into her palette?

"That's the only thing that gives some women pause," says Beauchamp. "My regulars who've been wearing Chacok for years have no hesitation. They can't wait for the new collections to see how she's outdone herself. If you've never worn Chacok before, however, you may hesitate. "Is this too spectacular for me? Is it overkill?"

Such fears, says Beauchamp, are understandable but groundless. "We're all spectacular inside, but some of us have trouble showing it. We feel we're not entitled to wear the colours of the rainbow. We're afraid people will think we're strutting like a peacock."

But the fact is, says Beauchamp, "Chacok has an innate ability to bring out the colourful personality that's in us all. The deeper you keep it submerged, the more she will reach down into your soul and pull it out. She's not adding; she's just projecting the beauty you already possess onto the big screen, in technicolour."

Beauchamp carries other leading French designers like Atika, Anne Fontaine, and Rodika Zanian, and as with Chacok, has played a leading role in sensitizing the Canadian market to these lines. Each line adds a layer of sophistication to Quasar Mode's overall collection, but Chacok clearly remains the leading light.

Of Toronto's many independent dress shops that opened in the late 1970s and early 1980s, Quasar Mode is one of the very few not only still in business, but thriving. Its success attests to Beauchamp's hard work, astute buying and exceptional customer service, but she's quick to deflect credit. "I have loyal customers with an incredible eye for colour and appreciation for design," she says. "It is uncanny how they see what I see in a garment. When I view the new collections I often see an outfit that's just begging to be bought for a particular customer. When I buy it and she loves it as much as I do, it's magic."

"It is uncanny how they see what I see"

Women walking on air is also magic — unless they're emerging from Quasar Mode in all the colours of the rainbow. Then it's just business as usual — and Chacok on the label.

Ethiopian culinary munificence at Dukem

Too good to eat. Eye candy on a plate.

So spectacular is the Vegetarian Platter served up at Dukem that you're half inclined to frame it and put it in an art gallery. When appetite and better judgement kick in, you're treated to a rare gustatory pleasure.

This is one of Dukem's most popular entrées, for good reason. First, it's a visual delight. Second, it's a complete, incredibly satisfying meal in itself. Third, it combines an amazing variety of contrasting yet complimentary flavours. Fourth, it's too-good-to-be-true inexpensive: $12 for an individual portion, $24 for a double portion that will feed two ravenous teenagers. Most platters on the menu can be ordered in these two sizes, and spiced hot or mild according to your taste.

Majestically arrayed on a bed of injera — a naturally-leavened pancake-like round made from teff — are a rainbow of festive offerings. Gomen (boiled collard greens sautéed with red onions); Yatakilt Wot (carrots, potatoes and cabbage); Yemsir Wot (lentils with garlic, ginger, and onion sauce), Yekik Alichat (yellow split peas); beets, potatoes, and side salad. The synergy of textures and seasonings makes this unique among geoethnic dining experiences.

You're encouraged to explore the menu to discover other items like the Doro Wot (tender chicken leg or thigh marinated in lemon, sautéed in seasoned butter and stewed in red pepper sauce, flavoured with onion, garlic root and a pinch of cardamom). The combination platters, however, clearly hold sway here.

Quiet conviviality envelopes the proceedings, with no boisterous commotion or clinking of cutlery to break the spell. You eat by slowly tearing off a bit of the injera and pinching a morsel of food. This actually requires more precision and table manners than using cutlery, not less. Kids love the opportunity to eat with their hands, and the quickly-acquired skill of doing so with dignity is a good lesson in social graces. The familial ambience — coupled with the always-gracious service — fosters a sense of calm that does wonders for your digestion.

The Ethiopian coffee ceremony takes your dining experience to a whole new level.

Coffee was first cultivated in, and named after, the Ethiopian region of Kaffa. During the coffee ceremony the coffee is taken through its full life cycle of preparation in front of you. It's done in a reverential yet sociable and friendly manner, as your senses thrill to the aroma of freshly roasted coffee and fragrant incense.

Dukem, a small city south of Addis Ababa, evokes memories of holiday weekend travel to the Ethiopian capital. Since opening on the Danforth two years ago, Dukem Restaurant has stirred similar nascent memories. In addition to a loyal Ethiopian following, Dukem has attracted a growing clientele from all walks of life to sample the earthly delights of a world apart.

15 years of cellular excellence at BBI

In the ever-changing world of cellular service, longevity speaks volumes. As BBI Telecommunications enters its 15th year on the Danforth, it joins a select few dealerships that have endured a period of rapid evolution unparalleled in any other industry.

Unlike many dealers who are cell phone vendors and little more, BBI is a complete mobile solutions and telecommunications centre. Sotiris Buseas and his staff are thoroughly versed in the products they sell, and will take the time to explain all the features of the device you purchase. If you have questions, they have answers.

Buseas and BBI also have a distinguished track record of community service, including a founding sponsorship of the Taste Of The Danforth, which they helped grow from its infancy to its current stature as North America's largest street festival.

Now at a futuristic-looking new location at 209 Danforth Avenue, the newly-minted BBI with its exquisitely tiled floor looks as much art gallery as cell phone centre. The high-tech environment is fitting, says Buseas, because with technology changing so rapidly, "the future is yesterday already."

In the face of constant change, it becomes doubly important to ensure that customers get the right products and plans for their needs. "The number of choices has increased exponentially," says Buseas. "Staying on top of them is a full time job for us, let alone the consumer."

Savvy consumers and corporations alike seek out BBI for their knowledge and reliability — customers like Saul Korman of Korry's Clothiers, who often does live radio commercials from his cell phone. So you can thank (or blame) BBI for him never missing a radio spot.

And consider this: any carrier that can provide Korman with an unlimited minutes plan that can comfortably accommodate all the talk he throws at it — and any dealership that can support that volume — has a lot going for it.

Granite Club, Didcock capture the spirit of Mediterranean cuisine

For Granite Club Executive Chef Nigel Didcock, Mediterranean cuisine isn't just a genre.

It's where he lives.

How fitting, then, that his physical address should match his metaphorical one: Didcock resides on the Danforth. "I've always felt at home around food, and the Danforth is one of the most food-centric environments you'll find anywhere."

Those fortunate enough to attend a Granite Club wedding or Bar Mitzvah are the beneficiaries of Didcock's uncanny ability to translate his culinary passion into the most spectacular Mediterranean fare this side of southern Europe.

Didcock received his indoctrination into haute cuisine at the most prestigious establishments: the Connaught Hotel in London, England, Le Petit Nice in Marseille, and the Hotel Restaurant Troisgros in Roanne. It was in France, he says, that the importance of freshness and simplicity really hit home. "Mother Nature is the head chef, the rest of us are just sous-chefs," he grins. "This is true of any style of cuisine, but particularly Mediterranean. All the elements for perfect taste are present from the get-go. Sea, sun, and fertile soil. Take what they give you and get out of the way."

He's greatly diminishing his role, of course, but such is Didcock's facility in the kitchen that he makes the virtuoso appear mundane. Case in point: the food photographs in Capturing The Spirit. This recently-published, critically-acclaimed compilation of Didcock's 100 favourite recipes contains some 75 food shots. This in itself is not unusual. What is unusual — unheard of, in fact — is that the dishes were shot without styling. It's standard industry practise to have a food stylist slave over each dish for hours to produce the drool-worthy aura you see in better magazines and cookbooks. Instead, Didcock had each dish photographed straight off the line at an actual Granite Club event. No styling, no tweaking, just cook and shoot. Think Neil Armstrong on Apollo 11 without a dry run.

Underscoring Didcock's passion for Mediterranean cuisine, close to half the recipes in Capturing The Spirit are Mediterranean-influenced. So if you like the Danforth experience, you'll love the opportunity to enjoy the most exquisite Mediterranean fare on a grand scale at a Granite Club event.

The quickest, most efficient route to GreekTown is Bayview to Eglinton to Laird, which takes you right by the Granite Club at Lawrence. Resplendent with flowers at this time of year, it's a pleasant reminder that Mother Nature's easy-to-follow directions always lead to a venue that Captures The Spirit.

NOT A STAR OF DAVID, BUT...The Leaside bridge connecting Millwood Avenue with Pape and Donlands — leading directly into GreekTown On The Danforth — recently underwent major repairs and reconstruction, complete with new parapets. Purely by coincidence, the motif embossed on the parapets, designed to resemble the original tile pattern dating back to 1927 when the bridge first opened, is pleasingly reminiscent of a Magen David.

Athens Pastries redefines taste buds

When you see a name like Athens Pastries, it's natural to wonder whether their product really lives up to the back-home standard or whether it's just a good facsimile trading on the reputation of the namesake city.

Ask any Torontonian who's been to Athens Pastries and they'll invariably rave about the exquisite taste, texture, and freshness. Would an Athenian do the same?

George Tsioutsioulas breaks into a wide grin. "You wouldn't believe how many people from Greece tell us that our pies and pastries are the best they've ever tasted — anywhere," he beams. So if you're planning to hop a plane to Athens for a taste test, you might want to save yourself the airfare; Athens Pastries' 30-year reputation for quality already stretches across the pond.

Simply stated, comparing Athens' spanakopita (spinach pie), cheese pie, meat pie and bougatsa to any other brands is like comparing homemade fresh-baked bread to the store-bought variety. For freshness, crispness, and flavour, no comparison is even possible.

The Athens version will permanently redefine your taste buds. Baked continuously throughout the day from the purest ingredients, with no additives or preservatives, the pastries and pies served up at this little gem of a shop have made Athens a prime destination of Danforth-goers seeking a light meal or delicious dessert.

There's table seating at both locations, and ample free parking at the Victoria Park location, but you really have to see the take-out action to understand how seriously Greeks take their pastries — and how zeroed in they are on Athens. There are more whole pies leaving here in boxes than at some pizza take-outs.

Reminiscent of the French mille feuilles, or the English custard slice, Athens' rendition of bougatsa is as close to perfection as a dessert gets: ultracrisp, delicate crust outside, light, mildly sweet vanilla custard inside. And here's the best part: even with a liberal sprinkling of icing sugar and cinnamon, at no time does it taste too sweet, and the cloying aftertaste so common with commercial desserts is noticeably absent.

This second-generation family business (owner George Tsioutsioulas, father Evangelos and their dedicated staff) has probably rolled enough pastry dough to stretch from here to Greece, so the name "Athens" is perfectly apt. The fact that it's rolled lovingly, with constant attention to quality, is confirmed by your first bite.

"Friendly Greek" more than a name

One visit to The Friendly Greek should be enough to convince you that the "Friendly" isn't just a buzzword.

It's "Friendly" as in the way you're greeted when you enter the restaurant. "Friendly" as in the courteous service you receive throughout your visit from servers who really know how to treat you and who understand the menu.

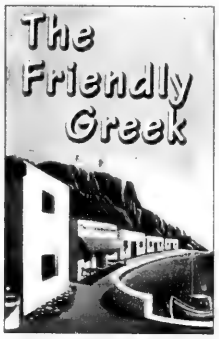
"Friendly" as in the large bowl of superb sesame seed garlic bread that's plunked on your table — no charge! — with your meal selection.

"Friendly" as in the relaxed atmosphere and inviting decor (a colourful panorama of white stuccoed walls painted with seascapes and other Greek scenes).

"Friendly" as in the huge outdoor patio that rubs shoulders with the Danforth.

Last but not least, "Friendly" as in prices. It's really quite incredible what you get here for your dining dollar. In the best Danforth tradition, portions are huge, yet many entrées are priced under $12. Many appetizers are still under $5, and you can order a bottle of wine from the extensive wine list for as little as $19.95. Side orders are so reasonably priced you'll think you're in a time warp.

The Friendly Greek exemplifies the qualities the Danforth has become famous for: traditional Greek food, huge portions, and people who serve you as if you were family — because, during your visit, you are.



551 Danforth Ave.

Included among the entrées are authentic Greek recipes like Loukaniko, a delicious Homemade Wine Sausage (two pieces) served with Greek salad, rice, roast potatoes, tzatziki and garlic bread, all for only $11.95; Ofto Kleftico (roast lamb the Friendly Greek way), prepared oil-free and served with Greek salad, roast potatoes, rice and garlic bread, only $13.95.

For a heavy-duty feast, try another Friendly Greek house specialty: the Hot Piklia For Two, with two pieces of lamb chops, two pieces of quail, one chicken filet, roast lamb, two pieces of seftalia, two pieces of biftekia; served with Greek salad, side order of roast potatoes, rice and garlic bread, all for only $38.95. (Your odds of actually finishing this mammoth platter are about the same as the Maple Leafs going undefeated in 08-09).

You can't go wrong in life being friendly, and you can't go wrong in GreekTown at The Friendly Greek.

Danforth Jewish Circle: building community values

Some nine years ago, a handful of interested parents met in Debbie Plested's living room and decided to start a Jewish studies program in the Riverdale area.

They were all members of the newly formed Danforth Jewish Circle (DJC), a grassroots, liberal egalitarian congregation in Toronto's east end, established in 1996 and then chaired by Marlee Wyman.

Giving children a sense of community

At the time, Plested, co-chair of the DJC education committee, said children's education was a priority for many DJC members.

"We were really a community," she recently said. "We wanted our kids to learn and study within our community and feel a part of the community."

Plested said the group recognized the necessity of setting up a program that could meet the diverse educational needs of the children.

At that time, the local Hebrew heritage program, a school board program that had been operating in the neighbourhood for some 15 years, could only offer a basic introduction to Jewish studies, she said.

"The program was instrumental in creating a sense of Jewish identity and a sense of community," she said. "But [it] had trouble developing as a curriculum because it had to cater to a wide age group. What was happening was that our families had no choice but to look outside the community to further their child's Jewish education."

The group of parents met many times in the course of the year to establish a community-based supplementary school. They had to develop a curriculum, hire teachers and publicize the program to attract students, find funding and find a space to hold classes, Plested said.

Now in its 11th year, the DJC Children's Jewish Studies program runs weekly classes for elementary school students out of a local school. Through discussion, debate, music, drama and art, the children study Hebrew, Torah, Jewish history and current events, Jewish holidays and rituals, Plested said.

"Our program values Judaism as a dynamic, living religion. Our students learn to understand what it means to be a Jew and how being Jewish affects our values, beliefs and behaviour."

While the exploration of Jewish identity is a key component of the curriculum, Plested said that given the high proportion of interfaith families, there is also an emphasis on "respect for the broad spectrum of multiculturalism which exists within Judaism and in the neighbourhood."

The goal of the Hebrew language program is to help the children learn to read Hebrew, recite the basic prayers and gain familiarity with Hebrew songs, she said.

"We want the children to be able to decode Hebrew so that they'll be able to prepare for their Bat or Bar Mitzvah...If they have more of an interest in conversational Hebrew, we encourage and assist them [with] supplementing their studies by connecting them with a tutor."

B'Nai Mitzvah program: building and bonding

In addition to the school, the DJC offers a B'nai Mitzvah program, which is run by parents and not funded by any group. "This group is the beginning of a connection to the community for the future because the kids are building friendships and bonding as a group," Wyman said.

Wyman said she marvels at the growth of the community education program. "It shows you what a group of dedicated volunteers can accomplish. They're incredibly motivated. That's the whole thing about volunteerism: action is taken because we want to see results."

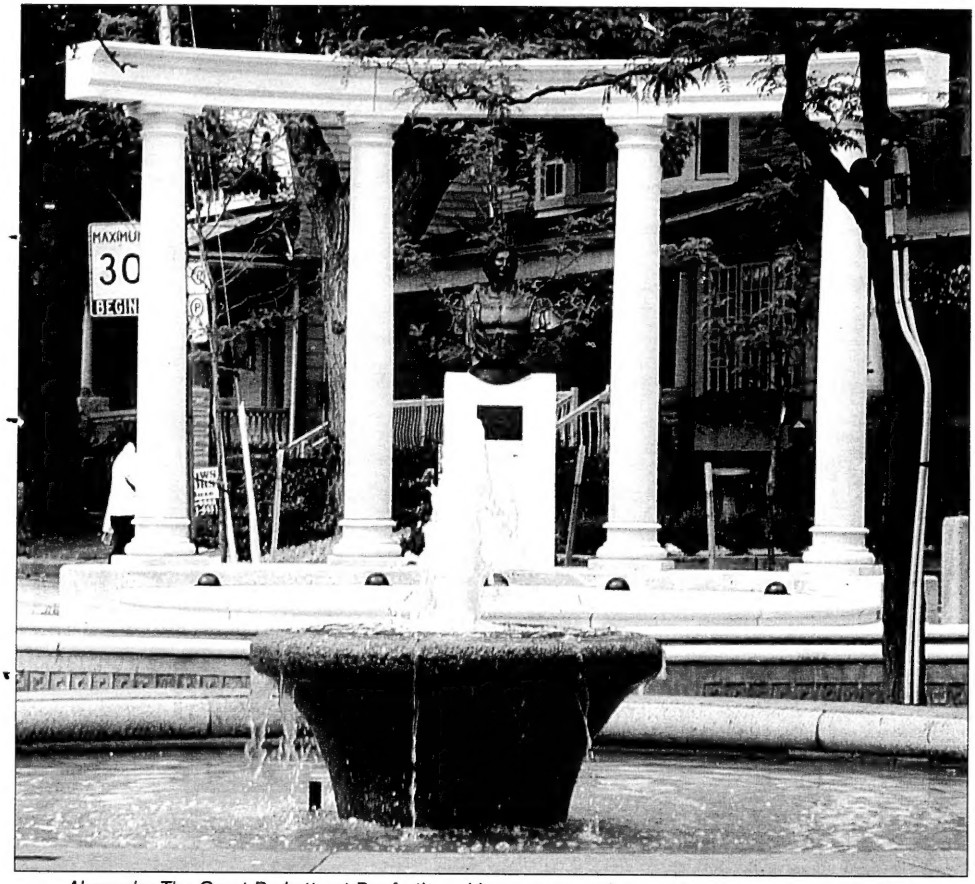
GreekTown on the Danforth: Canadian heritage in the making



Alexander The Great Parkette at Danforth and Logan: a popular spot to pause, relax, and reflect

More than a tourist area, GreekTown on the Danforth is a community. In the summer, when the trees reach their full green and Toronto's restauranteurs put out their patio tables, GreekTown puts on its Mediterranean face.

Plenty to woo your senses

Here, when friends and acquaintances greet, you are as likely to hear "Kall' imera! Ti kanis?" as "Hi! How are you?" In the restaurants and cafés, you hear patrons converse in every language of the world.

While the music of Greek polysyllables will appeal to your ears, the most important thing is not the language, but the fact that people do greet each other. Bustling and busy as the community is, everyone — not just tourists, but everyone who lives and works here — is as liable to stroll as to hurry.

There is plenty on the Danforth to woo your senses, and make you want to slow your steps: bright color and exotic decor; the sounds of the bouzouki; the aroma of lamb souvlaki wafting from a grill; and the tastes of exotic foods. It is the restaurants above all — and the atmosphere they help create, at once lively and relaxed — which draw people from all over the city and beyond.

Many restaurants capture, in their decor, the pleasing colours and terraced style associated with the Greek islands and mountainsides. And while souvlaki is everywhere on the Danforth, its dining establishments take pride in offering the full range and flavours of Greek and other Mediterranean cuisines.

But the Danforth boasts many other fine ethnic restaurants as well. To name but a few, Japanese, Italian, and East Indian cuisine are well represented. And its cafés and dessert houses are unparalleled, both in number and quality.

GreekTown is also home to Toronto's finest natural and specialty food stores and many alternative health practitioners. And it's become a leading fashion destination, with a host of fine specialty boutiques for men, women, and children, as well as European-quality beauty salons and spas.

A solid community with solid values

There is plenty of live entertainment here. At many establishments, audience participation is the rule, though after a fine, full meal, you may feel disinclined to dance on a tabletop.

There are a few other Toronto streets which are wider in actual metres, but the Danforth has an expansive feel about it which you don't find anywhere else. Majestic trees shade well-kept homes; here and there are streetside parks, where you can sit and rest your feet.

If you look closely, you see there is a solid community here. You see not only the tourists, but also the elderly and the children, as they shop, stroll or sit and chat in the cafés and parks. In the restaurants, waiters and bartenders offer everyone prompt, friendly service; there are plenty of regular guests whom they greet by name.

Nor is it just staff who do this. You will see the owners showing guests to their tables, greeting them warmly; in GreekTown, customers are family.

Also here are the institutions that belong in any healthy city neighborhood: schools, houses of worship, clubs, and community centres. People not only work here, they live here; and it is in great part because they keep GreekTown pleasant to live in, that it is pleasant to visit.

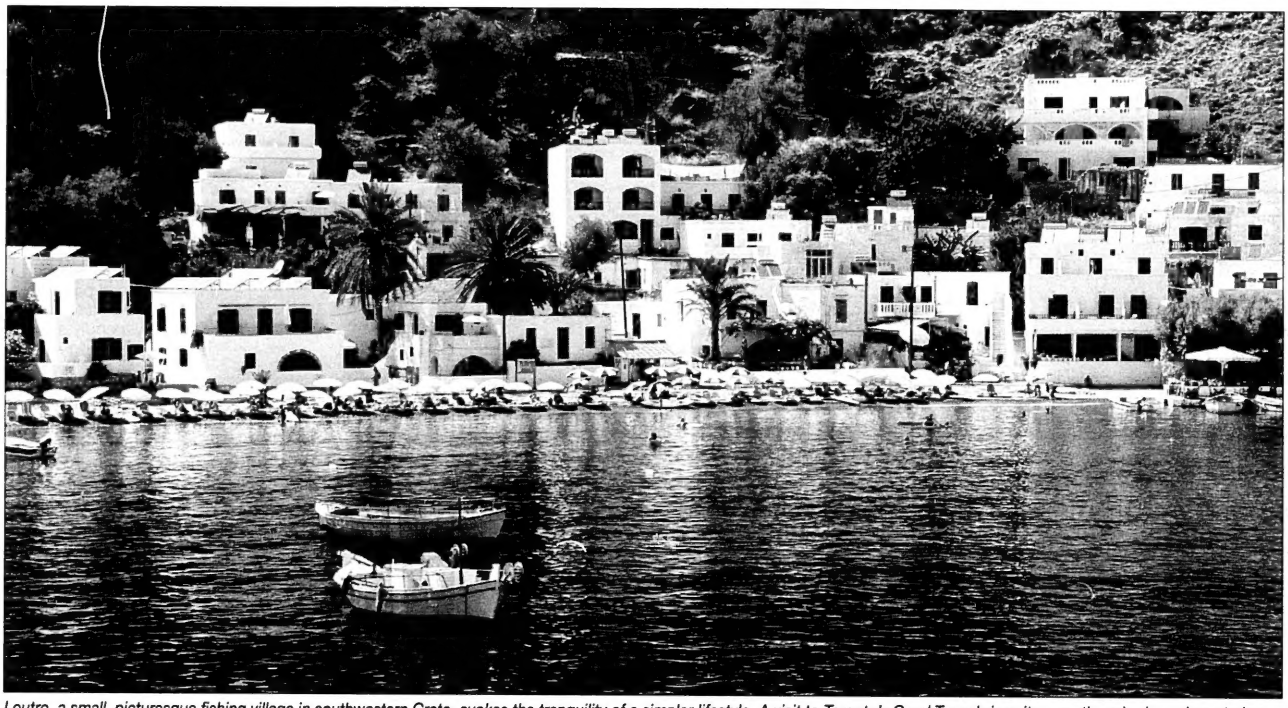
If you really want to get to know the community, chat a little with the staffs of different restaurants; you'll find that everyone knows everyone else. There is plenty of competition here, but it is friendly. To thrive, a restauranteur has to cherish the firm conviction that his or her establishment is the best; but in GreekTown, they do so without knocking the competition. If anything, the reverse is true.

It is from this wealth of restaurants that the "Taste of the Danforth" festival was born. This annual event has become so popular that GreekTown is closed to traffic for its duration. It's a great opportunity to sample the Danforth's culinary delights while enjoying its ambience, all in support of worthy charities like the Toronto East General Hospital Foundation.

While the Danforth is a community, it has never been a closed enclave. Saul Korman of Korry's Clothiers, an active member of the Jewish community, is also an enthusiastic promoter of GreekTown. Having been there for half a century — Korry's is now celebrating its 50th anniversary — Korman knows the people of this community, many of whom started as dishwashers and short-order cooks in the '50's and '60's, then opened the first modest Greek restaurants in the '70's. Many of them came here seeking both prosperity and freedom; the late Andreas Papandreou (a recent Prime Minister of Greece) lived in Canada from 1969 to 1974.

Korman shares with the people who live and work on the Danforth their joy in the prosperity and freedom of Canada. If you come to GreekTown, you are breathing, hearing and tasting Canadian heritage — not in a museum, but as contemporary history in the making.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH



Loutro, a small, picturesque fishing village in southwestern Crete, evokes the tranquility of a simpler lifestyle. A visit to Toronto's GreekTown brings its warmth and values closer to home.

That family at 420 Danforth is so nice ...

It's often said that the only way to really experience authentic regional cuisine at its finest is to enjoy it in someone's home.

So if we gave you the address of a Greek family known for their great home cooking and told you to knock on their door at 7 o'clock tonight and invite yourself in for dinner — even though you'd never met them before — would you?

Relax. We've told them you're coming.

Now you not only have to show up, you have to eat everything they put on your plate, ask for seconds, ask for thirds — then eat the fourths after they ignore your protests that you can't eat another bite.

Then, of course, there's dessert.

Sound familiar?

Greek hospitality is such that if you knocked on a stranger's door in a Greek neighbourhood, their first inclination would be to invite you in for dinner — even today.

The family that lives at 420 Danforth Avenue goes one step further by dispensing with the formalities. You don't have to knock. Just walk in, sit down, and dinner will be on your table before you know it. They'll even ask you what you'd like for dinner. Just like in a restaurant.

The Tsafatinos family proves the old adage that there's no cooking like home cooking. While technically they reside offsite, if you count the hours they spend at 420 Danforth Avenue cooking up a storm for their extended family of customers, you'd be hard-pressed to prove that 420 is anything but home.

What comes out of their kitchen is further evidence of a home environment. Everything's made from scratch. How much better does this taste than prepared food? It's like comparing your mother's cooking to fast food: no comparison.

KALYVIA

Founders Mike and Peter Tsafatinos are both from the Greek town of Kalyvia; when you name your restaurant after your home town, you've got a culinary legacy to live up to. This is particularly true of Kalyvia, as no fewer than 10 villages in Greece bear that name. So in addition to the local food critics, the entire Tsafatinos family — including sons Jim and Jim — have to prove to anyone who's eaten in any of the 10 Kalyvias, or nearby, that their food measures up. That they're able to do so with flying colours allows them to relax for about five seconds — until the next Kalyvian comes in.

Kalyvia's homemade goodness can be enjoyed on the premises, or in the privacy of your home or office. Large enough for substantial gatherings, but configured for intimacy, Kalyvia is ideal for birthday parties, Bar Mitzvah parties, and other special events.

Kalyvia is one of a very few places in Toronto where you can still enjoy the tastes and trappings of home in a family restaurant environment. It has "Mom" written all over it.

Family planning

In GreekTown, you needn't go far to find family. It finds you. Walk into any restaurant, café, or shop, and odds are you'll find yourself in a family business. The old-fashioned kind: not just owned by family, but worked by it. Family out front, greeting the customers. Family serving. Family in the kitchen.

In GreekTown the family business finds you so often, in fact, that you wonder how there's any other kind.

Read or listen to the business news, and you'll learn about the latest corporate takeovers. About the big getting bigger — either on their own steam, or by swallowing up their competition. Or via a merger (a business euphemism for loveless marriage). But who needs love? Who needs a crush on each other when together, you can crush the competition?

But the folks in GreekTown just don't get it. They're stuck in a time warp of love, caring, and customer service. Get bigger? Hell, they're having way too much fun being small.

It gets worse. They're more interested in supporting their neighbours than competing with them. The owners of restaurant A have dinner at restaurant B. Corporate takeovers? They haven't a clue. Loveless marriage? Ditto. Their marriage — their family business union — is so full of love, the whole family feels compelled to share.

Of the businesses featured in this section, virtually all are family businesses, generally run by multiple family members. Father-son. Mother-daughter. Husband-wife. Brother-sister. Uncle-nephew. Aunt-niece. Cousins. In-laws? Elsewhere, pariahs; in GreekTown, family, or oikogeneia (pronounced ee-ko-yen-ya). Everyone pulls the oars together, and the only fish that get swallowed up are the mussels.

This family dynamic works so well, you'd assume it was meticulously planned. And perhaps, in some instances, it is.

In the majority of cases, however, this perfect harmony — plates sailing from kitchen to table like baton passes — just happens. It comes naturally. It comes from younger generations seeing and hearing and feeling the resonance between their elders, and wanting to be part of it.

Nor does it stop there. Because when you work in GreekTown, even when you're not family, you're oikogeneia. When your chef of 25 years dies at age 63 of prostate cancer — the man you worked side by side with every day for a quarter century, not including the time you worked together in Athens before you crossed the pond — when he dies, does it hurt any less that he's not your "flesh and blood"?

Oikogeneia.

It's customary to thank your host for a great meal, your shopkeeper for great service. The merchants of GreekTown, however, are due another thank you. Thank You for putting the family in family business. For showing us that when you're family, everything goes according to plan — even when there isn't a plan. For reminding us that family isn't just the most important thing we've got.

It's all we've got.
